We can now return to our countries with the feeling that we have added another stone to the construction of more equitable and just societies. However, let us not forget the immensity of the task still ahead of us. I therefore wish all of us courage to examine and redefine our roles as governments, employers and workers, wisdom to form partnerships with each other and confidence that together we can master the changes we are facing.

And now I declare the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference officially and solemnly closed.

(The Conference adjourned sine die at 1.15 p.m.)

CONSTITUTION AND STANDING ORDERS

International Labour Conference

Provisional Record

Seventh item on the agenda: Proposed amendment to the Constitution to add a new paragraph to article 19 so as to enable the Conference to abrogate obsolete international labour Conventions and consequential or related amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference

Report VII

I. Introduction

1. Paragraph 1 of article 46 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides as follows:

> Any proposal for the amendment of the Constitution of the Organization shall only be considered by the Conference if it has been included in the agenda of the Conference by the Governing Body at least four months before the opening of the session at which it is to be considered in accordance with article 14 of the Constitution, or has been included in the agenda of the Conference by the preceding session of the Conference in accordance with paragraph 3 of article 16 of the Constitution.

2. In accordance with that provision, the Governing Body unanimously decided at its 267th Session (November 1996)[1] to include in the agenda of the 85th Session of the Conference the question of an amendment to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization which would add a new paragraph 9 to article 19 to enable the International Labour Conference to abrogate, by a majority of two-thirds of the votes of delegates present, any Convention adopted in accordance with the provisions of article 19 of the Constitution if it appears that it has lost its purpose or that it no longer makes a useful contribution to attaining the objectives of the Organization.

3. The text of the draft constitutional amendment and related modifications to the Standing Orders of the Conference are set out in section IV. The provisions of the Constitution and Standing Orders that are relevant to the consideration of the proposed amendment to the Constitution are reproduced in the Annex to this document. It will be noted that, in accordance with article 47, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the latter should on its opening day take a decision as to whether the draft is to be considered in full Conference or first referred to a committee. In line with the new arrangements for the functioning of the Conference, since the plenary is not expected to meet until a week later, the draft will need to be referred to a committee for report. Since a large degree of consensus on the substance of the proposal has already been manifested among the members of the Governing Body, the plenary will be invited to decide that the package of constitutional and related[2] Standing Orders amendments be referred in the first instance to the Standing Orders Committee which is due to be established in any case for the consideration of other matters on which the Governing Body has also decided to recommend amendments to the Standing Orders. If the Conference so decides, the Standing Orders Committee will thus become a "Committee on the Amendment of Article 19 of the Constitution and on Standing Orders".

II. Purpose of the proposed amendment

4. The problem of how to deal with ineffective or outdated international labour Conventions is almost as old as the Organization itself. At a very early stage, the International Labour Conference was confronted with the need to remedy the flaws or the failure of instruments that were adopted during the first sessions. While there were no constitutional provisions which could have prevented the Conference from adopting new instruments on a subject-matter already covered by earlier instruments, there were none either indicating how to deal with the Conventions that the Conference would have wished to replace. The ILO Constitution is silent on the entire matter — including the question of the conditions for entry into force, which in practice have been dealt with in the final clauses of the Conventions.

5. Ten years after the creation of the Organization, the Governing Body and the Conference addressed the question. After an extensive debate — and not without certain reservations — the International Labour Conference did not consider that it had the power to abrogate the Conventions that it wished to replace with the new instruments. This conclusion reflected certain practical considerations and also the view that, once adopted, international labour Conventions became "true contracts" between the States that had ratified them. Thus in the absence of an enabling provision in the Constitution of the time, they were beyond the reach of the Conference.

6. As a result, the Conference could not terminate the obligations that the States parties to the Conventions had assumed by ratification. The Conference could not even prevent a Convention which was already ratified from producing new obligations (on account of new ratifications) unless the Convention in question contained specific provisions authorizing the Conference to do so. It was for this reason that, as from 1929, the final clauses of international labour Conventions contained a provision which enabled the Conference to close a Convention to further ratification by means of a new revising Convention.

[2] It should be pointed out that not all of the proposed Standing Orders amendments would be consequential, that is to say conditional upon the entry into force of the instrument of constitutional amendment. This point is examined in paragraphs 13 and 14 of section III below.

7. Despite this important innovation, however, significant lacunae still existed: firstly, only the denunciation of a Convention by the States parties to it, under the conditions set out in that Convention, could terminate the legal obligations thereby created, even if the Conference considered that such obligations no longer made a useful contribution to attaining the Organization's objectives. Secondly, the Conference had no competence in respect of Conventions adopted before 1929, since these Conventions did not contain the special clause enabling the Conference to close them to further ratification, even if they had become patently obsolete. Thirdly, in order to prevent a Convention which was recognized as obsolete from continuing to give rise to new obligations, the Conference was obliged to undertake its revision. Such a revision might, however, be totally inappropriate or untimely as, for instance, in the case of a Convention which contained outdated provisions, where it would have been preferable to simply close that instrument to further ratification.

8. Since then, however, certain measures have been taken to moderate the consequences of the accumulation of revising and revised instruments. The Governing Body has decided to classify a certain number of Conventions as dormant[3] (i.e. reports on application under article 22 of the Constitution are no longer requested) or shelved[4] (i.e. the Conventions are left dormant and cease to be published). These measures, although they have helped to alleviate the problem in practical terms, could not and did not have any impact on the legal existence of obsolete Conventions, which could, theoretically at least, continue to be ratified (if they were adopted before 1929) and also, for those in force, be the subject of a representation or a complaint under article 24 or 26 of the Constitution.

9. Within the overall context of the re-examination of existing Conventions with a view to their revision, the question arises as to the manner in which it would be possible to deal more satisfactorily and effectively with obsolete Conventions from both the legal and practical standpoints. As stated in the Office paper submitted to the Working Party on Policy regarding the Revision of Standards of the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards of the Governing Body in March 1996:

> It is therefore up to the Governing Body to examine whether, in cases when the Organization has truly reached the conclusion that the obligations deriving from a given Convention no longer have any real influence on social progress, it might not be preferable — from the standpoint of the credibility and clarity of the standard-setting system — to be able to take all the steps that follow from that conclusion.[5]

10. Extensive discussions on the question have accordingly taken place in the Governing Body, at its 265th and 267th Sessions (March 1996 and November 1996), in which all aspects of the question including the legal and practical aspects, as well as various possible solutions, were thoroughly discussed. On the recommendation of the Working Party, the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards and the Governing Body agreed that a constitutional amendment which would give to the Conference the power formally to abrogate obsolete international labour Conventions appeared to be the simplest, most effective and legally unchallengeable solution. Such a solution could provide the most effective answer to the reasoning which was at the base of the "contractual approach" since, as explained in the relevant Office document:

[5] See document GB.265/LILS/WP/PRS/2, para. 15.

> In fact, the contractual approach was only able to prevail because the Constitution — as indeed the Conventions themselves — was silent as to the Conference's possibility of abrogating instruments. If this gap were to be filled, it would also lose its raison d'être [...] When making an overall assessment of the merits as well as the difficulties inherent in this constitutional approach, it is important to bear in mind the symbolic value that the power conferred on the Conference would have on the image of international labour Conventions; they would cease to seem a mere juxtaposition of more or less disparate treaties and be viewed as a real body of international labour "legislation".[6]

11. The question also arose as to whether member States which are parties to a Convention that is to be abrogated, but wish to remain bound inter se by the obligations arising out of it, should not be allowed to "contract out". This question was addressed in the Office paper prepared for the 267th Session of the Governing Body (November 1996) in the following terms:

> [...] it must be clear in this respect that there is nothing in treaty law which allows the ILO, even through recourse to a constitutional amendment, to prevent States parties to a Convention which wish to remain bound inter se by the obligations resulting from this Convention to decide to do so. It must also be clear that the abrogation of the Convention is not at all supposed to affect the national legislation which gives it effect if the Member does not wish to amend it. But conversely, nothing allows these States to claim from the Organization itself a kind of subjective right to the continued application of these obligations; they may only claim in this respect the rights granted under the Constitution in its current wording, and to participate with all the other Members in the adoption of a constitutional amendment to alter these procedures.[7]

12. After a careful examination of the question, the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards and the Governing Body took the view, however, that this option would be neither legally justifiable nor practically advisable. With the proposed constitutional amendment, the authority for the Conference to abrogate international labour Conventions in certain circumstances would thus be based on an international agreement, namely the ILO Constitution itself, which all Members have accepted, including the procedures that it contains for amendment (see the Annex to this document). The Governing Body has decided, therefore, that the solution to be recommended to the Conference should be that of an amendment which would delegate authority to the Conference to abrogate the Conventions qualified as obsolete, especially in so far as the obligations arising therefrom are concerned. It was admitted, however, that such a power should be subject to sufficient guarantees so that it is exercised in a reasonable manner, and accordingly the Governing Body proposed a detailed procedure to this effect. Those guarantees are examined below.

III. Scope of the proposed amendment and procedure for abrogation and withdrawal

A. Scope of the proposed amendment

13. In the documents submitted to the Working Party for examination, the Office had drawn attention to the fact that, if it was true that only a constitutional amendment could confer on the Conference the power to put an end to the legal obligations deriving from ratified Conventions, it would also follow that the scope of such an amendment should be limited to those cases where such legal obligations have been established as between two States or more. The Governing Body thus noted that no express constitutional authority was needed for the Conference to withdraw a Convention that had either not come into force or was no longer in force because of denunciations, since no such obligations exist in these cases. The same applies a fortiori to international labour Recommendations, which cannot create such obligations.[8] As explained in the background document:

> Under the term "abrogation" the constitutional practice of the Organization and the previous documents on the subject have tended to lump together the abolition of all Conventions considered as obsolete, whether or not they are in force. Although the Constitution does not make such a distinction or, more exactly, does not say anything about the conditions of entry into force of Conventions, the situation is not at all the same in each case. Beyond the obligation of placing an instrument before the competent authority, a Convention which has not come into force does not create legal obligations either with regard to other member States or to the Organization itself. If it is not closed to ratification, its most specific legal effect is that it may receive other ratifications (even if such ratifications have been discouraged, the Director-General does not, however, have the power to refuse them) and thus enter into force at any time. [...] It would [therefore] be regrettable if the impression were inadvertently given that this amendment is also necessary to authorize the Conference to withdraw Conventions which have not entered into force, in particular if the constitutional amendment in question here took a long time to come into effect. This is why it seems timely to indicate in an appropriate manner that this amendment does not in any way prejudice the power of the Conference to close to any further ratification a Convention which has not come into force and to thus cancel that Convention's capacity to produce its legal effects. Since the concept of coming into force does not appear in the Constitution, it would seem preferable to establish an appropriate distinction between abrogation and withdrawal in the Standing Orders.[9]

14. Although the withdrawal of such instruments requires exactly the same strict procedural guarantees as those applying to abrogation (which are described later), it should thus be clearly understood that, if the Conference so wished, it could withdraw an instrument of this kind without waiting for the entry into force of the constitutional amendment relating to the abrogation of obsolete international labour Conventions. An appropriate footnote has thus been included to that effect to the relevant amended provisions in the Standing Orders (articles 11 and 45bis of the Conference Standing Orders).

[8] As it was pointed out in document GB.267/LILS/WP/PRS/1, para. 9, there has been a tendency so far to set aside the question of international labour Recommendations since Recommendations do not create an obligation in the strict sense for either States or the Organization, so that their obsolescence does not have any practical consequences. However, once the problem of the abrogation of Conventions is examined, it is no longer possible to avoid raising the question of obsolete Recommendations it may however be considered that a constitutional amendment is not necessary for this purpose, since the Recommendation does not create any obligations between States, and a simple acte contraire would be sufficient to withdraw it if it became obsolete.

[9] See document GB.267/LILS/WP/PRS/1, paras. 5 and 7.

B. Procedure for abrogation and withdrawal

15. In the case of abrogation as in the case of withdrawal, it should be stressed that the proposals referred to the Conference are only enabling ones. In other words, they are designed to make it possible for the Conference to put an end to the legal existence of these instruments if and when this should be found desirable. But they do not in any way prejudge the question as to whether this would be desirable in any specific case: the background documents submitted by the Office as well as the discussion itself emphasized that the identification of obsolete Conventions and Recommendations could only proceed on a very careful case-by-case basis. In order to ensure all the necessary guarantees for this process to be applied, the general approach which was agreed on was that the abrogation of a Convention (or its withdrawal when it is not in force) should be by way of an "acte contraire": in other words, the Conference should go through procedures analogous to and offering the same guarantees as those applicable to the adoption of international labour standards.

16. This approach implies in the first place that the question of the abrogation of a Convention in force (or that of the withdrawal of a Convention not in force or of an obsolete Recommendation) has to be placed on the agenda of the Conference and that the same rules should be applied mutatis mutandis as for the adoption of a new instrument. As a precautionary measure, it was agreed that the Governing Body decision to place the question of abrogation or withdrawal of an instrument on the agenda of the Conference must as far as possible be taken by consensus. This also means that the final decisions on abrogation or withdrawal must be taken by the Conference applying the same majority rule. The reasons why it was felt important to keep the same voting provisions as for adoption were explained as follows:

> While abrogation is an act as serious as that of adoption, it is not a more serious act, and subject to what is proposed in the following paragraph, there does not seem in the end to be any reason to require a conditional majority. Furthermore, since it is a serious act, each government and non-government delegate must be committed individually. This is why it appears important to maintain the record vote rather than the anonymous system of consensus during the final vote at the Conference. That being said, the legitimate desire to prevent the possibility of a coalition of two groups proceeding to abrogation against the desire of the third, may and must be taken into account. The simplest and most economic means of doing so and one which would be most consistent with the constitutional balance mentioned above would be to introduce this guarantee of consensus at the upstream stage, i.e. when the Governing Body must decide to place the matter on the Conference agenda.[10]

17. In accordance with the various provisions that have thus been unanimously proposed by the Governing Body (see section IV below), the procedure for the abrogation of an obsolete Convention (or the withdrawal of a Convention that is not in force or of an obsolete Recommendation) would be as follows:

(a) The matter would first need to be raised in the Governing Body. The discussion would be based on an Office report containing all relevant information on the subject. After examination, the Governing Body might then decide by consensus to place the question on the agenda of the Conference. If, however, consensus could not be reached in two successive sessions of the Governing Body, a decision might still validly be taken by a four-fifths majority. This latter qualified majority was thought necessary in order to exclude the possibility of a decision being taken despite the opposition of one of the three groups.

[10] ibid., paras. 25 and 26.

(b) Once placed on the agenda of the Conference, the Office would request all governments of member States by means of a questionnaire transmitted 18 months before the session of the Conference to indicate their position after having consulted the most representative employers' and workers' organizations. On the basis of the replies, the Office would draw up a report with its final proposal which would be distributed to governments four months before the session of the Conference.

(c) The Conference might deal with the question either directly in a plenary sitting or first refer it to the Selection Committee. After having completed the examination of the Office report either in plenary or in a committee, the Conference would be invited to decide by consensus or, failing that, by a two-thirds majority to submit the proposal for abrogation to a final vote. This final record vote, calling for a majority of two-thirds of the votes of delegates present, could not take place earlier than the day following the preliminary decision.

IV. Proposed texts[11]

18. In conformity with article 47, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the following draft constitutional amendment is submitted to the Conference as the basis for discussion. The Conference is also invited to consider and adopt the proposed consequential and related amendments to its Standing Orders, it being understood that, as far as abrogation is concerned, the adoption of these amendments will depend on the final vote on the constitutional amendment. The footnotes below are therefore proposed for adoption in conjunction with the amendments to the Standing Orders. The corresponding amendments to the Standing Orders of the Governing Body, for eventual adoption by the Governing Body itself, are attached for information only.

that the Convention has lost its purpose or that it no longer makes a useful contribution to attaining the objectives of the Organization.

PROPOSED CONSEQUENTIAL AND RELATED AMENDMENTS TO THE STANDING ORDERS OF THE CONFERENCE

ARTICLE 11

1. The procedure for the consideration of proposed Conventions and Recommendations, as well as the procedure for the abrogation[12] or withdrawal of such instruments adopted by the Conference, shall be governed by the rules concerning Convention and Recommendation procedure set forth in section E of Part II.

ARTICLE 45BIS

Procedure to be followed in the event of the abrogation[12] or withdrawal of Conventions and Recommendations

1. When an item to be placed on the agenda of the Conference concerns the abrogation of a Convention in force or the withdrawal of a Convention which is not in force or of a Recommendation, the Office shall place before the Governing Body a report containing all relevant information which the Office possesses on this subject.

2. When an item on abrogation or withdrawal is placed on the agenda of the Conference, the Office shall communicate to all governments, so that it reaches them 18 months before the session of the Conference, a short report and questionnaire requesting them to indicate within a period of 12 months their position, along with the reasons therefor, on the subject of the said abrogation or withdrawal, along with the relevant information. This questionnaire shall request governments to consult the most representative employers' and workers' organizations before preparing their final replies. On the basis of the replies received, the Office shall draw up a report containing a final proposal which shall be distributed to governments four months before the session of the Conference.

3. The Conference may decide to examine this report and the proposal which it contains directly in a plenary sitting or send it to the Selection Committee. At the end of this examination in the plenary or in the light of the report of the Selection Committee, as appropriate, the Conference shall decide by consensus or, failing that, by a preliminary vote by a two-thirds majority to submit the formal proposal for the abrogation or withdrawal of the instrument to a final vote. This record vote shall take place no earlier than the day following the preliminary decision.

[12] Only applicable upon the entry into force of the Instrument of Amendment to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, 1997.

CORRESPONDING AMENDMENTS TO THE STANDING ORDERS OF THE GOVERNING BODY

ARTICLE 12BIS

Procedure concerning the placing on the Conference agenda of the abrogation[13] of a Convention in force or the withdrawal of a Convention which is not in force or of a Recommendation

1. When an item to be placed on the agenda of the Conference concerns the abrogation of a Convention in force or the withdrawal of a Convention which is not in force or of a Recommendation, the Office will place before the Governing Body a report containing all relevant information which the Office possesses on this subject.

2. The provisions of article 18 concerning the fixing of the Conference agenda shall not apply to the decision to place on the agenda of a given session of the Conference an item on such an abrogation or withdrawal. Such a decision shall as far as possible be reached by consensus or, if such a consensus cannot be reached in two successive sessions of the Governing Body, by a four-fifths majority of members of the Governing Body with a right to vote during the second of these sessions.

[13] Only applicable upon the entry into force of the Instrument of Amendment to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, 1997.

Annex

Relevant provisions regarding the procedure for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution

The procedure for the Conference's consideration of the proposed amendment with a view to adoption is governed by article 47 of the Standing Orders of the Conference and article 36 of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

STANDING ORDERS OF THE CONFERENCE

Procedure for the consideration of proposed amendments to the Constitution by the Conference

1. The International Labour Office shall submit to the Conference draft amendments corresponding to the question or questions in respect of which a proposal for amendment has been included in the agenda.

2. The Conference shall decide whether it will take as the basis of discussion the draft amendments prepared by the International Labour Office and shall decide whether they shall be considered in full Conference or referred to a committee for report. These decisions may be preceded by a general debate in full Conference on the question or questions in respect of which a proposal for amendment has been included in the agenda.

3. If the draft amendments are considered in full Conference, each of them shall be placed successively before the Conference for preliminary adoption by a two-thirds majority of the delegates present. During the debate, and until the draft amendments have been disposed of, no motion other than a motion to amend the text of one of them or a motion as to procedure shall be considered by the Conference.

4. If the draft amendments be referred to a committee, the Conference shall, after receiving the report of the committee, proceed to discuss the text of each draft amendment in succession, in accordance with the rules laid down in the last preceding paragraph. The discussion shall not take place before the day following that on which copies of the report have been circulated to the delegates.

5. During the discussion of the draft amendments the Conference may refer one or more of them to a committee.

6. The amendments as adopted by the Conference shall be referred to the Conference Drafting Committee which shall embody them, together with any necessary consequential amendments of the unamended provisions of the Constitution, in a draft instrument of amendment the text of which shall be circulated to the delegates.

7. No amendment shall be allowed to this text, but notwithstanding this provision the President, after consultation with the three Vice-Presidents, may submit to the Conference amendments which have been handed in to the secretariat the day after the circulation of the text as revised by the Drafting Committee.

8. On receipt of the text prepared by the Drafting Committee and after discussion of the amendments, if any, submitted in accordance with the preceding paragraph, the Conference shall proceed to take a final vote on the adoption of the draft instrument of amendment in accordance with article 36 of the Constitution of the Organization.

CONSTITUTION

Amendments to this Constitution which are adopted by the Conference by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present shall take effect when ratified or accepted by two-thirds of the Members of the Organization including five of the ten Members which are represented on the Governing Body as Members of chief industrial importance in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 3 of article 7 of this Constitution.

Note concerning Standing Orders questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 85th Session

Amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference

1. Apart from the amendments to the Conference Standing Orders consequential or related to the proposed constitutional amendment with a view to enabling the Conference to abrogate obsolete international labour Conventions or Recommendations (see Provisional Record No. 1), the Governing Body has also referred to the Conference's proposed amendments to the Conference Standing Orders in relation to three separate issues. The first of these amendments concerns the procedure to be followed by the Credentials Committee for the examination of complaints with respect to the non-payment of delegates' expenses. This item was considered by the Governing Body at its 265th Session (March 1996) following which the Governing Body, on the recommendation of the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards, LILS requested the Office to submit a more complete paper on the question. At its 267th Session (November 1996), the Governing Body discussed the revised Office proposals and approved the text of the draft amendments. The second proposed amendment concerns the 72-hour time-limit for the submission of objections to credentials, and the third relates to the effect on the right to vote of late payments under arrangements for the consolidation of arrears. The Office proposals relating to these questions were examined and approved by the LILS Committee and the Governing Body at its 268th Session (March 1997).

A. Consideration by the Credentials Committee of complaints with respect to the non-payment of delegates' expenses

2. Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution provides that each of the Members will pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of its delegates and their advisers and of its representatives attending the meetings of the Conference or the Governing Body. The Credentials Committees, to which complaints alleging violation of article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution have been submitted in the past in keeping with the provisions of article 26 of the Conference Standing

Orders, have consistently considered that their mandate, as set out in the Standing Orders, provided no clear basis for action in such cases. At the same time, they have expressed the view that the failure to respect this financial obligation could affect the principle of tripartism in a way similar to non-compliance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution.

3. Thus, at the 79th Session of the Conference (1992), the Credentials Committee requested the competent bodies of the ILO to consider "the possibility of introducing an appropriate mechanism to evaluate the extent to which the obligations under article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution were being complied with".[1] In 1995, the Credentials Committee of the Conference specifically suggested that the "Governing Body should be requested to consider the possibility of amending or clarifying articles 5 and 26 of the Conference Standing Orders in a way which would set out the role and functions of the Committee with respect to such complaints of non-compliance with article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution".[2] Following these requests, the Office submitted to the Governing Body proposals for a possible amendment of the Conference Standing Orders so as to cover the consideration by the Credentials Committee of complaints of non-compliance with article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution. In formulating these proposals in the light of the previous discussions, the Office referred to the following objectives:[3]

— the proposed amendment should not be a disincentive to the appointment of advisers; in this connection, Governments pointed out that while the obligation to cover expenses extended to advisers, there was no obligation on them to appoint any advisers; and the Worker members indicated that, without the appointment of advisers, delegations could not effectively participate in the Conference;

— the primary objective should therefore be to ensure that, at the very least and as a matter of priority before making any other appointments, Members appoint and make provision for covering the expenses (for the whole period of the Conference) of the four delegates specified in article 3, paragraph 1, of the Constitution; at the same time, the amendment should avoid transforming this minimum composition into a norm;

— another important objective, stressed by the Employer and Worker members, should be to discourage unequal treatment, as between the three groups, in the numbers of advisers appointed, but (as pointed out by a Government representative) a complaints procedure should not be a "back door" to alleging that a government had appointed an insufficient number of advisers;

— due account should be taken of the financial constraints on certain governments with respect to covering the expenses of advisers and to the factor of trade union pluralism, which may often be related in the sense that it may lead countries to appointing a larger delegation than they can afford;

— the proposed amendment should not unduly increase the workload of the Credentials Committee, whose procedures should ensure that governments which were the subject of allegations of not paying expenses had a proper opportunity to reply.

[3] See GB.267/LILS/2.

4. The discussions, as reflected in the Report of the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards,[4] revealed a general agreement on the objectives underlying the proposed reform. The Employer members, for instance, stressed the importance of the constitutional provision on the payment of expenses as a cornerstone of tripartism, while the Worker members recalled that the voting strength of the groups was often affected on account of the premature departure of delegates whose expenses were not covered. For their part, most Government representatives welcomed the idea of filling the gap under the existing Standing Orders.

5. For some Government members, however, the desired parity between the advisers of each group should not be construed in absolute terms since flexibility was also necessary, and, in fact, there could be justifications for a certain imbalance especially in the case of small countries. It was also noted that although the appointment of advisers remained optional under the Constitution, this would not mean that a government was free to create unwarranted imbalance between the groups in relation to the number of advisers whose expenses were covered. The criteria for the assessment of the seriousness of the imbalance in the appointment of advisers was considered by some to need further clarification. In response to these concerns, the Office pointed out that the wording of the proposed text was sufficiently flexible to allow for occasional imbalances when reasonable or inevitable, since the conditions under which such imbalances could be considered objectionable were strictly defined: the imbalance had to be manifest, of an abnormal or serious nature, and the decision that those conditions were met had to be reached unanimously. Attention was also drawn to the fact that, because the Credentials Committee had a limited membership, it was accustomed to non-protracted deliberations and the taking of unanimous decisions. As such it was felt that neither the assessment of the seriousness of the imbalance nor the unanimity requirement would present any problem for the work of the Committee. In reply to a suggestion to amend the expression "may consider complaints" to read "shall consider complaints", it was pointed out that the proposed text was intended to reflect the fact that the Committee's primary and mandatory role under the Standing Orders was that of considering objections to credentials.

6. The Governing Body has accordingly recommended that the Conference adopt the following proposed amendments to articles 5 and 26 of the Conference Standing Orders:[5]

2. The Credentials Committee shall examine the credentials of delegates and their advisers, and any objection relating thereto, in accordance with the provisions of section B of Part II. Within the limits laid down in the said section B, the Committee may also consider any complaints of non-observance of paragraph 2(a) of article 13 of the Constitution.

ARTICLE 26

9. The Credentials Committee may consider complaints that a Member has failed to comply with paragraph 2(a) of article 13 of the Constitution, where:

(a) the Member is alleged to have failed to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of one or more of the delegates that it has nominated in accordance with article 3, paragraph 1, of the Constitution; or

(b) the complaint alleges a serious and manifest imbalance as between the number of Employers' or Workers' advisers whose expenses have been covered in the delegation concerned and the number of advisers appointed for the Government delegates.

10. A complaint referred to in paragraph 9 shall not be receivable in the following cases:

(a) if the complaint is not lodged with the Secretary-General of the Conference before 10 a.m. on the seventh day following the opening of the Conference and the Committee considers that there is insufficient time to deal with it properly;

(b) if the complaint is not lodged by an accredited delegate or adviser alleging non-payment of travel and subsistence expenses in the circumstances set out under (a) or (b) of paragraph 9 or by an organization or person acting on his or her behalf.

11. The Credentials Committee shall, in its report, present to the Conference any conclusions that it has unanimously reached on each complaint considered by it.

B. The 72-hour time-limit for the submission of objections to credentials

7. In recent years, the problem of the limited time available to the Credentials Committee to consider objections to credentials has been aggravated by the shortening of the Conference. Article 26, paragraph 4(a), provides for a 72-hour time-limit for the submission of objections which begins to run at 10 o'clock on the date of publication in the Provisional Record of the name and functions of the person to whose nomination objection is taken. The Office's current practice to publish three lists of delegations has meant that, while for the first list no problem arises with the time-limit as it is published on the morning of the day on which the Conference opens, this is not so for the second and third lists. The second list is published eight days after the first while the third list is published two days before the end of the Conference. The Office proposed to reduce that time-limit to 48 hours taking into account the fact that quite frequently objections were lodged before the names of the delegates and advisers in question had been published (and even before their credentials had been deposited) which seemed to suggest that the time-limit was not in any case to be taken to mean a prohibition on submitting objections before publication. The Office also proposed to delete the provision which allows for an extension to be accorded in case of objections concerning the delegates or advisers from a distant country and which would now appear to have lost all its relevance.

8. During the discussions of the question in the LILS Committee it was pointed out that the problem of the time-limit was due to the fact that many governments failed to respect the provisions of article 26, paragraph 1, of the Conference Standing Orders and that it was important that the work of the Credentials Committee was carried out logically and effectively. Considering that the beginning of the Conference was very demanding on delegates in terms of time, the Committee preferred to retain the 72-hour deadline for the submission of objections with regard to names appearing in the first list (Provisional List) as maintaining that deadline posed no difficulty and would not present any problem in practice. It was thus agreed to propose the adoption of the reduced deadline for the other two lists. At the same time, it was recognized that the deadline of 72 or 48 hours did not have much importance for the third list since that list was normally published two days before the end of the Conference. It was also pointed out that the purpose of the proposed amendment was not only to reduce the deadlines, but also to make it possible for objections to be submitted even before names were published, a practice which needed to be encouraged as in many cases these names were normally known in advance. This idea was adequately reflected in the text proposed by the Office, where the words "at the latest" were inserted after the words "within 72 hours".

9. The Governing Body has accordingly recommended that the Conference adopt the following amendment to article 26, paragraph 4(a), of the Conference Standing Orders:[6]

4. An objection shall not be receivable in the following cases:

(a) if the objection is not lodged with the Secretary-General within 72 hours at the latest from 10 o'clock a.m. of the date of the publication in the Provisional Record of the name and function of the person to whose nomination objection is taken: Provided that, where the name of the person is published for the first time in a revised list of the names and functions of delegates, the above time-limit shall be reduced to 48 hours [Provided that the above time-limit may be extended by the Credentials Committee in the case of objections concerning the nomination of a delegate or adviser from a distant country];

C. The effect on the right to vote of late payments under arrangements for the consolidation of arrears

10. In accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, as implemented by article 31, paragraph 5, of the Conference Standing Orders, Members who have lost their right to vote due to arrears in the payment of their contribution are permitted to vote if they have concluded a consolidation arrangement approved by the Conference under which the arrears are payable in annual instalments. The Conference decision normally permits a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contributions to vote so long as that Member was adhering to the arrangement. The present Standing Orders provision was introduced in 1979, the earlier provisions having restricted the validity of the Conference decision only to one year. The current wording requires that in order not to lose its right to vote, a Member has to settle its annual contribution and its instalment no later than the end of the year to which the payment relates. This has given rise to the awkward situation whereby a Member loses the right to vote and consequently the Conference has to repeat the procedure for the restoration of the right to vote simply because its payments arrived after the end of the year to which they related.

[6] Passages that it is proposed to delete are between square brackets whilst those to be inserted are in italics.

11. In order to avoid the time-consuming procedure involved in the restoration of the right to vote in such a case, the Office proposed that the Conference might wish to further relax its rules so that the right to vote be preserved if payment is made by the last day of the annual session of the Conference. The Office proposed an amendment to article 32, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders to that effect. The following is the relevant extracts from the report of the Committee of Legal Issues and International Labour Standards on the discussion to which this proposal gave rise:[7]

. . . .

9. The Worker members agreed with the proposed amendment to the Standing Orders, but requested clarification concerning paragraph 4 of the Office paper, which referred to the first day of the annual session of the Conference, and the text of the proposed amendment which referred to payment made at the time of the vote concerned.

10. The Employer members considered the proposed amendment reasonable and supported it.

11. The representative of the Government of Italy, while supporting the amendment, proposed that the words "shall be permitted to vote" in the text proposed by the Office should be replaced by "could be permitted to vote" as it might not be necessary to give such a Member its right to vote if there was no voting before the end of the Conference.

12. The representative of the Government of Austria agreed with the proposed changes but considered that the last sentence of the amendment proposed was obscure and confusing and should be deleted: the first sentence of the proposed amendment would permit a Member to vote if it had paid all instalments under the arrangement by the time of the vote; the last sentence, however, provided that the Member could vote if the amounts due had been paid by the close of the Conference. It therefore added nothing.

13. The Legal Adviser explained that in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, a Member which was in arrears of its contribution for the preceding two full years lost its right to vote unless the Conference had authorized that Member to vote. In order to avoid having to repeat this authorization at each session, the Conference had adopted article 32, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, under which the Member was granted the right to vote for the session of the Conference at which the decision was taken. It retained that right as long as it complied with the arrangement by 31 December of the year in which the contribution and instalments were due. The present proposal addressed two situations. First, it would enable a Member to retain the right to vote without the need for a new authorization by the Conference as long as it had made all payments due by the time of the vote concerned. In practical terms, it would only be necessary for the Treasurer to inform the Clerk of the Conference that the Member had complied with the terms of the arrangement. Since the intention was to obviate the need for the Conference to give a new authorization to vote, it was necessary to retain the words "shall have the right to vote" instead of "could have the right to vote". The second situation addressed by the proposed amendment concerned the case of a Member for which an arrangement had been approved by the Conference and which had not made the required payments by the end of the Conference of the year following that in which the payments were due. Such a Member was not only unable to vote during the current session of the Conference but would also have to request restoration of the right to vote at a subsequent Conference. This provision was necessary to avoid creating an "open-ended" situation where a Member could stop paying its current contribution and instalments for many years and still be able to recuperate automatically its voting right by making a global payment before a vote at any subsequent session. These two situations were reflected in the proposed amendments.

12. On the basis of the above, the Governing Body has accordingly recommended that the Conference adopt the following proposed amendment to article 32, paragraph 2, of the Conference Standing Orders:[8]

ARTICLE 32

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 of this article, after the Conference has approved an arrangement under which the arrears of a Member are consolidated and are payable in annual instalments over a period of years, [any decision by the Conference permitting that Member to vote shall be valid as long as the Member concerned pays both its current contributions and the instalments on its consolidated arrears during the year in respect of which they are due] the Member shall be permitted to vote provided that, at the time of the vote concerned, the Member has fully paid all instalments under the arrangement, as well as all financial contributions under article 13 of the Constitution that were due before the end of the previous year. However, if any part of the said amounts is still outstanding by the close of the annual session of the Conference in the current year, the permission to vote shall lapse.

COMMITTEE REPORTS

International Labour Conference

Eighty-fifth Session, Geneva, 1997

6(Rev.)

Reports of the Selection Committee

First report

1. Election of the Officers of the Committee

The Selection Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson:	Ms. R. Sarmiento (Philippines)
Employers' Vice-Chairperson:	Mr. A. M'Kaissi (Tunisia)
Workers' Vice-Chairperson:	Mr. W. Brett (United Kingdom).

2. Discussion of the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and the Director-General: opening date for the discussion and closing date for the list of speakers

The Selection Committee has decided that the discussion of the Reports of the Chairperson of the Governing Body and the Director-General will begin on Tuesday, 10 June, at 10 a.m., and that the list of speakers will be closed on Wednesday, 11 June at 6 p.m., under the usual conditions.

3. Plan of work of Conference committees

The Selection Committee endorsed a draft plan of work for committees, which would not be binding but would enable them, in organizing their work, to take maximum possible account of the overall needs and possibilities of the Conference. The plan is attached in tabular form for the information of the Conference (Appendix II).

4. Suggestions to facilitate the work of the Conference

(a) Quorum

As in previous years, the Selection Committee invites the Conference to confirm the following principles:

(i) the quorum is fixed provisionally, on the basis of the credentials received, in the brief report of the Chairperson of the Governing Body on the day before the opening of the Conference, which is appended to the record of the first sitting of the Conference. This provisional quorum will remain unchanged until the Credentials Committee determines the quorum on the basis of registrations, it being understood that, if an important vote were to take place in the initial stages of the Conference (once the Credentials Committee has been appointed), the Conference might request the Credentials Committee to determine the quorum in an urgent report;

(ii) thereafter, the quorum will be adjusted, under the authority of the Credentials Committee, so as to take into account new registrations and notices of departure from delegates leaving the Conference;

(iii) delegates should register immediately on arrival, since the quorum is calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered;

(iv) acceptance of appointment as a delegate implies an obligation to be available in Geneva personally or through an adviser authorised to act as a substitute for the work of the Conference until its end, since important votes often take place on the last day;

(v) delegates who are nevertheless obliged to leave the Conference before it finishes should give notice of their forthcoming departure to the secretariat of the Conference. (The form provided for indicating their date of departure also enables them to authorise an adviser to act and to vote in their place.) At group meetings held during the second half of the Conference the attention of members of the groups will be drawn to the importance of completing and handing in this form;

(vi) in addition, one Government delegate of a country may report the departure of the other Government delegate, and the Secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups may also give notice of the final departure of members of their groups who have not authorised advisers to act in their place;

(vii) when a record vote is taken in plenary while committees are sitting, delegates are both entitled and expected to leave committees to vote unless they are replaced by a substitute in plenary. Announcements are made in the committees to ensure that all delegates are aware that a record vote is about to take place. Appropriate arrangements will be made for committees meeting in the ILO building.

(b) Punctuality

The Selection Committee recommends the Conference to ask committee chairmen to start proceedings very punctually — except where a technical section has not yet completed its preliminary discussions — irrespective of the number of persons present, but on condition that votes will not be taken unless a quorum is clearly present.

(c) Negotiations

In order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees between the different groups, representatives of each group should meet with the chairperson and reporter of the committee and with the representative of the Secretary-General, whenever this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of their colleagues in the other groups; normally such meetings are held before each group has committed itself to a definite position. The function of these informal meetings is to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definite positions have crystallized.

5. Participation in Conference committees by Members having lost the right to vote

At its 239th Session (February-March 1988), the Governing Body considered the implications of the appointment, as regular members of Conference committees, of representatives of a member State which had lost the right to vote under article 13, paragraph 4 of the Constitution of the ILO. It noted that, while the appointment of employers' and workers' representatives from such a State had no practical implications, because the employers' and workers' groups operated an effective system under article 56, paragraph 5(b) of the Conference Standing Orders for ensuring that deputy members of a committee voted in the place of regular members deprived of the right to vote, the same was not true of the Government group. As a result, if a Government that has lost the right to vote is appointed as a regular member of a committee, the distribution of votes between the three groups is distorted because the weighting of votes is based on the full regular membership and in practice the Government regular members of committees who are unable to vote do not make use of the possibility afforded by article 56, paragraph 5(a) of appointing a deputy member to vote in their place.

The Governing Body accordingly recommended that, in order to avoid such distortions, members of the Government group should not apply for regular membership of committees if they were not at the time in question entitled to vote. Should this practice, which has been maintained at all sessions of the Conference since 1987, for any reason not be fully respected, the weighting coefficients in committees should be calculated on the basis of the number of Government members entitled to vote.

The Selection Committee accordingly recommends to the Conference that the calculation of weighting coefficients for votes in committees should be based on the number of regular Government members entitled to vote.

The electronic voting system takes account of this practice.

6. Request by a non-member State to be represented by a delegation of observers at the 85th (1997) Session of the Conference

The Secretary-General has received a letter dated 26 May 1997 from the Permanent Mission of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to the United Nations Office in Geneva, requesting on behalf of the Government of that country an invitation to be represented by a delegation of observers at the present session of the Conference.

The Governing Body has authorized the Director-General to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to be represented at several sessions of the Conference since the 70th (1984) Session, in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(e) of the Conference Standing Orders.

The Selection Committee recommends that the Conference authorize the Secretary-General to invite the Democratic People's Republic of Korea to be represented at the 85th (1997) Session of the Conference, in accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(e) of the Conference Standing Orders.

7. Requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations

In accordance with article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Officers of the Governing Body have decided to invite certain non-governmental international organizations to be represented at the 85th Session (1997) of the Conference, it being understood that it would be for the Selection Committee of the Conference to consider their requests to participate in the work of the committees dealing with items on the agenda in which they have expressed a particular interest.

The provision of the Standing Orders of the Conference which is relevant to such requests is article 56, paragraph 9. In accordance with that article the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the following organizations be invited to be represented in the Committees stated:

8. Composition of the Credentials Committee

The Selection Committee proposes to the Conference that the three members of the Credentials Committee should be the following:

Government member:	Mr. M. Salmenpera (Finland)
Employers' Vice-Chairperson:	Mr. Funes de Rioja (Argentina)
Workers' Vice-Chairperson:	Mr. Gray (United States).

9. Appointment of the Conference Drafting Committee

The Selection Committee recommends that, in accordance with the provisions of article 6, paragraph 1 of the Standing Orders, the Conference Drafting Committee should be composed as follows:

The President of the Conference
The Secretary-General of the Conference
The Legal Adviser of the Conference
The Director of the International Labour Standards Department
The Deputy Legal Adviser of the Conference.

10. Delegation of authority to the Officers of the Selection Committee

At its first sitting, the Conference had before it a proposal by its Officers to suspend the Standing Orders of the Conference so as to delegate to the Selection Committee the authority to approve non-controversial changes in the composition of committees and to approve non-controversial requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations; and also to authorize the Selection Committee to delegate such authority to its Officers.

Subject to the adoption by the Conference of this recommendation at its second sitting, the Selection Committee has delegated to its Officers the following functions:

(a) the approval of non-controversial changes in the composition of committees (Standing Orders, article 9(a));

(b) the approval of non-controversial requests for representation in Conference committees submitted by non-governmental international organizations (article 56, paragraph 9).

In accordance with the usual practice, the Selection Committee has also delegated to its Officers the authority to arrange the programme of the Conference and fix the time and agenda for plenary sittings (Standing Orders, article 4, paragraph 2).

The effect of this delegation of authority will be that the Selection Committee will only be called on to meet during the present session of the Conference if other substantive matters requiring a decision arise. Any such meeting will be announced in the Daily Bulletin.

11. Composition of committees

The full lists of the composition of committees are attached in Appendix III.

Signed,

R. Sarmiento
Chairperson

Geneva, 3 June 1997.

Appendix I

Description of the electronic voting system

The electronic system provides for votes (in most cases: yes, no, abstention) to be expressed by means of a keyboard on a "voting station" that will be made available to all delegates or persons empowered to vote on their behalf.

Where the electronic system is used, the subject and question to be voted on will be displayed, as well as the nature of the vote (show of hands, record vote or secret ballot) and the President or Chairperson will announce the beginning of the vote. After the President or Chairperson has made sure that all delegates have been given sufficient opportunity to record their vote in one of the voting stations available to them, the President or Chairperson will announce the closure of the vote.

Where the method of vote is by show of hands, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required.

Where a record vote is taken, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. These indications will subsequently be published together with a list of the delegates who have voted, showing how they have voted.

In the case of a secret ballot, once all votes have been registered the final voting figures will be immediately displayed and subsequently published with the following indications: total number of votes in favour, total number of votes against, total number of abstentions and the quorum as well as the majority required. There will be absolutely no access possible to individual votes nor any record of how the delegates have voted.

It is important that, as at present, delegates should have previously decided whether they or another member of their delegation will exercise their right to vote in a given case. Where more than one vote is nevertheless cast on behalf of a delegate at two different moments or from two different places, only the first vote will be recognized, whether made by a delegate, by a substitute delegate or by an adviser who has received a specific written authorization to that end. Such specific authorizations must reach the secretariat sufficiently before the opening of voting is announced so as to be duly recorded.

International Labour Conference

Provisional Record

Eighty-fifth Session, Geneva, 1997

7 (Rev.)

Credentials

Brief report submitted on behalf of Mr. Jorge Arrate Mac Niven, Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, on the credentials of delegates and advisers to the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference (Geneva, 2 June 1997).

1. The Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has the honour to present the customary report prescribed by Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

2. The composition of each delegation and the method of appointment of delegates and advisers to the sessions of the International Labour Conference are governed by Article 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization.

3. In accordance with paragraphs 8 and 9 of this Article, it is for the governments to communicate to the International Labour Office the nominations made. The Conference examines these nominations and decides, in the case of dispute, whether delegates and advisers have been nominated in accordance with Article 3 of the Constitution.

4. The Conference exercises this power in accordance with the procedure laid down in Articles 5 and 26 of its Standing Orders.

5. In particular, paragraph 2 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provides that "A brief report upon these credentials, drawn up by the Chairman of the Governing Body, shall, with the credentials, be open to inspection by the delegates on the day before the opening of the session of the Conference and shall be published as an appendix to the record of the first sitting".

6. The present report is submitted in compliance with this provision. The list given in the table below was closed on Monday, 2 June 1997 at 12.00 noon in order that it might be available for inspection by the members of the delegations that same day, that is, the day before the opening of the Conference.

7. In addition, the present report serves for fixing provisionally, in accordance with paragraph 1(2) of Article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the quorum necessary to give validity to the votes taken.

8. The table below, based on the files containing the names of the delegates and advisers and the credentials with which they have been provided or the official communications transmitted to the International Labour Office, shows the numerical composition of the Conference. It is to be noted in this regard that persons who have been nominated both as substitute delegates and as advisers, in the letters communicating the nominations, have been included among the advisers.

9. To date, 150 States have notified the names of the members of the delegations. Fifty six countries deposited the credentials within the 15-day deadline before the date fixed for the opening of the Conference, in compliance with paragraph 1 of Article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

10. On the other hand, while the Conference and the Credentials Committee have already previously insisted on the obligation which Article 3 of the Constitution imposes on governments requiring them to send complete delegations to the Conference, three countries (Chad, Equitorial Guinea and Kyrgyzstan) had only nominated Government delegates, three countries (Cuba, Kazakstan and Sao Tome and Principe) had nominated a Workers' delegate but not an Employers' delegate, four countries (Lesotho, Mali, Nigeria and Peru) had nominated an Employers' delegate but not a Workers' delegate.

11. It should be noted that in the letters or facsimiles communicating their nominations, a certain number of governments have not mentioned the employers' and workers' organizations which they have consulted and with which they have come to an agreement in appointing Employers' and Workers' delegates in accordance with paragraph 5 of Article 3 of the Constitution of the Organization or have not confirmed that they were paying the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers in accordance with paragraph 2(a) of Article 13 of the Constitution. In this regard, in order to ensure greater clarity in establishing the credentials, it would be advisable that governments use, for the nomination of delegates and advisers, the form enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum on the Conference which the Office addresses every year to member States.

12. Finally, I should like to urge delegates and advisers to register in person at the Information and Reception Desk, the quorum being calculated on the basis of the number of delegates registered.

Composition of the Conference, and quorum

13. At present 292 Government delegates, 144 Employers' delegates and 143 Workers' delegates – a total of 579 delegates are accredited to the Conference.

14. There are, in addition, 730 Government advisers, 407 Employers' advisers and 456 Workers' advisers – a total of 1593 advisers.

15. The total number of delegates and advisers who have been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organization to take part in the work of the Conference is 2172.

16. Since 26 of the States now represented are in arrears in the payment of their contributions to the Organization, those Members, under the terms of paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution, may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or any of its committees (Angola, Belarus, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Congo, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Equitorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Iraq, Kazakstan, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Republic of Moldova, Paraguay, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo and Yemen). Account is therefore not taken of 92 delegates in calculating the quorum. A further seven votes are excluded due to the incomplete non-government delegations referred to above.

17. In conformity with Article 17 of the Constitution of the Organization and with Article 20 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the necessary quorum to give a vote validity will provisionally be 240[1].

Observers

18. On the invitation of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, the Holy See has appointed an observer delegation to the Conference.

Organizations and liberation movement invited

19. The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs, invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph 1 – relating to reciprocal representation – of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organization, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialized agencies and other official international organizations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b) of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organizations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organizations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j) of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of a liberation movement invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k) of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

20. A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

First report of the Credentials Committee

1. The Credentials Committee of the 85th Session of the Conference is composed of Mr. Matti Salmenperä, Government delegate, Finland, Chairman; Mr. Daniel Funes de Rioja, Employers' substitute delegate, Argentina; and Mr. Charles Gray, Workers' delegate, United States.

Composition of the Conference

2. Since the signing of the brief report made on behalf of the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office (Provisional Record No. 7), a number of modifications have occurred in the composition of the Conference.

3. The number of member States of the International Labour Organization represented at the Conference is at present 158. To date 15 member States (Antigua and Barbuda, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Comoros, Dominica, Grenada, Guyana, Liberia, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan) have not sent a delegation.

4. The Credentials Committee paid particular attention to credentials submitted by three countries. In the case of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Committee learnt that the United Nations had been informed of the change in name and flag of that country by the Deputy Permanent Representative of the Republic of Zaire, whose status and recent participation in the General Assembly had not, to the knowledge of the United Nations Secretariat, been challenged. Similarly, the credentials for the present Conference had been issued, on behalf of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, by the Chargé d'affaires ad interim of the Permanent Mission of the Republic of Zaire in Geneva, who had been on the United Nations list of members of Permanent Missions since well before the present changes. The Committee therefore concluded that those credentials should be accepted. In the case of Sierra Leone, the Committee noted that the credentials had been issued by the elected Government before the recent coup d'état. Acceptance of those credentials was in line with statements recently made by United Nations authorities. The Permanent Mission in Geneva of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had informed the Director-General of the ILO of the composition of a delegation to the Conference. In this respect, the Committee recalled the decision of the Governing Body at its 259th Session in 1994 that no action should be taken as regards the invitation of that country to sessions of the International Labour Conference or with regard to any credentials submitted on its behalf as long as that State was not recognized by the United Nations as the continuation of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia or had not been admitted to the International Labour Organization as a new Member.

Accredited delegates and advisers

5. The total number of accredited delegates is 604, comprising 307 Government delegates, 148 Employers' delegates and 149 Workers' delegates.

6. There are 1652 accredited advisers, comprising 770 Government advisers, 409 Employers' advisers and 473 Workers' advisers.

7. The total number of accredited delegates and advisers is therefore 2256.

8. With regard to the resolution concerning the participation of women in ILO meetings, adopted by the Conference at its 67th Session in June 1981, there are 57 women among the 604 delegates accredited to the Conference and 285 among the 1652 accredited advisers. The total number of women accredited to the Conference is therefore 342, i.e. 15.2 per cent of the total number of delegates and advisers as against 16.5 per cent last year.

Registered delegates and advisers

9. The following is the present situation concerning the registration of delegates, which (in accordance with practice, approved by this session of the Conference) is the basis for determining the quorum for voting.

10. At this time the number of registered delegates is 492, comprising 258 Government delegates, 117 Employers' delegates and 117 Workers' delegates.

11. In addition, the number of registered advisers is 1278, comprising 648 Government advisers, 272 Employers' advisers and 358 Workers' advisers.

Quorum

12. Fifty-three advisers, who are substitutes to delegates who have not registered, are taken into account in calculating the voting strength of the Conference.

13. Since 28 States represented at the Conference are in arrears in the payment of their financial contributions to the Organization so as to come within the terms of paragraph 4 of Article 13 of the Constitution, these States may not at present participate in the voting in the Conference or in its committees (Afghanistan, Angola, Belarus, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chad, Congo, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Georgia, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, Iraq, Kazakstan, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Republic of Moldova, Paraguay, Rwanda, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo and Yemen). The 60 registered delegates designated by these States are hence not taken into consideration in fixing the quorum. A further seven votes are excluded since seven delegates in the incomplete nongovernmental delegations referred to below are registered at the Conference. The Committee also noted that the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya and Seychelles had been incorrectly included in the list of Member States in arrears that had been given in the Brief Report on credentials (Provisional Record, No. 7, paragraph 16) as they had recovered the right to vote respectively on 7 and 18 April 1997.

14. At the present time the quorum required to give a vote validity is 239.[1] The Committee appeals to delegates present at the Conference to register as soon as they arrive so that the quorum will be as nearly exact as possible and that their presence can be taken into account in its calculation.

Incomplete delegations

15. The Committee notes that, at the present time, the delegations of seven countries (Afghanistan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Equatorial Guinea, Georgia, Kyrgyzstan and Rwanda) are exclusively governmental. Three countries (Chad, Kazakstan and Sao Tome and Principe) have a Workers' delegate but not an Employers' delegate. Two countries (Lesotho and Mali) have an Employers' delegate but not a Workers' delegate. The Committee wishes to affirm once again the necessity for governments to comply with the requirement of Article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference. The Committee recalls that pursuant to a decision of the Governing Body, the Director-General each year requests the governments of all member States which did not send complete tripartite delegations to the Conference to indicate the reasons for their failure to do so, and that the information received in reply to that request is duly communicated to the Governing Body.

16. The Committee also notes that there is some imbalance between the number of advisers to the delegates of each group and also between the number of Employers' and Workers' advisers. It once again urges governments to take greater account, when nominating delegations, of the proportions in the composition of the Conference envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 3 of the Constitution. The Committee further recalls the request contained in the resolution concerning the strengthening of tripartism in the overall activities of the International Labour Organization, adopted by the Conference in 1971, and expresses the hope that Governments will accord equal treatment to each of the groups when appointing advisers to their country's delegation to the International Labour Conference. The Committee recalls in this connection the obligation of Members under Article 13, paragraph 2(a), of the Constitution, to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of their delegates and advisers and trusts that this obligation will be respected for the whole duration of the Conference.

Observers

17. In addition to the observer delegation mentioned in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body, an observer delegation from the Democratic People's Republic of Korea is attending the Conference.

Organizations and liberation movement invited

18. The Conference is also being attended by:

- representatives of the United Nations and some of its organs invited by virtue of Article II, paragraph (1) – relating to reciprocal representation of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organization, which came into effect on 14 December 1946;
- representatives of specialized agencies and other official international organizations, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(b), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of non-governmental international organizations with which consultative relations have been established, invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of other non-governmental international organizations also invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(j), of the Standing Orders of the Conference;
- representatives of a liberation movement invited in conformity with Article 2, paragraph 3(k), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

19. A list of these representatives is appended to the List of Delegations published as a Supplement to the Provisional Record of the Conference.

Objections

20. To date, the Committee has before it a number of objections or communications concerning the credentials of certain delegates and advisers. It has forthwith commenced its examination. The Committee considers that its work has been facilitated by the presentation of a substantial number of credentials by the beginning of the Conference. It is also important that governments utilise the suggested form for credentials of delegates, enclosed with the letter of convocation and the Memorandum communicated to governments every year prior to the session of the Conference. In order to comply with article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution, it would be necessary that Governments provide exact information on the employers' and workers' organizations consulted in nominating Employers' and Workers' delegates and advisers as well as on the organizations which have agreed to such nominations.

[1] i.e., half the total number of registered delegates (492), after adding 53 substitute delegates and subtracting the number of delegates not entitled to vote on account of arrears (60) and the number of incomplete non-governmental delegations (7).

21. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Second report of the Credentials Committee

Composition of the Conference

1. Since 5 June 1997, when the Committee adopted its first report, there have been changes in the composition of the Conference. The delegation of Lesotho is fully tripartite now that the Workers' delegate has been nominated. The Democratic Republic of the Congo, whose delegation was exclusively governmental, has nominated a Workers' delegate but not an Employers' delegate, while Gambia has nominated an Employers' delegate but not a Workers' delegate. It is also interesting to note that among the 174 Member States of the Organization, 143 Ministers of Labour will have taken part this year at the Conference. The total number of delegates and advisers accredited to the Conference is 2285, of which 2019 have registered to date. Details concerning the number of delegates and advisers who are registered at the Conference at this time is contained in the annex to this report.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Brazil

2. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Brazil submitted by the Central Geral dos Trabalhadores (CGT-Brasil). The objecting organization considered that it had been marginalized by the Government as far as the ILO Conference was concerned, although it had participated in the Ministerial Conference of the World Trade Organization in Singapore. The objecting organization considered that it should have been included in the Workers' delegation to the Conference.

3. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, the substitute Government delegate of Brazil indicated that her Government did not intervene in the nomination of the Employers' and Workers' delegation to the Conference and that the Ministry of Labour transmitted to them every year the convocation to the Conference received by the Government from the ILO. The last attempt by the Government to include a representative from the CGT-Brazil in the Workers' delegation at the 1993 Conference had been categorically opposed by the other trade union centres on the ground that the CGT-Brazil did not fulfil the criteria for being a representative organization. She referred to a similar case examined by the Committee at the June Session of the Conference last year which had been rejected for lack of evidence. She concluded that the nomination had been made in accordance with the consultation procedures provided for in Article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution and had taken into account the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body according to which the determination of the most representative trade unions should always be based on objective and pre-established criteria so as to avoid any opportunity for partiality or abuse.

4. Responding orally to questions asked by the Committee, Mrs. Gomes dos Santos, Director of International Relations of the Ministry of Labour, accompanied by a member of her delegation, stated that she did not have available all the necessary data, and that in any event, it was difficult to quantify the representative character of each of the central organizations considering that the number of trade unions belonging to a central organization or the total number of their affiliated members did not necessarily reflect their representative character. She referred, for example, to an independent sectoral trade union at the regional level in Brazil which was one of the largest trade unions in terms of numbers in all of Latin America. Of the six central organizations in Brazil, three were represented in the tripartite national councils, (Confederacão Geral dos Trabalhadores (CGT), Central Força Sindical and Central Unica dos Trabalhadores (CUT)) because of their representative character which was confirmed by their affiliation to international organizations like the ICFTU and ORIT. In response to a question concerning the consultation procedure followed, the representative of the Government of Brazil explained that the central trade union organizations decided among themselves on the composition of the Workers' delegation and that the role of the Government was limited to nominating the persons proposed by them. Since the return to democracy in Brazil, the Government no longer interfered in the nominations. She added that the inclusion on two occasions of a representative of the objecting organization in the Workers' delegation had been politically motivated and did not reflect its representative character.

5. The Committee noted that the objecting organization had not presented any evidence in support of its objection. It had not even provided any evidence that it had protested to the Government concerning its non-inclusion in the Workers' delegation. In the absence of any data from the objecting organization concerning its representative character, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection.

6. At the same time, the Committee considered that it was the Government's obligation to nominate the Workers' delegation in consultation with the most representative Workers' organizations in the country. The Government could not simply leave the nomination to the organizations concerned. In order to be able to take a decision on such nomination, the Government must be able to apply criteria to determine the representative character of the organizations. In this regard, the Committee recalled the conclusions reached by the Credentials Committee on last year's objection to the Workers' delegation of Brazil, in which it had referred to the duty of the Government to take all reasonable steps to evaluate the representative character of the different organizations.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde

7. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Cape Verde submitted by the União Nacional dos Trabalhadores de Cabo Verde - Central Sindical (UNTC-CS). The objecting organization maintained that since May 1994 the government had unilaterally decided upon a rotation system with regard to the participation of the Workers' delegation to the International Labour Conference. An independent survey had been conducted by a research company which showed that the UNTC-CS represented 85 per cent of unionized workers in the country while the Confederação Caboverdiana dos Sindicatos Livres (CCSL) represented only 15 per cent of such workers. The Government had not contested the survey and in view of the considerable difference in terms of affiliated members between the two trade union centres, the titular Workers' delegated should have come from the UNTC-CS.

8. In a written statement to the Committee made at its request, Mr. José Antonio Mendes Dos Reis, Deputy Minister to the Prime Minister and Head of the Delegation to the Conference, stated that prior to 1990 the trade union organizations had been a creation of the one-party regime. Since the return to democracy in 1991, two trade union centres and a number of independent trade unions had been established in the country. The reply indicated that there were no reliable data concerning the representative character of the two centres and that each claimed to be the most representative in the country. Both centres were represented on the Social Coordination Council and the National Council on Employment and Training. Both of them were consulted on the nomination of the Workers' delegation and direct negotiations had taken place on 15 April 1997 but no agreement had been reached between them on a rotation system. Since 1994, the Government had observed the inability of the two centres to reach an agreement and had decided to nominate the delegate from each of the centres on an alternating basis. Considering that the conflict was between the two centres and not between them and the Government, the Deputy Minister requested the ILO to act as a mediator.

9. Responding orally to questions asked by the Committee, Mr. Carlos Gonçalves, Director General of Labour and Government delegate to the Conference, explained that although his Government knew of the existence of the private survey, there were reasons to doubt its validity. The survey had been commissioned by the UNTC-CS and had only covered the two main islands and not islands where the hotel industry was in the development stage and the least developed ones in which agriculture was the primary activity. Furthermore, the survey excluded some sectors of the labour force of the country, such as the civil service which is made up of 12,000 employees in a country of approximately 310,000 inhabitants. Due to the absence of an agreement between the two centres and the financial limitations of the Government to send a representative from each organization every year, the Government had nominated a representative from only one centre as the Workers' delegate. The Government was prepared to carry out a study on the representative character of the centres, but it had in the meantime concentrated its efforts, although unsuccessfully, on trying to get the two centres to reach an agreement on rotation in order that they could participate in the International Labour Conference.

10. The Committee considered that in order to meet the obligation of Article 3, paragraph 5 of the Constitution, the Government needed to evaluate the representative character of the various centres in the country, especially in those cases where there was no agreement between the organizations concerned. It was however encouraged by the constructive attitude of the Government and, in particular, its efforts to get the two centres to reach an agreement and its willingness to proceed with an evaluation of their representive character. Taking these considerations into account as well as the absence of reliable information, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Peru

11. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Peru submitted by Mr. J.L. Risco Montalván and Mr. J.J. Gorritti Valle, President and General Secretary respectively of the Confederación General de Trabajadores de Perú (CGTP). The objecting organization stated that the Government of Peru had vetoed Mr. Gorritti Valle as Workers' delegate thereby ignoring the proposal made by the central trade union organizations in Peru which had unanimously proposed his name, in a letter dated 27 May 1997. The decision of the Government not to include the CGTP, which was the largest central organization in the country, in the Workers' delegation of Peru was politically motivated. Because of the failure to take into account the unanimous proposal of the trade union movement of Peru, the nomination of the Workers' delegate was not in accordance with the Constitution and principles of the ILO.

12. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. Jorge González Izquierdo, Minister of Labour and Social Promotion, stated that by letters of 14 May 1997 his Ministry had requested all the registered national Workers' confederations that were not affected by internal conflicts and whose Governing Bodies were duly established to provide three names of candidates for nomination as Workers' delegate to the 85th Session of the Conference. These confederations comprised the objecting organization, together with the Central Autónoma de Trabajadores (CATP), the Confederación de Trabajadores Democráticos del Perú (CTDP) and the Confederación Sindical Nacional (CSN). The objecting organization had submitted only one name. The others had each submitted three names, and the Workers' delegate had been nominated from the list proposed by the CATP. The Minister added that a Coordinadora de Centrales Sindicales, which brought together the objecting organization, the CATP, the Confederación de Trabajadores del Perú (CTP) and two other organizations had, on 19 May, made its own proposal for the Workers' delegation: a representative of the CTP as delegate and two representatives of the objecting organization and one representative of the CATP as advisers. The Coordinadora was not registered with the administrative authority and the delegate whom it had proposed belonged to an organization facing an unresolved internal conflict. The Coordinadora had sent a new communication to the Ministry (the letter of 27 May attached to the objection) proposing a representative of the objecting organization as delegate, but by that time it had been too late to modify the terms of the Resolución Suprema adopted on 1 June 1997 approving the composition of the delegation.

13. Clarifications requested by the Committee were provided orally by Ms. R. Tincopa, Government delegate of Peru. She confirmed that the various Workers' organizations could not be compelled to provide figures concerning the number of their members, although certain minimum numbers were established for the purposes of recognition. She also confirmed that there had in practice been a system of rotation which could not be applied this year, because the organization whose turn it was to propose the Workers' delegate was in a state of internal conflict. Because of similar conflicts, the delegate proposed in the first communication of the Coordinadora could not be nominated, and its second communication had arrived too late. The selection had therefore been made from one of the organizations that had provided three names as requested.

14. The Committee considered that, faced with the inapplicability of the rotation system, the Government should have based its decision on a comparison of the representative character of each of the organizations concerned, and regretted that the Government apparently applied no criteria for assessing representativity. It was surprised by the absence of figures concerning the number of members covered by the organizations or even of the unions affiliated to them, as it was clearly in the interest of the organizations to provide information of this kind in order for their relative representativity to be recognized. In the absence of such data, one possibility would have been to adhere to the rotation system as closely as possible, but this had clearly not been done as the Workers' delegate was the same person as at last year's Conference in June, and the choice this year should logically have fallen on the objecting organization. The Committee concluded that the procedure for the nomination of the Workers' delegate had not been in conformity with Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. It did not however propose invalidation of his credentials as there was no basis for determining the representative strength of the various Workers' organizations in Peru.

Objections concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Suriname

15. The Committee had before it objections concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegate of Suriname, submitted by the Suriname Trade and Industry Association (VSB) and by the Employers' Group of the Conference. According to the objections, the Government had ignored the candidate of the VSB in favour of a candidate from the Suriname Manufacturers' Association (ASFA), which could not be considered to be the most representative organization if regard were had to such factors as number of workers covered, the contribution to GDP and the position of the VSB as the central employers' organization representing all sectors of Suriname's economy. In a letter of 21 May 1997 to the Minister of Labour, reproduced as an attachment to the VSB's objection, the VSB had referred to a previous proposal by it for the rotation of the nomination between ASFA and itself, which was no longer valid due to ASFA's rejection of it. The objectors therefore requested invalidation of the credentials concerned.

16. In a written communication sent to the Committee at its request, Mr. E.G. Snijders, Minister of Labour and head of the delegation of Suriname, stated that he had consulted both ASFA and VSB on the nomination of an Employers' delegate, appealing to their boards to agree on a nomination. The VSB, however, had refused to discuss the matter. In the absence of any agreement by 21 May, two days after the deadline for submitting credentials, he had appointed the nominee of ASFA having regard to the solution for rotation that had been found four years before. Last year the Employers's delegate had been proposed by the VSB.

17. At the Committee's request further information was provided to it by the Minister of Labour, orally. On the question of the comparative representativity of the two Employers' organizations, the Minister stressed that both had been treated at the same level, as they both played a very important role in economic activity: VSB (which several years ago had been the only representative Employers' organization) included about 250 companies in its membership; and ASFA, about 175 companies. VSB was controlled by a few big companies, in mining and banking, whereas ASFA covered local industry. It should be noted that the Employers' delegate, who had also been nominated as Employers' delegate in 1995, was a member of both organizations. The Government believed in joint development and hoped that the two organizations could agree on a single candidate. However, eventually time constraints had forced the Government to make a choice, and it had done so on the basis of the rotation solution. In this connection, the Minister confirmed that the Board of ASFA had not signified its acceptance of a proposal for a rotation system of this kind.

18. The Committee considered that the Government had acted in conformity with Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution in so far as it had encouraged the two organizations to seek agreement on the nomination of the Employer's delegate. However, when it had become clear that no agreement could be reached, the Government should not have based its decision on the rotation solution. As credentials committees had consistently stated, while a system of rotation could be a useful method for obtaining the agreement of the most representative organizations on the composition of the Employers' or Workers' delegation, it should under no circumstances be imposed by the Government. Since no such agreement was in force in the present case, the Government should have appointed the Employers' delegate in agreement with the more representative of the two organizations, which - in the absence of more detailed information on such questions as the number of workers covered by each organization - appeared to be the VSB.

19. While the Committee consequently had serious doubts as to the validity of the credentials of the Employers' delegate, it decided not to propose invalidation this year having regard to the contacts made by the Government to obtain agreement between the VSB and ASFA and trusting that the present selection process would be corrected so as to conform to the ILO Constitution.

Late objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Togo

20. The Committee received an objection from the Union nationale des syndicats indépendants du Togo (UNSIT) concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Togo. The names of the members of that delegation appeared in the Provisional List published as a supplement to the Provisional Record of 3 June 1997. Since this communication was received by the Office on 10 June, and therefore after the 72-hour time-limit provided for in Article 26, paragraph 4(a) of the Conference Standing Orders, the Committee agreed that it was not receivable.

Communication concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of New Zealand

21. The Committee took note of a letter addressed to the ILO Director-General by the New Zealand Trade Union Federation, criticizing the nomination of the Workers' delegation of New Zealand, but stating that the Federation did not wish to formally challenge the credentials of the Workers' representatives from New Zealand. Accordingly, the Committee considered that it had no competence to treat it as an objection and therefore abstained from expressing an opinion on its substance.

22. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Third report of the Credentials Committee

Composition of the Conference

1. Since 13 June 1997, when the Committee adopted its second report, there has been no change in the total number of member States represented at the Conference. The number of delegates and advisers who have registered at the Conference at this time is contained in the table annexed to this report. To date, a total number of 2283 delegates and advisers are accredited to the Conference with 2025 having been registered at this time.

Objection concerning the nomination of a Workers' adviser of Bangladesh

2. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of one of the advisers in the Workers' delegation of Bangladesh. It was signed by Mr. Sadaquatual Bari, in the capacity of President of the Bangladesh Workers' Federation (BWF). According to the objection, Mr. Kutub Uddin Ahmed, who had been nominated by the Government as Workers' adviser was using the name of the BWF and the title of General Secretary, although he had no right to represent the BWF as he had been expelled for engaging in activities against that organization, its constitution and the interests of workers. He had managed to ensure his inclusion in the Workers' delegation by manipulation. His credentials should be declared invalid.

3. In a preliminary written response to the Committee's request for information, Mr. Shahidul Islam, substitute Government delegate, stated that the BWF had been registered in 1992 with Mr. Kutub Uddin Ahmed as General Secretary. On 29 December 1995 the Central Committee of the BWF had divided into two groups, one had Mr. Kutub Uddin Ahmed as General Secretary, and the other had Mr. Sadaquatual Bari as President. When the Government had held consultations on the nomination of a Workers' adviser, Mr. Kutub Uddin Ahmed's group had replied without any objection from Mr. Sadaquatual Bari. The objector's committee was not recognized by the Registration Authority as it had changed its address without the Authority's approval, which was not the case with the group headed by the Workers' adviser.

4. Having been unable to obtain information from any other source, the Committee considered that it could not reach any conclusions in this unsettled situation. It therefore decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Guinea

5. The Committee had before it an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Guinea, submitted by the Union Syndicale des Travailleurs de Guinée (USTG). The objecting organization alleged that, although it was the most representative Workers' organization in the country, the Government had arbitrarily excluded it from the Workers' delegation. During the preparatory meeting held on 8 May 1997 under the chairmanship of the Minister of Employment and the Civil Service, it had been decided that three trade union centres, including the USTG, would be represented at the International Labour Conference. At the last minute, because of its support for the teachers' strike in April 1997, the Government had decided to exclude the USTG from the delegation.

6. In a written communication sent to the Committee at its request, Mr. Germain Doualamou, Minister of Employment and the Civil Service, explained that in conformity with the constitutional obligations, the Government had nominated the Workers' delegate in agreement with the most representative Workers' organization, the Confédération Nationale des Travailleurs de Guinée (CNTG). In order to increase the representativity of the delegation, he had taken the initiative to nominate advisers from two other central trade union organizations. This practice of nominating one or two advisers, within the limits of the financial resources available, had been followed since 1995. The USTG had participated in the Conference in 1996, but this year the choice had fallen on other central trade union organizations.

7. For lack of further evidence, the Committee could not accept the USTG's claim that it was the most representative Workers' organization in Guinea. Over the past years, the CNTG had provided the Workers' delegate without any other organization claiming to be more representative than it. At the same time the Committee had doubts as to whether the Government had applied any criteria to assess the representativity of the organizations to be consulted on the nominations and as to whether such organizations had in fact been consulted, especially as far as the advisers were concerned. Since, however, there was no corroboration of the existence of the claimed agreement of 8 May that the delegation should include the USTG, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of India

8. The Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the workers' delegation of India submitted by the National Front of Indian Trade Unions (NFITU). According to the objecting organization, a consensus had been reached among the trade union organizations according to which the titular delegate would come from the Bhartiya Mazdoor Sangh (BMS), which had the largest verified membership, while seven advisers would be selected from the remaining seven recognized central trade union organizations (CTUOs). Since the Government had only nominated five advisers from four CTUOs, it had acted in violation of the consensus and thereby discriminated against the NFITU and the two other CTUOs.

9. In a written communication to the Committee made at its request, Mr. P.M. Sirajuddin, Director, Ministry of Labour, provided statistical data on the verified membership of the central trade union organizations in the country. He indicated that the Government had consulted as many central trade union organizations as possible and had invited eight of them (representing 80 percent of trade union membership in the country) to a meeting on 13 May to decide on the composition of the Workers' delegation to the Conference as the trade unions had not provided the Government with an agreed list of their representatives. The trade unions had been informed that the delegation should be comprised of one titular delegate and five advisers. In response to a request made at the 13 May meeting, the Government had agreed to include six advisers. The delegate and one adviser had come from Bhartiya Mazdoor Sang, which had the largest trade union membership; two advisers had been nominated from the second largest organization – the Indian National Trade Union Congress – while the remaining three advisers had been nominated from among the next three largest central trade union organizations. He thus concluded that the Government had undertaken the consultations required under the ILO Constitution.

10. Noting the absence of any evidence to substantiate the objecting organization's claim that there were to be seven advisers, chosen from different central trade union organizations, and of any other evidence concerning an agreement on the precise composition of the Workers' delegation, the Committee concluded that the delegation had been nominated in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution and accordingly decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Lebanon

11. The Committee had before it an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Lebanon submitted by the Confédération Générale du Travail au Liban (CGTL). The objecting organization alleged that the Government had formed an "official" delegation composed of members imposed on the CGTL with police force during a rigged electoral scenario on 24 April 1997. In addition, the Minister of Labour had refused to receive a letter from the CGTL proposing names for the Workers' delegation at the International Labour Conference. The objecting organization contested the nomination and the representative character of the "official" delegation. The CGTL was the sole organization that was representative of workers in Lebanon. It had a legitimate and elected leadership, headed by Mr. Elias Abou Rizk, which was recognized by all Arab and international instances.

12. In a written communication made to the Committee at its request, Mr. Samir Aoun, Head of the Lebanese delegation at the Conference, confirmed that the CGTL was the most representative Workers' organization in Lebanon. However, on 24 April 1997 the CGTL had elected a new Executive Bureau. This election had been contested by a minority of members, represented by the former President of the CGTL, who claimed that the authorities had intervened in the election. They had brought proceedings in the national courts for the suspension of the election, which had been dismissed. The legitimate leadership of the CGTL had then brought criminal proceedings against Mr. Abou Rizk for usurping the title of President and for seizing authority. The Government had complied with the ILO Constitution, by appointing the Workers' delegation in agreement with the most representative organization. Indeed, it had gone further by asking the CGTL, represented by its legitimate leadership, to name the Workers' delegates and advisers. The Government submitted supporting documentation and requested the Committee to reject the objeection, because it was in violation of Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution, and the relevant Lebanese law.

13. Having regard in particular to the proceedings that had recently been instituted in the national courts, the Committee considered that it could not reach any conclusions in this unsettled situation. It therefore decided not to uphold the objection.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chad

14. The Committee had before it an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chad submitted by the Confédération Syndicale du Tchad (CST). The objecting organization stated that the Government had consulted only one Workers' organization, and had made its nomination from that organization, without consulting the two other central trade union organizations, which included the CST. At the time when there had been five central trade union organizations, the Minister of Labour had used two methods: either he requested the organizations to meet with a view to reaching consensus on a Workers' delegate; or each central trade union organization participated on a rotation basis. The present practice of the Government to designate members of the same central trade union organization to participate each year in the Conference imposed a de facto monopoly to the detriment of freedom of association and trade union democracy. Furthermore, no criteria had been established for defining the concept of most representative Workers' organization. The objecting organization considered that the nomination of the Workers' delegation should be made by rotation among the three central trade union organizations.

15. While regretting that the Government had not responded to the Committee's invitation to comment on the objection, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection. Article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution did indeed imply that Governments should consult all the most representative Workers' organizations, and endeavour to obtain agreement on the nomination of the Workers' delegation, and it was only in the absence of agreement on a nomination or a rotation system, that the Government should make the nomination on the proposal of the organization or organizations that had the greatest representativity. However, in the present case, the Committee had not been provided with sufficient evidence to determine whether or not the objecting organization should be considered as one of the most representative Workers' organizations in Chad.

Communication concerning the Government delegation of India

16. The Committee had before it a communication from the Employers' Group of the Conference, addressed to the Secretary-General of the Conference, alleging that the Government of India had breached the principles of independence of the Groups and tripartism by including, as an adviser in the Government delegation to the Conference, a well known activist in trade union circles.

17. The Government, which had been invited to make observations before the matter was submitted to the Committee, explained, in a written communication from Mr. P.M. Sirajuddin, Director, Ministry of Labour, that the adviser concerned was a social activist, who had been extensively involved in the work of liberation and rehabilitation of child and bonded labour as well as with the mobilization and organization of other categories and sub-categories of unorganized labour, including contract labour. He had been included in the Government delegation in order to facilitate the delegation's understanding of the issues involved in the light of the situation obtaining in India.

18. The Committee considered that its competence did not extend to examining the substance of communications of this kind, and therefore did not express an opinion on the subject.

19. This report was adopted by the Credentials Committee unanimously. It is submitted to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Fourth report of the Credentials Committee

Objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Djibouti

1. The Committee had before it two objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Djibouti. One was submitted by the Intersyndicale UDT/UGTD, and the other by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). According to the objecting organizations, the Union démocratique des travailleurs (UDT) and the Union générale des travailleurs djiboutiens (UGTD) together constituted 70% of the active workforce in the formal sector and thus formed the most representative central trade union organization in the country. In violation of article 3, paragraph 5 of the ILO Constitution, the Government had included no representative of this joint Intersyndicale in the Workers' delegation at the Conference. Without consulting the UDT or the UGDT, it had appointed as Workers' delegate the President of the Congrès djiboutien du travail (Codjitra) whose establishment had been engineered by the Government in its campaign against the UDT and the UGDT and which represented no trade union or any group of organized workers.

2. In a written communication sent to the Committee in response to its request, Mr. O.R. Daach, Minister of Labour and Professional Training, stated that the UDT had not deposited a copy of its statute with the local administrative authorities and was accordingly not recognized by the administration. The mandate of the officers of the UGTD had expired on 10 March 1997, but they refused to submit to the voting by the members. The representativity of that organization was therefore not known and there was no duly authorized body to discuss matters with the Ministry of Labour. Furthermore it was difficult to consult the two organizations as they refused any dialogue and did not respond to the invitations for dialogue that were sent to them. Codjitra, on the other hand, had gone through the administrative processes required by law and was also more representative than the other two organizations, in terms of membership.

3. The Committee requested the Government delegation of Djibouti at the Conference to make a representative available to provide further information to it orally with respect to the two objections. However, no representative came to the Committee at the time proposed by it.

4. Information was provided to the Committee orally by Mr. Adan Mohamed Abdou, General Secretary of the UDT and spokesperson for the Intersyndicale, accompanied by Mr. Guy Ryder, Director of the ICFTU Office in Geneva. Mr. Abdou confirmed that the information relating to affiliation and membership of the two organizations had been provided to the Ministry of Labour since 1995, at the time of the first Congress of the Intersyndicale, at which representatives of the ILO, the UNDP, the ICFTU and the Ministries of Labour and Home Affairs had participated. Since its first Congress, the Intersyndicale had deposited its statutes three times with the Ministry of Labour although the Government claimed to be unaware of this as the Minister of Labour had changed three times. Under the Labour Code, if there was no response within 15 days from the deposit of the statute, the organization was deemed to be legally established. In any case, the recognition of both central organizations had been confirmed in a Government decree (attached to the ICFTU's objection) and by their participation in national tripartite committees, such as the Pensions Committee. Nevertheless, over the last year the Government had attempted to discredit the two organizations, treating them as subversive and dismissing their leaders from employment. This campaign had included the creation of Codjitra, composed of officials of the Ministry of Labour, which published articles in the press attacking the protest actions of the independent organizations.

5. The Committee noted that the objecting organizations had provided it with documentation in support of many of their allegations, whereas the Government had only provided, as evidence of the alleged invitations for dialogue, communications that were dated 3 June 1997, the first day of the Conference. The Committee considered it unfortunate that the Government had not responded to its invitation to provide further information on the objections. As it was, the evidence indicated that the Workers' delegate had been chosen from the organization that was closely linked to the Government, in preference to the Workers' organizations that appeared to be indisputably the most representative in Djibouti, in clear violation of Article 3, paragraph 5, of the ILO Constitution. The Committee unanimously considered that the credentials of the Workers' delegate of Djibouti should be invalidated. It decided however not to make a proposal to that effect since invalidation would have no practical consequence as neither a Workers' nor an Employers' delegate had been registered, and bearing in mind the Conference's present workload.

Objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Lesotho

6. The Committee had before it an objection concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Lesotho submitted by the Lesotho Trade Union Congress (LTUC). According to the objection, as it was the most representative Workers' organization in Lesotho the LTUC had been invited by the Government on 19 May to propose one of its representatives for nomination as the Workers' delegate at the Conference. It had duly made a proposal and the Government had confirmed that its representative would be nominated. However, following consultations on 29 May, to which the LTUC had not been invited, the Government had gone back on its decision and had nominated a representative of the Lesotho Federation of Democratic Unions (LFDU). The reason given was that, under a claimed agreement of 1995, the LFDU and the LTUC were to participate in the Conference on an alternating basis. The objecting organization denied that any such agreement had been concluded.

7. In a written communication made, in response to the Committee's request, on behalf of Mr. T. Mohapeloa, Government delegate at the Conference, it was explained that following a split in the Lesotho Labour Congress in 1994, there were two main Workers' organizations, the LTUC and LFDU, and a significant number of trade unions that were not affiliated to either of them. The Government had tried to assess their respective representativity by reference to the membership returns submitted to the registrar of trade unions. But the results had proved unreliable. In 1995 at a meeting in the Office of the Minister, the two federations had agreed that representation at meetings would be by rotation until they were able to agree on forming a single centre. The LFDU had provided the Workers' delegate for the 1995 Conference and the LTUC had done so for the 1996 Conference. In 1997 it had been agreed that the LTUC would represent the workers at the SADC Conference in Pretoria. The nomination of a Workers' delegate at the present Conference from the LFDU was thus in line with the rotation agreement, and did not result from the 29 May meeting to which the objecting organization had referred. The invitation to LTUC to propose a representative this year had been made in error. As a result of a mission from the International Labour Office, the Government had decided to embark on an exercise to verify the trade union returns. Upon completion, the findings would be published.

8. The Committee found no evidence of any agreement relating to rotation, as stated by the Government. The agreement was supposed to have been concluded in the Office of the Minister of Employment and Labour and to have been the basis for the nomination of an LFDU representative at the 1995 Conference; and yet, when that nomination was objected to by LTUC at that Conference, the statement made to the credentials committee in writing by the Labour Commissioner of Lesotho contained no reference to any agreement on rotation. In the absence of such an agreement, the Government should have held consultations with both federations with a view to their reaching agreement on the nomination in this particular case. Failing agreement, it should have taken a decision on the basis of the proposal made by the more representative of the two organizations. Since, however, in the absence of reliable figures for assessing representativity, the Government had given equal treatment to the two organizations as far as participation in the Conference was concerned, the Committee decided not to uphold the objection. The Committee was furthermore encouraged by the Government's decision to undertake the necessary work to ensure the correctness of the figures for trade union membership and affiliation.

Payment of travel and subsistence expenses of delegations

9. The Committee received a communication from the Employers' Group signed by its Secretary, Mr. Costas Karpatis, expressing deep concern at the number of cases in which governments, in violation of their obligation under article 13, paragraph 2(a) of the Constitution, did not bear the travel and subsistence expenses of their Employers' delegation to the Conference. A survey carried by the Employers' secretariat, in which 122 employers delegates participated, revealed that 11 Employers' delegates and 51 Employers' advisers did not have their expenses paid, while 34 Employer delegations did not have their expenses paid for all members present at the Conference. The communication referred specifically to the cases of two governments (Lebanon and Peru) which had, for many years, systematically ignored their obligations to pay the expenses of their delegations. Two Employers' organizations (in Chad and Rwanda) had asked the Group to report that the governments concerned had failed to pay their expenses resulting in their absence. The Group welcomed the adoption of the amendment to the Standing Orders of the Conference and hoped that at the next Conference, these changes would give to the Credentials Committee the means to ensure that Governments complied with their constitutional obligation.

10. The Committee noted the information provided. Considering the time available to it, it was not able to invite comments from the Governments on the two complaints lodged and therefore expressed no opinion as to their substance. It however also noted that the amendments to the Standing Orders to the Conference which had just been adopted by the Conference would permit it in future to examine such complaints if they are lodged within seven days following the opening of the Conference. It suggested that the new provisions should be highlighted in the information provided to governments for the next Conference.

11. The Committee also took note of the information compiled by the Secretariat from the information provided by Governments in the Form for Credentials for the Conference. This year, the Governments of 73 Member states (as against 64 last year) had responded to the request for information when they issued the credentials of their delegations. Fifty three of those Governments (as against 55 last year) had declared that they had paid the expenses of their whole delegation, and 20 (instead of 9 last year) had said that they only covered the expenses of some members of their delegations or only part of the expenses of the delegations.

12. The Committee expressed the hope that with the coming into force of the new procedure of complaints concerning non-payment of expenses, more governments would comply with their constitutional obligation to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of their full tripartite delegation as this obligation was at the heart of tripartism.

13. This report was adopted by the Credentials Committee unanimously. It is submitted to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference[1]

1. The Committee had before it three sets of proposed amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference which the Governing Body had referred to the Conference (Provisional Record No. 2). The first dealt with the consideration by the Credentials Committee of complaints with respect to the non-payment of delegates' expenses, the second with the time-limit for the submission of objections to credentials and the third with the effect on the right to vote of late payments under arrangements for the consolidation of arrears.

A. Consideration by the Credentials Committee of complaints with respect to the non-payment of delegates' expenses

2. The Legal Adviser explained that neither the Constitution nor the Standing Orders of the Conference contained procedures for verifying the compliance with the obligation incumbent upon Governments by virtue of article 13, paragraph 2(a) of the Constitution of the ILO to pay the travel and subsistence expenses of the delegates and advisers of their tripartite delegations. Experience had shown that not all member States fulfil that obligation. The Credentials Committee had indeed received in the past complaints alleging the non-fulfilment of the obligation under article 13, paragraph 2(a) of the Constitution, but had considered that it had no express mandate to deal with them. However, it considered that the non-compliance with this obligation could affect respect for tripartism in ways similar to non-compliance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution and it requested the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to examine the possibility of introducing an appropriate mechanism. On the basis of that request, the Governing Body considered that the Credentials Committee was the most appropriate body to examine such complaints and recommended that the Conference amend its Standing Orders so as to empower the Credentials Committee to deal with them. The proposed amendments reflect the concern of the Governing Body that the procedure should ensure respect for the constitutional requirements to appoint and pay the expenses of four delegates, but not go so far as to dissuade governments from appointing advisers through fear of complaints to the Credentials Committee. As a result, the authority proposed to be conferred upon the Credentials Committee would have to be exercised taking into account the objectives of ensuring, on the one hand, that Members appoint and make provision for covering the expenses of the tripartite delegation provided for in article 3, paragraph 1, of the Constitution and, on the other hand, that a certain balance is maintained in the number of advisers appointed to each of the three groups for whom the government pays travel and subsistence expenses.

3. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed full support for the proposed amendments which were not only the outcome of a thorough and in-depth discussion in the Governing Body of the ILO but, in particular, a final and concrete response to a request made by the Credentials Committee to address a matter on which it was often called upon to act. He noted that the only possibility open to the Credentials Committee under the present Standing Orders was to take note of such complaints.

4. The Worker Vice-Chairperson also supported the proposed amendments and recalled the consensus reached at the Governing Body in recommending the adoption of the proposed amendments. He stressed the importance of balanced representation.

5. In the absence of further comments, the Committee recommends to the Conference that it adopt the following amendments to articles 5 and 26 of its Standing Orders:

2. The Credentials Committee shall examine the credentials of delegates and their advisers, and any objection relating thereto, in accordance with the provisions of section B of Part II. Within the limits laid down in the said section B, the Committee may also consider any complaints of non-observance of paragraph 2(a) of article 13 of the Constitution.

ARTICLE 26

9. The Credentials Committee may consider complaints that a Member has failed to comply with paragraph 2(a) of article 13 of the Constitution where:

(a) the Member is alleged to have failed to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of one or more of the delegates that it has nominated in accordance with article 3, paragraph 1, of the Constitution;

(b) the complaint alleges a serious and manifest imbalance as between the number of Employer or Worker advisers whose expenses have been covered in the delegation concerned and the number of advisers appointed for the Government delegates.

10. A complaint referred to in paragraph 9 shall not be receivable in the following cases:

(a) if the complaint is not lodged with the Secretary-General of the Conference before 10 a.m. on the seventh day following the opening of the Conference and the Committee considers that there is insufficient time to deal with it properly;

(b) if the complaint is not lodged by an accredited delegate or adviser alleging non-payment of travel and subsistence expenses in the circumstances set out under (a) or (b) of paragraph 9 or by an organization or person acting on his or her behalf.

11. The Credentials Committee shall, in its report, present to the Conference any conclusions that it has unanimously reached on each complaint considered by it.

B. The 72-hour time-limit for the submission of objections to credentials

6. The Legal Adviser briefly introduced the proposed amendment to article 26, paragraph 4(a) of the Standing Orders of the Conference by noting that it was aimed at adapting existing time-limits to the reduced duration of the Conference. The proposed amendment would facilitate compliance with time-limits and would give the Credentials Committee more time for the consideration of objections submitted after the publication of the second and final lists. He recalled that, contrary to the initial proposal by the Office to reduce the time-limit to 48 hours in respect of all three lists, the proposal placed before the Conference on the basis of the consensus reached at the Governing Body was to maintain the 72-hour time-limit for the submission of objections in respect of the first list, and to shorten it to 48 hours in respect of objections against nominations published in the revised and final lists.

7. The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons fully supported on behalf of their respective groups the proposed amendment before the Committee, which would contribute to the efficiency of the work of the Credentials Committee.

8. The Committee therefore recommends to the Conference that it adopt the following amendment to article 26, paragraph 4(a) of its Standing Orders:

4. An objection shall not be receivable in the following cases:

(a) if the objection is not lodged with the Secretary-General within 72 hours at the latest from 10 o'clock a.m. of the date of the publication in the Provisional Record of the name and function of the person to whose nomination objection is taken; provided that, where the name of the person is published for the first time in a revised list of the names and functions of delegates, the above time-limit shall be reduced to 48 hours [Provided that the above time-limit may be extended by the Credentials Committee in the case of objections concerning the nomination of a delegate or adviser from a distant country];

C. The effect on the right to vote of late payments under arrangements for the consolidation of arrears

9. The Legal Adviser explained that the proposed amendment to article 32, paragraph 2 of the Conference Standing Orders was aimed at facilitating the work of the Conference and avoiding superfluous procedures. Its purpose was to prevent a State, which had lost its right to vote under article 13, paragraph 4 of the Constitution but recovered it pursuant to article 32, paragraph 2 of the Conference Standing Orders, from losing its right to vote again by missing, even by a few days, the deadline of 31 December of each year for the payment of its contributions and instalments on arrears. The aim was to give such a State a period of grace up to the Conference following the year in which the payments were due, by allowing it to retain its right to vote if it has paid the amounts due by the time the vote is taken without having to go through the procedure for restoring its right to vote. However, after the period of grace, a State which has still not paid the amounts due at the end of the Conference session finally loses its right to vote and will again have to go through the procedure laid down in article 31 of the Standing Orders in order to recover it the following year.

10. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated that his group agreed with the proposed amendment, which would permit the avoidance of cumbersome procedures. He suggested however that the last sentence of the amendment should be worded to reflect more clearly what had been decided by the Governing Body. To this end he proposed an amended text for this last sentence, which might read as follows: "For any Member which, at the close of a session of the Conference, has not fully paid all such instalments and contributions due before the end of the previous year, the permission to vote shall lapse."

11. The Government member of Italy agreed that it was necessary to allow a period of grace to States which had entered into an arrangement, but wondered whether it should not expire at the moment of the vote without waiting for the end of the Conference.

12. The Legal Adviser considered that the text proposed by the Employer Vice-Chairperson would to some extent provide an answer to the question put by the Government member of Italy, to the extent that it might be due to an ambiguity in the text. Indeed, the first part of the amendment, according to which "The Member shall be permitted to vote provided that, at the time of the vote concerned, the Member has fully paid all instalments due under the arrangement, as well as all financial contributions under article 13 of the Constitution that were due before the end of the previous year", gives a Member the possibility of paying and taking part in the vote even if it is taken at the last moment of the Conference. The last sentence of the amendment to article 32, paragraph 2, as proposed in Provisional Record No. 2 might give the impression that it too was referring to the Member which had paid its dues before the vote. In fact, this sentence was dealing with the case of a Member which had not paid in full right up to the end of the Conference and had thus not been able to take part in the votes at the Conference. Its objective was to stipulate that such a Member's permission to vote lapsed at the close of the Conference. The text proposed by the Employer Vice-Chairperson to replace this part of the amendment clarified its meaning by making it clear that two different situations were involved.

13. The Worker Vice-Chairperson approved on behalf of his group the proposed amendment as well as the explanations of the Legal Adviser concerning the two situations that it covered.

14. The Chairperson noted that there was consensus in the Committee to recommend to the Conference that it adopt the proposed amendment to article 32, paragraph 2 of its Standing Orders appearing in Provisional Record No. 2 as subamended by the Employer Vice-Chairperson. This text reads as follows:

ARTICLE 32

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 of this article, after the Conference has approved an arrangement under which the arrears of a Member are consolidated and are payable in annual instalments over a period of years, [any decision by the Conference permitting that Member to vote shall be valid as long as the Member concerned pays both its current contributions and the instalments on its consolidated arrears during the year in respect of which they are due] the Member shall be permitted to vote provided that, at the time of the vote concerned, the Member has fully paid all instalments under the arrangement, as well as all financial contributions under article 13 of the Constitution that were due before the end of the previous year. For any Member which, at the close of the session of the Conference, has not fully paid all such instalments and contributions due before the end of the previous year, the permission to vote shall lapse.

International Labour Conference

Eighty-fifth Session, Geneva, 1997

Seventh item on the agenda: Proposed amendment to the Constitution to add a new paragraph to article 19 so as to enable the Conference to abrogate obsolete international labour Conventions and consequential or related amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference

First report of the Constitutional Amendment and Standing Orders Committee

1. The Constitutional Amendment and Standing Orders Committee, set up by the Conference at its first sitting on 3 June 1997, held a sitting on 4 June 1997, and a further sitting on 6 June to adopt its report. It was composed of 132 members (83 Government members, 11 Employer members and 38 Worker members).

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson and Reporter: Mr. Bro-Matthew Shinguadja (Government member, Namibia).

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. Daniel Funes de Rioja (Employer member, Argentina) and Mr. Khurshid Ahmed (Worker member, Pakistan).

3. The Committee had before it the Note concerning the proposed amendment to the Constitution to add a new paragraph to article 19 so as to enable the Conference to abrogate obsolete international labour Conventions and consequential or related amendments to the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference (Provisional Record No. 1) as well as a Note concerning Standing Orders questions placed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office before the Conference at its 85th Session (Provisional Record No. 2).

4. The Chairperson suggested that the Committee should examine the two sets of questions in the order they had been submitted, and asked accordingly the representative of the Secretary-General (the Legal Adviser) to introduce first the purpose, scope and effects of the proposed constitutional amendment.

Proposed constitutional amendment to enable the Conference to abrogate obsolete Conventions and consequential or related Standing Orders amendments

5. The Legal Adviser stressed the importance of the draft constitutional amendment recalling for those members of the Committee who were not familiar with the work of the Working Party of the Committee on Legal Issues and Labour Standards that the Governing Body had been discussing this matter in two consecutive sessions. The importance of the constitutional amendment consisted in the fact that it might facilitate considerably, if adopted, the task of the Organization of bringing up to date the body of labour standards. The Legal Adviser went on to say that, although of crucial importance, the exercise should none the less not be considered as radical, neither from the point of view of the legal principles involved nor as regards its practical modalities of implementation. As regards its implications from the viewpoint of principles, the proposal was designed in essence to confirm that the power to abrogate was the corollary of the power to adopt, and that the organ which was entitled to adopt international labour Conventions should also have the authority to abrogate them when they no longer served to promote the objectives of the Organization. Indeed, in the early years of the Organization some considered that this was the position, since international labour Conventions were not like other treaties but were designed to form a body of international labour law.

6. However, the ILO Constitution contained no provisions on the power to abrogate (indeed it was also silent on the conditions for the entry into force of Conventions). After a long doctrinal debate and much hesitation, the Conference finally decided in 1929 that it could not recognize that it had the power to abrogate Conventions at least when they were already in force, to the extent that these instruments created "contractual" obligations between States which had ratified them. This conclusion was subject to two qualifications: first, the same difficulty did not exist as regards Conventions not yet in force precisely because they had not created contractual obligations. Although at that time the term "abrogation" was used in this context also, in the present exercise, to avoid confusion, it had been decided to describe this second hypothesis, i.e., the abrogation of a Convention not yet in force, by the term "withdrawal". The second qualifying element in the conclusions reached in 1929 was the recognition that, if a Convention gives the Conference the power to do so, the Conference could take measures affecting the legal effects of a Convention in force, and since that time each Convention provides that a revising Convention may close it to further ratification and that ratification of the revising Convention constitutes automatic denunciation of the Convention concerned.

7. Notwithstanding this solution, however, some difficulties persisted; for instance, the legal effects of a Convention in force could only be limited by adopting a revising Convention, and even then, its legal effects could not be fully eliminated (e.g. right to file representations and complaints under articles 24 and 26 of the Constitution even though the Convention was omitted from official publications). This was the reason why the Working Party on Policy regarding the Revision of Standards concluded that it was the appropriate time to confer authority on the Conference to deal more effectively with the problem of obsolete international labour standards which no longer contributed to achieving the objectives of the Organization. Among several options presented by the Office, the Working Party ultimately decided that the best method was that of a constitutional amendment.

8. Even though the entry into force of such an amendment would be subject to the condition of ratification provided for in article 36 of the Constitution, the Governing Body was confident that ratifications should be forthcoming as the reform would be in everybody's interest since it would contribute to alleviating the burden on member States and the ILO itself. It was also the most logical solution since it was designed to make explicit something which had been considered at the outset, at least by some, as an inherent power of the Conference.

9. From the viewpoint of modalities of application, the amendment was also far from being a radical step. It merely provided a tool; it was an enabling provision which could not and did not prejudge in any way the use which the Conference might decide to make of it with regard to a specific Convention. Moreover, the procedure under which an abrogation could be decided was accompanied by strict guarantees. Thus, a Governing Body decision to place the question on the agenda had to be taken by consensus, failing which a four-fifths majority was required so that no action would be possible against the will of any of the three groups. Furthermore, once the matter was placed on the agenda of the Conference, the procedure to be followed — as specified in draft articles 11 and 45bis of the Conference Standing Orders and article 12bis of the Governing Body Standing Orders — was basically the same as that laid down for the adoption of a Convention.

10. The Legal Adviser finally noted that the procedure would also apply to Recommendations in the same way as to Conventions which were not in force. Thus, Conventions not in force and Recommendations could be withdrawn under exactly the same conditions and following the same guarantees applicable to the abrogation of Conventions, the only difference being that there would be no need for the Conference to wait until the constitutional amendment entered into force.

11. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed full support for the proposed constitutional amendment since it allowed the Conference to proceed to eliminate international labour instruments whenever it became manifest that they no longer contributed to the attainment of the Organization's objectives. He also emphasized the importance of reaching a consensus before a proposal for abrogation was placed on the agenda of the Conference and invited all three groups to pledge commitment to the principle that no decision on such a sensitive and important matter should be made at the expense of one of the groups.

12. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reminded the members of the Committee that the proposed amendment was the fruit of intense and detailed discussions which resulted in a balanced, carefully worded text. He further considered that the draft amendment came as the right response to a real problem and was a working tool which had to be supported by tripartite consensus. Bearing this in mind, the Employers' group expressed its unreserved approval for the amendment to the Constitution and the consequential Standing Orders amendments.

13. The Government member of Italy while agreeing with the rationale of the proposed amendment, expressed some reservation as to the effects of abrogation on member States which had ratified a Convention declared obsolete. Contending that, if the analogy between abrogation and adoption were true, the former should also be subject to ratification, he suggested that an additional provision should be inserted to the effect that ratifying States might freely decide on the follow-up which they would give to an abrogated Convention in their reciprocal relations.

14. The Government member of Switzerland welcomed the constitutional amendment. Even though abrogation might raise some problems for Swiss legislation, this was a matter for the Swiss internal legal order. Most importantly, the draft amendment carried a strong political message in the sense that the Organization should be given the means at last to set aside the dead wood in so far as its standard-setting function is concerned. As to the proposal of the Government member of Italy, he felt that the Conference should not seek to settle all possible questions in this amendment.

15. The Government member of Panama, recalling national practice and past experience, approved entirely the proposed amendment.

16. The Government member of Sweden expressed her satisfaction that the proposals of the Working Party were now before a Conference Committee with a view to adoption, all the more so as these proposals offered yet another tool beyond those of "dormancy" and "shelving" used thus far. In reply to the question raised by the Government member of Italy, she recalled that the Working Party had looked thoroughly into concerns of that nature, and devoted lengthy discussions as to the possibility of a "contracting-out" clause. Concerning the time-limits provided for in draft article 45bis, she suggested that it might be advisable for the Committee to review those time-limits in order to bring them in line with those prescribed in article 38 of the Conference Standing Orders so as to give the Office more time to prepare its second report.

17. The Government member of Japan, while expressing his support for the general direction of the proposed amendment, shared to some extent the concern expressed by the Government delegate of Italy and requested the secretariat to provide if possible further explanation on the relationship between the draft amendment and Article 54 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties.

18. With reference to the question raised by members of the Committee on the effects of abrogation on relations between States which had ratified the abrogated Convention, the Legal Adviser recalled the reason why the Governing Body had considered that it was not necessary to include an "opting-out" clause enabling ratifying States to remain bound by the Convention. This was because abrogating an obsolete international labour Convention did not as such affect the national legislation which might have been adopted following the ratification of that Convention. There should also be no doubt that abrogation did not prevent two or more members States from deciding to continue to apply inter se the abrogated Convention which would no longer be an ILO Convention. The sole effect of abrogation was to eliminate the legal effects vis-à-vis the Organization and other parties, and this explained why the Working Party did not consider it necessary to provide for contracting-out.

19. In reply to the question relating to the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, the Legal Adviser stated that Article 54 of the Convention provided that a treaty could be terminated, among other means, in conformity with its terms. An international labour Convention was a treaty adopted within the framework of and by reference to another treaty, namely the ILO Constitution. He further drew attention to Article 5 of the Vienna Convention, which provided that that Convention applied to a treaty which was the constituent instrument of an international organization, and to any treaty adopted within an international organization "without prejudice to any relevant rules of the organization" (emphasis added). The Vienna Convention thus referred back to the constitutional system and practice of the Organization. He also noted that in fact the ILO had been instrumental in the adoption of this provision in order to safeguard in particular its practice relating to reservations to international labour Conventions. Therefore, once the Constitution contained a provision on abrogation, the Vienna Convention would be respected. As to the point made in relation to the time-limits in article 45bis, the Legal Adviser considered that the Office should normally have no problem in respecting those limits since the questionnaire would not be complicated and the replies of member States were expected mostly to indicate to what extent the Convention was still serving a useful purpose and to be short and straightforward. He suggested, therefore, to put the procedure to the test as it now appeared in the proposed amendment. It would be a simple matter to revise it at a later stage should this prove necessary.

20. The Employer Vice-Chairperson observed that the reservations and questions raised by various Government members had all been discussed and dealt with in the Working Party, and it was reassuring that no new problems had been raised which had not already been examined. He reaffirmed the conviction of the Employer members that the proposed amendment was in conformity with existing texts and practices, that it was a logical mechanism and that it had been the fruit of laborious discussions within the Governing Body.

21. The Government member of Italy declared he was satisfied and reassured by the explanations furnished by the Legal Adviser. The Government member of the United States stated that his delegation had intended to raise some of the questions put by the Government member of Japan. He expressed his appreciation of the explanations given and asked that they be recorded in the report.

22. The Government member of Japan raised a query as to whether, from a practical point of view, member States should be allowed some time, for example one year, in order to repeal domestic legislation pursuant to a Conference decision to abrogate a Convention.

23. In reply to this point, the Legal Adviser felt that it was in essence covered by the response given previously to the Government member of Italy, and stressed once more that the fact that a Convention was abrogated did not mean that national legislation adopted pursuant to the abrogated Convention, if maintained, could be in violation of any obligations towards the ILO. In other words, abrogation terminated the obligations of ratifying States resulting from the Convention vis-à-vis the Organization, but did not oblige those States to repeal domestic legislation which might have been adopted following the ratification of the Convention now abrogated. As there was no obligation to act, there was no question of any time-limit.

24. The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that the issues raised in the Committee had been dealt with in the Governing Body Working Party, and the Governing Body itself emphasized that there had been a tripartite consensus in respect to all three proposed changes, i.e. in the Constitution, the Standing Orders of the Conference and of the Governing Body. This meant that this was a package with three strictly interrelated elements and thus could not be changed only in one part.

25. Before proceeding to the adoption of the amendments, the Government member of Japan stated that he was not yet in a position to support the adoption of the amendments, until he had reported back to his capital and received an instruction.

26. In the light of the foregoing, the Committee recommends that the Conference amend article 19 of the Constitution by adding the following new provision as paragraph 9:

CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

. . . .

9. By a majority of two-thirds of the votes of delegates present, the Conference, acting on a proposal of the Governing Body, may abrogate any Convention adopted in accordance with the provisions of this article if it appears that the Convention has lost its purpose or that it no longer makes a useful contribution to attaining the objectives of the Organization.

27. The Committee further recommends that the Conference adopt the following amendment to article 11, paragraph 1 of its Standing Orders and the following new article 45bis:

STANDING ORDERS OF THE CONFERENCE

ARTICLE 11

1. The procedure for the consideration of proposed Conventions and Recommendations, as well as the procedure for the abrogation[1] or withdrawal of such instruments adopted by the Conference, shall be governed by the rules concerning Convention and Recommendation procedure set forth in section E of Part II.

Article 45bis

Procedure to be followed in the event of the abrogation[1] or withdrawal of Conventions and Recommendations

1. When an item to be placed on the agenda of the Conference concerns the abrogation of a Convention in force or the withdrawal of a Convention which is not in force or of a Recommendation, the Office shall place before the Governing Body a report containing all relevant information which the Office possesses on this subject.

[1] Only applicable upon the entry into force of the Instrument of Amendment to the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, 1997.

2. When an item on abrogation or withdrawal is placed on the agenda of the Conference, the Office shall communicate to all governments, so that it reaches them 18 months before the session of the Conference, a short report and questionnaire requesting them to indicate within a period of 12 months their position, along with the reasons therefor, on the subject of the said abrogation or withdrawal, along with the relevant information. This questionnaire shall request governments to consult the most representative employers' and workers' organizations before preparing their final replies. On the basis of the replies received, the Office shall draw up a report containing a final proposal which shall be distributed to governments four months before the session of the Conference.

3. The Conference may decide to examine this report and the proposal which it contains directly in a plenary sitting or send it to the Selection Committee. At the end of this examination in the plenary or in the light of the report of the Selection Committee, as appropriate, the Conference shall decide by consensus or, failing that, by a preliminary vote by a two-thirds majority to submit the formal proposal for the abrogation or withdrawal of the instrument to a final vote. This record vote shall take place no earlier than the day following the preliminary decision.

International Labour Conference

Provisional Record

15A

In accordance with the decision taken by the Conference at its 16th Sitting on 17 June 1997, the Conference Drafting Committee examined the amendments to the Conference Standing Orders in addition to the amendment to the Constitution contained in Provisional Record No. 10 and made certain drafting improvements which have been incorporated in the text below:

STANDING ORDERS OF THE CONFERENCE

1. The procedure for the consideration of proposed Conventions and Recommendations, as well as the procedure applicable to the abrogation[1] of a Convention in force or to the withdrawal of a Convention that is not in force or of a Recommendation, shall be governed by the rules concerning Convention and Recommendation procedure set forth in section E of Part II.

Procedure to be followed in the event of the abrogation[1] or withdrawal of Conventions and Recommendations

1. When an item to be placed on the agenda of the Conference concerns the abrogation of a Convention in force or the withdrawal of a Convention that is not in force or of a Recommendation, the Office shall place before the Governing Body a report containing all relevant information which the Office possesses on this subject.

2. When an item on abrogation or withdrawal is placed on the agenda of the Conference, the Office shall communicate to the governments, so as to reach them not less than 18 months before the opening of the session of the Conference at which the item is to be discussed, a short report and questionnaire requesting them to indicate within a period of 12 months their position, along with the reasons therefor, on the subject of the said abrogation or withdrawal, along with the relevant information. Second item on the agenda: Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions

First report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 5 and 6 June 1997 with Mr. P. Etiang (Uganda) as Chairman and Reporter and Mr. A. Ducreux (Panama) as Vice-Chairman.

Requests for permission to vote in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization

2. The representative of Canada observed that the Committee was about to deal with several requests for the right to vote. Member States facing financial difficulty should of course be given every encouragement to put forward concrete proposals for the payment of arrears of contributions, but once such a plan was adopted by this Committee and by the Conference it should be adhered to. It was disappointing that two of the requests before the Committee were from member States which had made repeated applications over the years for permission to vote. If their requests were approved this time they should honour the terms of the arrangement, otherwise their voting rights should be suspended.

3. The representative of Nigeria felt that the statement by the previous speaker was too severe. The Committee should not prejudge the efforts of member States to pay their arrears of contributions and he hoped that other members of the Committee would take a more lenient view than that of the Canadian representative.

Request by the Government of Cape Verde

4. The Committee had before it a request (document F.C./D.2) from the Government of Cape Verde for permission to vote at the Conference. This request was referred to the Finance Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. The text of the request, dated 10 April 1997, is as follows:

The Office of the Assistant to the Prime Minister

Praia, 10 April 1997

Mr. Director-General,

I have the honour to inform you that the Government of the Republic of Cape Verde intends to settle its contributions in arrears to the International Labour Organization in order to recuperate its right to vote and to participate actively in the activities of the Organization.

I would like to assure you of Cape Verde Government's desire to remain faithful and committed to the objectives of the International Labour Organization, and that the delay in payment of its contribution is due, on the one hand, to the economic difficulties and, on the other, to the priority that our Government has had to give to its policy to combat the persistent drought which unfortunately plagues our country.

That being so, and in order to overcome this constraint, I would like to submit the following arrangement[1] for your consideration:

- our country will pay its 1997 contribution of 33,822 Swiss francs in full;
- the accumulated contributions for 1993 to 1996 amounting to 132,241 Swiss francs will be paid in 20 equal annual instalments of 6,612.05 Swiss francs. We further propose that the payment of this amount begin in 1998.

On behalf of the Government of Cape Verde, I would ask Your Excellency to submit this request for the approval at the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference so that our country can recuperate its right to vote and enjoy other rights as a Member of the Organization.

In the hope that our proposal will meet with your understanding, I assure you, Mr. Director-General, of my distinguished consideration.

(Signed) José António Dos Reis.

5. The Committee noted the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the ILO, also articles 31 and 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the texts of which appear in Appendix I to this report.

6. In examining the financial relations between Cape Verde and the Organization for the preceding ten years, the Committee noted that Cape Verde had made the following payments to the ILO in respect of assessed contributions:

Date of payment	Amount	Details of payment
3 June 1987	US$25 079	Full 1985 and 1986 contributions
21 June 1988	US$12 657	Full 1987 contribution
15 May 1989	US$16 243	Full 1988 contribution
28 May 1991	SF34 053	Full 1989 contribution
10 February 1992	SF29 000	Full 1990 contribution and part of 1991 contribution
15 February 1995	SF60 269	Balance of 1991 contribution and full 1992 contribution

[1] Figures proposed have been amended in the draft resolution at the end of this report to reflect the actual situation after consultation with the Government.

Contributions outstanding at 31 December 1996 amounted to 130,790 Swiss francs, which represented the contributions due from 1993 to 1996 inclusive.

7. The Committee, being satisfied that the failure of Cape Verde to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reports to the Conference as follows:

(a) The Committee finds that the failure of Cape Verde to pay in full the amounts owing was due to conditions beyond its control, as explained in the letter appearing in paragraph 4 above.

(b) The financial relations between Cape Verde and the Organization have been set out in paragraph 6 above.

8. The Committee accordingly recommends the adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the granting to Cape Verde of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Request by the Government of Paraguay

9. The Committee also had before it a request (document F.C./D.3) received from the Government of Paraguay for permission to vote at the Conference, which also was referred to the Finance Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

10. The text of the request, dated 23 May 1997, is as follows:

Ministry of Justice and Labour,
Asunción, Paraguay

Asunción, 23 May 1997

Mr. Director-General,

I am pleased to inform you that our arrears and contribution have now been deposited. Therefore, and in keeping with the relevant provisions, I request that if possible we again be granted the right to vote at the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference.

In accordance with the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference, I would ask you kindly to submit this request to the Finance Committee at your earliest convenience.

I look forward to receiving a positive reply, and in the meantime remain,

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Sebastian Gonzalez Insfran,
Minister of Justice and Labour.

11. The Committee noted the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the ILO, also articles 31 and 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the texts of which appear in Appendix I to this report.

12. In examining the relations between Paraguay and the Organization for the preceding ten years, the Committee noted that the International Labour Conference at its 78th (1991) Session adopted an arrangement proposed by the Government of Paraguay for the settlement of the arrears of contributions due for the period of 1956-90 of 1,174,753 Swiss francs.

13. Under the terms of the arrangement, Paraguay was to:

(a) pay in full its 1991 contribution in 1991 together with its contribution due to the Working Capital Fund (WCF) of the Organization of 2,625 Swiss francs;

(b) continue to pay in subsequent years its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;

(c) settle the arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1990, amounting in total to 1,174,753 Swiss francs, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of 58,738 Swiss francs and a final instalment of 58,731 Swiss francs, beginning in 1991.

14. Since the adoption of the arrangement, Paraguay has made the following payments to the ILO in respect of its assessed contributions:

Date of payment	Amount	Details of payment
19 July 1991	SF2 625	Contribution to the WCF
11 October 1991	SF28 413	Part 1991 instalment
30 December 1991	SF112 379	Balance of 1991 instalment and part of 1991 contribution
13 January 1992	SF8 872[1]	Balance of 1991 contribution and part of 1992 instalment
19 March 1992	SF70 649	Balance of 1992 instalment and part of 1992 contribution
2 April 1992	SF6 417	Part of 1992 contribution
23 April 1992	SF73 904	Balance of 1992 contribution and part of 1993 instalment
8 January 1993	SF114 698	Balance of 1993 instalment and full 1993 contribution
24 December 1993	SF130 434	Full 1994 instalment and contribution and part of 1995 instalment
18 January 1995	SF67 674	Balance of 1995 instalment and part of 1995 contribution
20 November 1995	SF57 327	Balance of 1995 contribution and part of 1996 instalment
19 December 1996	SF61 600	Balance of 1996 instalment and part of 1996 contribution
7 May 1997	SF81 874	Balance of 1996 contribution and part of 1997 instalment

[1] Following this payment, the 79th (1992) Session of the Conference granted Paraguay permission to vote, which had been lost because of non-payment of the 1991 contribution in full in 1991.

15. In 1996, Paraguay was due to pay the instalment against its arrears of 58,738 Swiss francs and its 1996 net contribution of 32,268 Swiss francs totalling 91,006 Swiss francs. By 31 December 1996, Paraguay had paid in full its 1996 instalment of 58,738 Swiss francs and 7,842 Swiss francs of its 1996 net contribution leaving a shortfall of 24,426 Swiss francs. In accordance with paragraph 2 of article 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, any decision by the Conference permitting a Member to vote shall be valid as long as that Member pays both its current contribution and the instalment on the consolidated arrears during the year in respect of which they are due. Paraguay thus lost the right to vote since it did not pay its full 1996 contribution in 1996.

16. As noted in the letter referred to above, Paraguay made a payment in 1997 of 81,874 Swiss francs which covered the balance of the 1996 contribution, and a partial payment against the 1997 instalment. It had therefore fulfilled the terms of the arrangement approved by the Conference.

17. The Committee accordingly recommends that the Conference adopt the resolution concerning the granting to Paraguay of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Request by the Government of the Dominican Republic

18. The Committee also had before it a request (document F.C./D.4) received from the Government of the Dominican Republic for permission to vote at the Conference. This was referred to the Finance Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

19. The text of the request, dated 26 May 1997, is as follows:

Dominican Republic
Secretary of State for Labour

Santo Domingo, 26 May 1997

Dear Director-General,

I have the honour to inform you that on 23 May 1997, instruction was given to have US$223,180 transferred to International Labour Office account No. 0312735-024 with City Bank, Zurich, Switzerland, comprising US$200,000 in payment of arrears of contributions to the International Labour Organization and US$23,180 in payment of the contribution for 1997.

I wish to assure you of the Dominican Government's endorsement of the objectives and principles of the International Labour Organization and to state that it is only for economic reasons stemming from a major fiscal crisis that the Dominican Republic has been unable to pay its contributions for the past years.

In order to regularize its situation and regain its right to vote and participate actively in the International Labour Organization's various bodies, the Dominican Government respectfully requests that you submit to the Organization's competent authorities the following proposal for the settlement of its arrears of contributions:

(a) The Dominican Republic will settle its arrears of contributions that have accumulated up to the end of 1996 (1985-96) by payment of five (5) equal annual instalments of 145,000 Swiss francs, and a final payment representing the balance of the arrears due, with the first annual instalment being due in 1998.

(b) In subsequent years, the Dominican Republic will pay the amount corresponding to each year of its pro rata contribution.

I would further request that you transmit to the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference my Government's request that it be permitted to vote and enjoy other rights in the Organization in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution of the ILO.

Yours faithfully,

(Signed) Dr. Rafael Alburquerque,
Secretary of State for Labour.

20. The Committee noted the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the ILO, also articles 31 and 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the texts of which appear in Appendix I to this report.

21. In examining the relations between the Dominican Republic and the Organization for the preceding ten years, the Committee noted that under a financial arrangement approved by the 63rd (1977) Session of the Conference, the Dominican Republic was to:

(a) pay in 1977 its contribution for the year 1977 in full;

(b) continue to pay its current contributions in full in the year for which it is due;

(c) settle the arrears that had accumulated up to and including 31 December 1976, amounting in total to US$266,286, by the payment of 19 equal annual instalments of US$13,314 beginning in 1977 and a final instalment of US$13,320.

22. Between 1977 and 1984, the Dominican Republic complied with the terms of the arrangement by paying a total of US$330,853 covering both the contributions and instalments due for the period. However, the right to vote was again lost in January 1986 when the 1985 contribution and instalment remained unpaid. Accordingly, the outstanding contributions due by the Dominican Republic fall into two parts. The first part covers contributions from 1970-76, amounting to 279,603 Swiss francs, and the second part covers contributions from 1985-96, amounting to 874,152 Swiss francs. Total contributions outstanding as at 31 December 1996 therefore equal 1,153,755 Swiss francs.

23. The amount outstanding at 31 December 1996 is in excess of the equivalent of the assessed contributions of the Dominican Republic for the two preceding years. Therefore, under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution, the Dominican Republic is not entitled to vote unless the Conference should decide, in accordance with that article, to grant permission to vote.

24. The Government of the Dominican Republic now proposes a new financial arrangement that would regularize its contributions and allow it to actively participate in the activities of the Organization. As a demonstration of this commitment, the Dominican Republic made a payment of 314,126 Swiss francs on 27 May 1997 towards its proposed arrangement (equivalent of US$223,180 as stated in the letter quoted above). Should the Conference adopt the proposal of the Government of the Dominican Republic, this amount could be applied against arrears (280,515 Swiss francs) and in payment of the 1997 contribution (33,611 Swiss francs), as described in the resolution at the end of this report.

25. The Committee, being satisfied that the failure of the Dominican Republic to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reports to the Conference as follows:

(a) The Committee finds that the failure of the Dominican Republic to pay in full the amounts owing was due to conditions beyond its control, as explained in the letter appearing in paragraph 19 above.

(b) The financial relations between the Dominican Republic and the Organization have been set out in paragraphs 22 to 24 above.

26. The Committee accordingly recommends the adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the granting to the Dominican Republic of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Request by the Government of Djibouti

27. The Committee also had before it a request (document F.C./D.7) received from the Government of Djibouti for permission to vote at the Conference. This was referred to the Finance Committee as a matter of urgency in accordance with paragraph 1 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

28. The text of the request, received on 5 June 1997, is as follows:

Mr. Director-General,

I have the honour to inform you that the Government of Djibouti would like to recuperate its voting rights in the International Labour Organization (ILO), and at the same time would like to make a proposal to settle its contributions in arrears.

The Government of Djibouti hereby reaffirms its commitment to the aims and objectives of the ILO and would like to take part fully in its work.

We should like to point out that Djibouti's non-payment of contributions is due to the following reasons of force majeure:

- civil war between 1991 and 1994, settled in 1995;
- an unprecedented economic crisis.

In order to restore the economic and financial situation in Djibouti, a round table was held in Geneva on 29 and 30 May 1997, bringing together Djibouti, donors and international organizations. This meeting was a success for my country. However, the financial and economic difficulties currently facing Djibouti do not permit it to settle its contributions in arrears with a single and immediate payment.

The Government of Djibouti therefore requests your assistance in submitting the following proposal for the settlement of contributions in arrears to the competent authorities of the ILO:

(a) Djibouti has already made a payment to the International Labour Office of 101,466 Swiss francs, representing a little less than half of our contributions in arrears.

(b) Djibouti will pay its current contribution every year.

(c) Djibouti would like to settle its contributions in arrears over a period of five years. During the first four years, from 1998 to 2001, Djibouti will pay 28,270 Swiss francs each year, and in 2002 Djibouti will pay the balance of 28,272 Swiss francs.

We thus intend to settle our arrears, which currently amount to 209,207 Swiss francs.

In the hope that you will kindly submit this request to the International Labour Conference so that my Government may participate in the voting of the 85th Session of the Conference, I assure you, Mr. Director-General, of my distinguished consideration.

(Signed) Osman Roble Daach,
Minister of Labour and Vocational Training.

29. The Committee noted the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the ILO, also articles 31 and 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the texts of which appear in Appendix 1 to this report.

30. In examining the financial relations between Djibouti and the Organization for the preceding ten years, the Committee noted that Djibouti had made the following payments to the ILO in respect of its assessed contributions:

Date of payment	Amount	Details of payment
27 January 1988	US$12 657	Full 1986 contribution
19 April 1988	US$12 657	Full 1987 contribution
19 July 1988	US$8 122	Part 1988 contribution
3 June 1991	SF28 914	Balance of 1988 contribution and part 1989 contribution
9 June 1992	SF15 721	Part 1989 contribution
14 March 1994	SF15 053	Balance of 1989 contribution and part 1990 contribution

31. Contributions outstanding at 31 December 1996 amounted to 209,207 Swiss francs, covering the assessed contributions for 1990 to 1996. The 1997 contribution of 33,611 Swiss francs has also not been paid.

32. The amount outstanding at 31 December 1996 is in excess of the equivalent of the assessed contributions of Djibouti for the two preceding years. Therefore, under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution, Djibouti is not entitled to vote unless the Conference should decide, in accordance with that article, to grant permission to vote.

33. As evidence of its intention to pay, Djibouti made a payment of 101,466 Swiss francs on 5 June 1997 in accordance with the proposed arrangement, and as described in the letter which appears in paragraph 28. If the Conference accepts the proposal made by the Government of Djibouti, 33,611 Swiss francs of this amount could be applied in full settlement of its 1997 contribution and the balance of 67,855 Swiss francs applied towards the payment of arrears of contributions, as indicated in the resolution at the end of this report.

34. The representative of France observed that Djibouti had recently made a substantial payment to cover its current contribution as well as a part of its arrears. He fully supported the arrangement proposed by Djibouti so that it could recover its right to vote.

35. The representative of Panama agreed with the previous speaker and expressed full support for the draft resolution recommending that Djibouti be granted the right to vote.

36. The Committee, being satisfied that the failure of Djibouti to pay its arrears was due to conditions beyond its control, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 31 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, reports to the Conference as follows:*

(a) The Committee finds that the failure of Djibouti to pay in full the amounts owing was due to conditions beyond its control, as explained in the letter appearing in paragraph 28 above.*

(b) The financial relations between Djibouti and the Organization have been set out in paragraphs 30 to 33 above.*

37. The Committee accordingly recommends the adoption by the Conference of the resolution concerning the granting to Djibouti of permission to vote under paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, the text of which appears at the end of this report.*

Appendix

38. Appendix I contains extracts from the Constitution of the ILO and from the Standing Orders of the Conference dealing with arrangements for the settlement of arrears of contributions and requests for permission to vote.

Chairman and Reporter.

Appendix I

Relevant provisions of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization and the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference

1. Paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the Organization provides as follows:

> 4. A Member of the Organization which is in arrears in the payment of its financial contribution to the Organization shall have no vote in the Conference, in the Governing Body, in any committee or in the election of members of the Governing Body, if the amount of its arrears equals or exceeds the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years: Provided that the Conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by the delegates present permit such a Member to vote if it is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member.

2. Articles 31 and 32 of the Standing Orders of the Conference provide as follows:

ARTICLE 31

Procedure where proposal is made to permit
Member in arrears to vote

1. Any request or proposal that the Conference should nevertheless permit a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contributions to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution shall be referred in the first instance to the Finance Committee of the Conference, which shall report thereon as a matter of urgency.

2. Pending a decision on the request or proposal by the Conference, the Member shall not be entitled to vote.

3. The Finance Committee shall submit to the Conference a report giving its opinion on the request or proposal.

4. If the Finance Committee, having found that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member, thinks fit to propose to the Conference that the Member should nevertheless be permitted to vote in accordance with article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution, it shall in its report:

(a) explain the nature of the conditions beyond the Member's control;

(b) give an analysis of the financial relations between the Member and the Organization during the preceding ten years; and

(c) indicate the measures which should be taken in order to settle the arrears.

5. Any decision which may be taken by the Conference to permit a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contributions to vote notwithstanding such arrears may be made conditional upon the Member complying with any recommendations for settling the arrears which may be made by the Conference.

ARTICLE 32

Period of validity of a decision to permit Member in arrears to vote

1. Any decision by the Conference permitting a Member which is in arrears in the payment of its contributions to vote shall be valid for the session of the Conference at which the decision is taken. Any such decision shall be operative in regard to the Governing Body and committees until the opening of the general session of the Conference next following that at which it was taken.

2. Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph 1 of this article, after the Conference has approved an arrangement under which the arrears of a Member are consolidated and are payable in annual instalments over a period of years, any decision by the Conference permitting that Member to vote shall be valid as long as the Member concerned pays both its current contributions and the instalments on its consolidated arrears during the year in respect of which they are due.

Resolutions submitted to the Conference

Resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Cape Verde

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having regard to paragraph 7 of article 10 of the Financial Regulations,

Accepts the arrangement proposed by the Government of Cape Verde for the settlement of its arrears of contributions due for the period 1993-96 to the effect that:

(a) in 1997, the Government of Cape Verde will pay in full its contribution for the year 1997;

(b) in subsequent years, the Government of Cape Verde will continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;

(c) the Government of Cape Verde will settle arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1996, amounting in total to 130,790 Swiss francs, by the payment of 20 annual instalments beginning in 1998, made up of 19 equal instalments of 6,539 Swiss francs and a final instalment of 6,549 Swiss francs;

Decides that Cape Verde shall be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business.

Resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Paraguay

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having regard to the terms of the financial arrangement adopted by the Conference at its 78th (June 1991) Session for the settlement of arrears of contributions of the Government of Paraguay and to paragraph 7 of article 10 of the Financial Regulations,

Having regard further to the fact that the Government of Paraguay, having lost the right to vote through non-payment of its contribution for 1996, has now paid its contribution for that year and part of its instalment for 1997;

Decides that Paraguay shall be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business, it being understood that the aforesaid financial arrangement shall continue to apply.

Resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of the Dominican Republic

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having regard to paragraph 7 of article 10 of the Financial Regulations,

Accepts the arrangement proposed by the Government of the Dominican Republic for the settlement of its arrears of contributions due for the periods 1970-76 and 1985-96 to the effect that:

(a) in 1997, the Government of the Dominican Republic will pay in full its contribution for the year 1997;

(b) in subsequent years, the Government of the Dominican Republic will continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;

(c) the Government of the Dominican Republic will settle arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1996, amounting in total to 1,153,755 Swiss francs, by an immediate payment of 280,515 Swiss francs and by payment of five equal annual instalments of 145,000 Swiss francs and a final instalment of 148,240 Swiss francs, beginning in 1998;

Decides that the Dominican Republic shall be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business.

Resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Djibouti

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having regard to paragraph 7 of article 10 of the Financial Regulations,

Accepts the arrangement proposed by the Government of Djibouti for the settlement of its arrears of contributions due for the period 1990-96 to the effect that:

(a) in 1997, the Government of Djibouti will pay in full its contribution for the year 1997;

(b) in subsequent years, the Government of Djibouti will continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;

(c) the Government of Djibouti will settle arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1996, amounting in total to 209,207 Swiss francs, by an immediate payment of 67,855 Swiss francs and the payment, beginning in 1998, of four annual instalments of 28,270 Swiss francs, and a final annual instalment of 28,272 Swiss francs;

Decides that Djibouti shall be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business.

Provisional Record

Eighty-fifth Session, Geneva, 1997

Second item on the agenda: Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions

Second report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 5 and 6 June 1997 with Mr P. Etiang (Uganda) as Chairman and Reporter and Mr. A. Ducreux (Panama) as Vice-Chairman.

Status of collection of member States' contributions

2. The Committee had before it Provisional Record No. 5, containing information on the status of collection of member States' contributions as at 31 May 1997.

3. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller) reported that since the preparation of the document, contributions had been received from the following member States:

Country	Swiss francs
Malawi	7 225
Nepal	33 216
Cape Verde	59 119
Dominican Republic	314 126
Total	413 686

4. The payments from Malawi and Nepal meant that these member States had now paid their 1997 contributions in full.

5. The Committee took note of the information in the document.

Assessment of contributions of new member States

6. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and other financial questions, containing a draft resolution concerning the rate of assessment for Saint Kitts and Nevis, which had joined the ILO on 19 June 1996.

7. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Scales of assessment of contributions to the budget for the 1998-99 biennium

8. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and other financial questions, and document FC/D.5, containing draft resolutions and a draft scale of assessment for member States' contributions for 1998.

9. The representative of the Russian Federation observed that discussions were taking place at present in the UN on a scale of assessments for 1998. The ILO scale for 1998 proposed in the Office paper was based on the UN scale for 1997, whereas under the principle of full harmonization it should be based on the UN scale for 1998. The present UN scale was fixed in 1994 according to conditions at that time. Since then the economic climate in the Russian Federation, and several other countries as well, had deteriorated to the point where the current UN scale no longer accurately reflected their ability to pay. Nevertheless, the Russian Federation would be prepared to accept the 1997 UN scale as the basis for the 1998 ILO scale, because under the terms of the resolution this matter could be re-examined at the 1998 Conference.

10. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Report of the Administrative Board of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund

11. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and other financial questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the management of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund.

12. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization

13. The Committee had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and other financial questions, containing a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning appointments to the Administrative Tribunal of the ILO.

14. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt this resolution, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99

15. The Committee had before it the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 as submitted to the Governing Body at its 268th

Session (March 1997). The Committee also had before it Report II: Draft Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and other financial questions, containing a report on the consideration of the Director-General's original proposals by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee of the Governing Body. The Committee also had before it Provisional Record no. 3, containing supplementary information submitted to the Conference in pursuance of a decision of the Governing Body in March 1997.

16. The Director-General stated that the programme and budget proposals whose adoption the Governing Body was recommending to the International Labour Conference were the result of a process involving an extra stage compared with previous years which had given Government, Employer and Worker members of the Governing Body a better chance to voice their principal concerns.

17. The Governing Body wanted the Conference to reaffirm the ILO's permanent objectives, which it had confirmed on the 75th anniversary of the Organization in 1994, and had decided to pursue its broad strategy of promoting democracy, assisting member States in their efforts to create employment and combat poverty and improving the protection of workers. There were four major challenges that needed priority attention in 1998-99: the revitalization of the ILO standard-setting activities, the fight against child labour, the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen, and the follow-up to the World Conference on Women in Beijing. Both the content of the proposals and the level of resources proposed were in line with this strategy.

18. The programme and budget before the Committee contained a considerable number of innovations, including new programmes of action that the Governing Body had identified during its most recent discussions. The first table of Part IV of Provisional Record No. 3, which the Committee had before it, summarized the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99. There were cuts in all the major sectors. The budget for the policy-making organs was down by around 14 per cent and for service and support activities by 6.7 per cent. There were only small cuts in regional services, on which expenditure was being reduced by 0.35 per cent compared with an average of 5.59 per cent for the budget as a whole. Substantive and operational programmes, i.e. the technical activities that were of direct concern to member States, had been cut by 2.43 per cent overall, again less than the programme and budget as a whole. Using the same exchange rate as for 1996-97 and at constant 1996-97 prices, the programme and budget proposed for 1998-99 had been reduced by almost 32.4 million dollars.

19. In real terms these proposals were 5.59 per cent lower than the programme adopted by the Conference for the current biennium. In nominal terms they showed a reduction of 3.75 per cent at an exchange rate of 1.16 Swiss francs to the dollar. However, the relevant exchange rate would in fact be the applicable rate at the time the Committee made its recommendation to the Conference, probably between 1.40 and 1.44 Swiss francs to the dollar. At the conservative estimate of 1.40 Swiss francs to the dollar, the Organization's budget for 1998-99 would thus be 493.8 million dollars, a nominal reduction of 14.79 per cent compared with the budget for the current biennium; at 1.44 Swiss francs to the dollar, the budget would be 485.2 million dollars, a net reduction of 16.27 per cent.

20. The proposals showed that the Office had made allowance for the financial difficulties facing several member States, and also showed that it had respected the Governing Body's wish to reduce the Organization's budget. Although some people felt that the Office should have made more cuts, the Director-General drew the Committee's attention to the serious risk that that would have posed for the Organization.

21. The Director-General went on to say that hardly a week went by without the Office hearing from somewhere — often in very attractive brochures — about some United Nations organization's plan of reform. The ILO had not yet published any document of this kind but perhaps it should have done. In fact, the reforms taking place in the Organization were nothing new; under the authority of the Governing Body, the Office had been working on the process of reform for over six years. Perhaps the reforms had not been as drastic as some might have wished, but they had been profound, real and effective.

22. The Director-General briefly outlined the background to the Office's six years of reforms, the Organization's objectives and the results obtained. At the beginning of the 1990s the Organization had had no option but to adapt to the changes in its environment, because they were a direct challenge to its ability to meet its constituents' expectations. These changes included the end of communism and the planned economy, especially in Central and East Europe; the predominance of the market economy; the globalization of the economy; the deregulation of the labour market; the very concept of lifelong employment and of social security; the consequences of the liberalization of trade and the pressure to enforce workers' fundamental rights. On another level, there was the dwindling level of resources for technical cooperation, the decision to encourage the national execution of programmes and projects and, of course, every kind of technical progress, which was a source both of new opportunities and of problems for the world of work.

23. The first reforms undertaken by the Organization were designed to enhance its capacity to respond to the needs of its constituents in the various member countries. The most important of these was the active partnership policy which was introduced in 1991 to bring the Office closer to the ministries of labour and employers' and workers' organizations in member States, so as to improve their capability to implement their own development programmes. This policy led to a radical reform of all the ILO's technical resources in the regions and, specifically, to the creation of the multidisciplinary advisory teams. At the same time, relations between headquarters and the regions underwent a profound change which resulted in much greater unity of action. Because the new approach entailed the fullest possible involvement of the Organization's constituents, the implementation of its major programmes became much more focused on their most pressing problems. The result was much greater synergy between international labour standards and technical cooperation.

24. For the Organization to remain relevant in a global economy, it too needed to broaden its influence at the international level — another challenge which the Office had taken up with the backing of the Governing Body. The outcome of that was common knowledge. The World Summit for Social Development had recognized that the Organization was the leading forum for social development, and the Bretton Woods institutions had endorsed the ILO's principles regarding fundamental workers' rights and the critical importance of tripartite consultation in implementing economic and social policies. The G7 had now invited the Organization to take part in its discussions on unemployment problems. These and many other examples showed just how the ILO's credibility had grown in recent years. The development of the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour was clear proof of the confidence that was now being placed in the Organization.

25. Another effect of these reforms had been to increase the Organization's effectiveness, which had made it more efficient and the impact of its activities more durable. An example was the great improvement in the functioning of the International Labour Conference, and the equally remarkable reduction in its cost — a saving of 30 per cent, not counting the reduced cost for governments of the member States of sending delegations to the Conference. Similar improvements had been made in the functioning of the Governing Body and of the regional conferences, again bringing substantial reductions in costs; the reorganization of the regional meetings, for example, had resulted in a saving of 55 per cent.

26. The same was true of the reform of the Organization's sectoral activities decided by the Governing Body, which had made them both more effective and much less costly. Service and support activities was another area where there had been major reforms over the past three or four biennia, resulting in productivity gains and, above all, much lower costs, especially in internal administration, the production of documents and publications and the servicing of conferences and meetings.

27. All these reforms had been decided by the Organization's policy-making bodies, notably the Governing Body, and had been implemented by the staff of the Office. The ILO's personnel policy itself had changed greatly: recruiting procedures had been streamlined and training stepped up; a policy of mobility between headquarters and the regions had been systematically applied for the past five years; performance appraisal was being improved; efforts to recruit from non-represented and under-represented countries were already giving positive results; and the percentage of women on the staff had increased by 45 per cent since 1990.

28. The ILO's mistake was perhaps that it had introduced these reforms earlier than other organizations. A whole series of measures that were being considered elsewhere were already part and parcel of the ILO's structure and working methods. As could be seen from the proposals before the Committee, the main objective had been to reduce administrative costs in Geneva so as to boost the programmes of action in the regions. In terms of work-years, the resources allocated to regional services had increased by 47 per cent over 1990-91.

29. While recognizing that productivity could still be improved, the Director-General emphasized that any attempt to do more than what was proposed and to make additional cuts would inevitably mean reducing the Office's activities in the regions. And that meant that the Organization's technical capability would suffer, as would its ability to fulfil its mandate. True, there was no end to change; on the contrary, the pace of change was constantly accelerating and the process of reform must therefore continue unabated. There was no resting on one's laurels; asserting the Organization's relevance demanded constant effort. The debate of the current session of the Conference on the ILO's standard-setting activities in a global economy was just one example. Constant reform was also needed for the ILO to become more and more effective; for maximum efficiency, the Office would have to be unrelenting in its pursuit of increased productivity and reduced costs. That was what the programme and budget for 1998-99 set out to do.

30. The Director-General said that the reforms had been successful largely because of the support of the representatives of the governments and of the employers' and workers' groups. He assured the Committee that he would pursue the process of reform and asked it to give the Office the means of doing so by approving the proposals submitted to the Conference by the Governing Body.

31. Mr. Oechslin, the Employer Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, stated that this budget period could be considered from two points of view: one which concentrated on budget amounts, and another which focused on the programme itself. Governments were more concerned with the level of resources involved, but the Employers tended to pay more attention to the programme aspects of the proposals. The Programme and Budget proposals for 1989-99 now before the Committee had already been the subject of a very lengthy discussion in the Governing Body, and struck a balance between the needs of the Organization's constituents.

32. The Employers saw three priorities in the programme and budget proposals: employment promotion, training, and support for democracy and fundamental workers' rights. The interest in employment promotion was reflected in the size of extra-budgetary resources earmarked for these activities. For their part, the Employers were in favour of a comprehensive and integrated programme in support of job-creating enterprises. Indeed, the programme and budget contained ambitious programmes of action in this area, especially the programme of action for the development of small and medium-sized enterprises. However, the resources allocated to this programme were insufficient, and Governments should make an effort to provide more funding.

33. As regards training, the Employers paid particular attention to directing these activities to the particular needs of the economy, to methods of financing such activities and to the respective roles of the State and the private sector in this field.

34. The Employers considered democracy and fundamental workers' rights as a top priority in view of the follow-up to the Copenhagen Summit and the Singapore Conference. The Employers also supported a renewed impetus for the reform of standard-setting activities, one of the main themes of the Organization's programme, and supported the continuation of activities already under way for the protection of workers.

35. The main tool for implementing the programme and budget of the ILO was clearly its staff — the Organization's greatest asset. The technical competence of staff was crucial not only for the successful implementation of the programme but also to ensure that the ILO was regarded as a centre of excellence in its field.

36. Another basic means for implementing the programme was the Organization's structure, which enabled it to be in contact with the world of labour and with its constituents. The Employers favoured an active partnership policy, also a streamlining of regional structures provided it was not detrimental to the technical competence of headquarters services.

37. Sectoral activities were also extremely important because they enabled the ILO to maintain contact with the industrial branches. The ILO had recently had some success in experimenting with the use of more accessible informal meetings and the Employers therefore welcomed the two which were included in the programme and budget proposals.

38. The assessment of the ILO's work was an extremely important function which could be best achieved through an evaluation of the actual impact of programmes. This process could be improved by expanding the role of the Committee on Technical Cooperation of the Governing Body.

39. In conclusion, the Employers considered that the budget struck a satisfactory balance between the various activities of the ILO and they expressed firm support for the Programme and Budget proposals for the 1998-99 biennium.

40. Mr. Gray, speaking on behalf of the Worker Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, said that having an opportunity in November 1996 for a preliminary discussion on the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 was a welcome innovation and enabled the Governing Body to express a preliminary view on the proposals. The more detailed discussions had taken place as usual at the last Governing Body session in March 1997 but on this occasion had been marked by lengthy discussions on procedure. The Governing Body had requested certain additional information concerning the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 to be made available to this Committee and the Workers expressed appreciation for the Office's response.

41. The Workers were particularly concerned to see that the Programme and Budget for 1998-99 was still based on the principle of zero real growth. The Organization had operated under this regime for many years now and the point had been reached where it was starting to affect the ability of the ILO to carry out its mandate. He urged the representatives of all member States to bear this in mind during the course of the discussions and again when they held preliminary discussions on the Programme and Budget proposals for 2000-01.

42. The Workers, like the Employers, were never 100 per cent satisfied with the final programme and budget proposals. Nevertheless, they were particularly impressed by enterprise activities, which would benefit from a solid tripartite approach. The Workers shared the Employers' support for the active partnership policy but it would be useful to have more information on where the money was being spent and the general effectiveness of these activities. In general, however, the Workers believed the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 were well balanced and commended them for adoption by this Committee and the Conference.

43. The representative of the Director-General (the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller), at the invitation of the Chairman, described the documents for the Committee's consideration. The first was the Director-General's Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99, which was the document considered by the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body in March 1997. This document did not reflect the changes which had resulted from these discussions. The second document was Report II: Draft Programme and Budget 1998-99 and other financial questions, on pages 1-6. Table B, on page 5 in the English document, contained the adjustments to the programme and budget proposals which had resulted from the Governing Body discussion in March. Annex 1 of Report II contained the report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee on the draft Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99. The third document before the Committee was Provisional Record No. 3, containing additional information submitted to the Conference at the request of the Governing Body.

44. The representative of Austria thought that the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 were well balanced and expressed particular appreciation for the additional information contained in Provisional Record No. 3. In the light of demand for ILO services in many member States it was regrettable to see that resources had been cut in many programme activities. Nor had administrative services been spared. The main document containing the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 referred to savings that could be achieved with a rationalization of the Office management structure. These savings would be welcome provided the process of rationalization yielded genuine benefits, but the ILO should be careful about adopting the same measures as the private sector. In many countries increased unemployment had led to widespread poverty and other socially undesirable repercussions. As an organization concerned with human rights the ILO should set an example by exploring job-sharing and similar schemes so that human dignity was not jeopardized in the search for savings. Subject to these reservations the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 were well balanced and deserved full support.

45. The representative of Tunisia would have preferred a much greater increase in resources for regional activities, especially in view of the socio-economic challenges resulting from the globalization of the world economy. Referring to field programmes in the Arab States it was gratifying to see that the activities planned in Palestine recognized the need for ILO services in that region, although more could be done in view of the changing circumstances of workers in the occupied territories. It was regrettable to see that there was no mention of an ILO mission to Palestine and the other occupied territories to see the situation at first hand. The Arab member States also attached great importance to the development of labour administration activities and would like to see more resources allocated to these activities. The work carried out by the ILO, the Arab Labour Organization and the Government of Tunisia through the Regional Arab Programme for Labour Administration (RAPLA) based in Tunisia since 1986 was a striking example of what could be achieved.

46. The representative of Panama had participated in all the discussions on the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 and urged members of the Committee to give them their full support.

47. The representative of Canada expressed appreciation to the Office for the additional information contained in Provisional Record No. 3. It was a useful document that would help this Committee to understand the resource allocations to the strategic priorities in the programme and budget, and could be developed in future as an integral part of the budgeting process. She expressed full support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99. The budget level reflected the down trend towards reduced financing in the UN system and national administrations and the proposals had been able to provide a balance between many high-priority programmes and activities, despite the pressures of budgetary restraint. The economies and reform initiatives referred to by the Director-General in his introduction were not well-known and deserved to be commended. She welcomed the proposal to return to member States the surplus income arising from the 1996-97 expenditure reductions to offset contributions for 1998-99. This would be particularly helpful for those whose contributions could increase under a new United Nations scale of assessments. The proposals adopted by the Governing Body on a more strategic approach in future to the preparation and presentation of programme and budget proposals were an especially welcome development. Members looked forward to seeing the new approach in the Programme and Budget for 2000-01. Evaluation of the impact of activities in the current biennium was an important aspect of the new budgetary process approved by the Governing Body, and the first review this coming November would be useful initial planning for the Programme and Budget for 2000-01. In summary, the Canadian Government would give full support to the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99.

48. The representative of Norway hoped that for future biennia it would be possible to divert even more resources from administrative to technical programmes, but in the meantime expressed full support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99.

49. The representative of the United Kingdom agreed with the comments of the two previous speakers. He also agreed with the spokesman for the Workers that the opportunity to have a two-stage discussion on the programme and budget in the Governing Body was a welcome development. Discussion had tended to focus too much on presentation, but when this was resolved it would be easier to understand the substance of the proposals. He expressed full support for the Programme and Budget for 1998-99.

50. The representative of Bahrain expressed support for programmes aimed at alleviating poverty in order to achieve social justice, and also the creation of jobs through the development of small enterprises. He commended the efforts of the ILO Office in Beirut and also the multidisciplinary teams which were working with other area offices to provide a full range of services throughout the Arab States. The effectiveness of the ILO throughout the Arab States would be further enhanced if more of the ILO publications were available in the Arab language. Subject to these comments he expressed full support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99.

51. The representative of Italy, in expressing support of the draft programme and budget, recognized the efforts made by the Director-General to meet the requirements of member States by striking a balance between the economic constraints faced by the ILO and ensuring that its objectives were achieved. He endorsed the objectives established to promote core labour standards, to work towards the elimination of child labour, to support small and medium enterprises, and to improve the protection of workers, but thought that training should have been given more importance as it was an essential part of the active partnership policy. Fully sharing the view expressed by the representative of the Government of Canada, he welcomed the more strategic approach adopted by the Office to the programme and budget.

52. The representative of China expressed general support for the content and level of the budget, but felt that the proposals contained three obvious shortcomings. Firstly, the promotion of employment and the fight against poverty were not given sufficient prominence, because with over 30 per cent of the world's workforce unemployed or underemployed, and more than one billion people living in poverty, they were clearly the greatest challenges faced by the world of labour. The World Summit for Social Development had entrusted the ILO with the role of addressing these problems and developing countries hoped that the ILO would provide advice on employment policy and serve as a centre of reference and excellence in this field. While the ILO's standard-setting activities were important and should not be neglected, they were not as important as the promotion of employment; consequently, resources allocated to the promotion of employment should have been consolidated.

53. Secondly, the ILO's technical cooperation activities should have been expanded, especially activities relating to the promotion of employment and poverty alleviation. Technical cooperation was the most efficient means of promoting the ILO's objectives but instead, to the concern of developing countries, the ILO's technical cooperation activities were decreasing. This was an undesirable trend and should be reversed, whatever the reasons for it. The policy to link international labour standards to the provision of technical cooperation should also be reviewed. The active partnership policy and promotion of services to member States were excellent initiatives, but more resources were needed so that they could more efficiently meet the increasing demands of member States.

54. Finally, although more resources had been allocated to the regions, they were still nowhere near enough to meet the needs of member States, especially in the Asia-Pacific region. There was also an imbalance in the general distribution of resources by region which the ILO should redress by increasing the amount of resources for these programmes and ensuring that there was no discrimination in how they were allocated.

55. The representative of Sudan, while supporting the draft programme and budget, believed that the limited resources hampered the efficient implementation of programmes. The increased allocation to the African region was welcomed, but it should not be forgotten that Africa suffered from complex social and economic problems, including high unemployment and low living standards. The African member States looked to the ILO for help in its particular field of expertise, taking into account cooperation with other international organizations, including providing follow-up to the Declarations of the World Summit for Social Development and the Fourth World Conference on Women. He expressed support for the establishment of a multidisciplinary team in Cairo, also for the valuable work being done by the Regional Arab Programme for Labour Administration based in Tunisia. He urged the Office to continue sending an annual mission to Gaza and the West Bank as this was the best way of assessing the particular problems in this area and finding solutions to them.

56. The representative of the United States was encouraged that the level of the draft programme and budget was 3.75 per cent lower than the current biennium, which showed that it was possible to fully absorb the effects of inflation. It was also heartening to see the progress made towards more transparency in budget presentation and a more strategic approach to budget themes. During earlier discussions on the programme and budget proposals, the United States Government had called for a substantial reduction in the original budget level, and had reserved its position when the Governing Body agreed on a reduction of 3.75 per cent. There was no doubt that the budget could be further reduced. Since it was presented in dollars the level appeared to drop quite substantially, from $579.5 million in the current biennium to approximately $490 million for 1998-99, once it was recosted to the current exchange rate. However, this reduction was not reflected in the Swiss francs that member States would be assessed. As inflation in Switzerland was very low, the Organization's activities would be well protected, so there was still room for further savings. For example, travel by officials and Governing Body members in business class should be eliminated. There was no justification for spending taxpayers' money on expenses forbidden to national employees and it was an anomaly that officials travelled business class to work in poor countries. Several other measures could be taken. Support staff could be reduced to correct the present imbalance between support staff and Professional staff, also reproduction and translation costs could be reduced if documents were shortened or if they were routinely distributed on the Internet, and if committees did not proliferate agenda items.

57. The Director-General had described the results of the reforms that had been carried out since 1994. However, reform was an ongoing process which should be continued, and there would be no turnaround in the policy to control budget levels. The Director-General might wish to consider establishing an informal scorecard of the effectiveness of reforms that had been undertaken and he might also wish to take a lead from the reforms carried out in the United Nations. As far as the budget level was concerned, a lower inflation estimate would be more accurate given the recent history of inflation rates in Switzerland and in the other countries in which the ILO had significant financial activities.

58. The representative of Chile felt that the draft programme and budget fairly reflected the discussions which had taken place in the Governing Body, and expressed support for the positions taken by the representatives of Canada, the United Kingdom and Norway.

59. The representative of Japan fully supported the statements made by the representatives of the Governments of Canada, the United Kingdom, and Norway. The increased transparency in the presentation of the programme and budget proposals was a positive step and the response by the Office to member States' requests for more information was appreciated. The Office should also continue to develop its strategic approach to the budget and its user-friendly presentation of the programme and budget proposals.

60. The representative of Sweden, in supporting the draft programme and budget, expressed appreciation for the Office's response to requests for more information, but believed that it should carefully evaluate recent reforms in the budget process and develop a more strategic approach to the formulation of budget themes. It was also important to enhance transparency in the presentation of the budget so that member States could understand where ideas came from and see more clearly the impact of programmes' activities.

61. The representative of France agreed with the statements of the representative of Canada and expressed full support for the draft Programme and Budget for 1998-99. The Office had made strenuous efforts during the present budget exercise in response to requests for more information and had provided extremely helpful additional documentation to member States. This information had facilitated discussion on the programme and budget proposals and should be provided regularly in future because increased transparency in programme and budget matters was highly desirable. In the budget process comparisons had been made between the past and the future and two main positions were adopted: that spending should decrease, or that organizations should pursue a zero growth budget. This was a false debate. The real issue was efficiency, and to maintain efficiency and implement effective policies it was sometimes necessary to increase spending.

62. He agreed with earlier statements that the process of reform should continue but the Office should look closely at the question of priorities. A balance sheet of the reforms should be evaluated and it was important that the search for reforms to improve efficiency continued without interruption. Reforms should not be based purely on financial considerations: for example, the duration of the Governing Body and the Conference could be shortened because at present the ILO was unable to benefit from the attendance of those who might come if the Conference was shorter. Furthermore, the decision not to publish immediately statements made in the plenary sessions was wrong, because it meant that the outside world could lose interest in the work of the ILO. Publishing these statements later was only interesting to historians and did not serve the interests of the Organization.

63. The representative of the Government of Australia expressed full support for the programme and budget proposals as they stood. The supplementary information published in Provisional Record No. 3 was a welcome development towards a more transparent budget process and it also reflected the trend towards a more strategically based budget approach.

64. The representative of Saudi Arabia expressed appreciation for the efforts of the Office during the discussions on the programme and budget proposals in the Governing Body, and also for providing the additional information requested for this Committee. He associated himself with the statements of the representatives of Tunisia, the Sudan and Bahrain, that regional activities should be strengthened through an increase in resources for regional programmes.

65. The representative of Turkey fully supported the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 and associated himself with the comments made by the representatives of Norway, the United Kingdom, Canada, Japan, Sweden, France and Austria. He also thanked the Director-General for his excellent work in preparing the documents for discussion.

66. The representative of New Zealand also supported the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99. The objective of zero nominal growth set by the Governing Body had been achieved for the next biennium and at least the same degree of restraint should continue for future biennia. The programme and budget proposals reflected a more strategic approach and this would be a good starting-point for a fuller incorporation of integrated strategic planning processes in future budget discussions. He strongly endorsed the Director-General's recognition of the need for effective and ongoing evaluation and monitoring mechanisms for ILO activities, and the ILO should lead the way in achieving productivity increases without increasing costs.

67. These achievements should be seen as a starting-point for further initiatives aimed at improving the Organization's productivity, efficiency and effectiveness. A structured approach to achieving savings and establishing priorities was necessary to assure constituents that sufficient resources were being allocated to the right priorities. The Office should broaden its focus to include desired results as well as activities, because managers would then be accountable for their achievements and would have an incentive to optimize the use of resources. This broader focus should be reinforced by a programme of rigorous evaluations which would make financial reporting more meaningful and enable the ILO to be more effective and valuable to its constituents.

68. The representative of Jamaica, speaking on behalf of the English-speaking Caribbean countries, expressed full support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99.

69. The representative of the Syrian Arab Republic expressed appreciation to the Director-General for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 and for the additional information contained in Provisional Record No. 3. An equilibrium had been achieved between activities and services and the rationalization of costs as a result of recent reforms carried out by the Office. There were two ways of solving financial problems: one was to keep costs the same and increase resources, the other was to keep resources the same and rationalize costs in light of socio-economic and international monetary changes. In any case, there could be no justification for a reduction in both. A balance between activities and resources had to be achieved that respected the core mandate of the ILO and the terms of the ILO Constitution. Cooperation between developing and developed countries should particularly ensure that reforms would not affect services to developing countries. Finally, he associated himself with the comments made by earlier speakers concerning the rights of workers in Palestine and the occupied territories.

70. The representative of Argentina fully supported the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 and thanked the Director-General for the most useful information contained in Provisional Record No. 3. She considered that the proposals would enable the ILO to effectively carry out its mandate and supported the reforms proposed.

71. The representative of Germany supported the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 and endorsed the comments made by the representative of Canada. He welcomed the strategies developed in the proposals and felt that nominal zero growth was the right decision in present circumstances because the ILO would still be able to carry out a full range of activities. The additional information contained in Provisional Record No. 3 was extremely helpful in understanding the budget proposals in more detail.

72. The representative of Switzerland expressed full support for the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99.

Resolution for the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States

73. The Committee had before it document FC/D.6, which contained summarized details of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 and a draft resolution for submission to the Conference. At the previous sitting the Committee had authorized the Office to carry out the forward exchange contracts for the Organization's US dollar requirements for the 1998-99 biennium. These contracts had now been formally executed and the appropriate figures now to be inserted in the formal resolution were:

Budget of expenditure	US$481,050,000
Budget of income	US$481,050,000
Budget rate of exchange	1.46 Swiss francs to US$1
Equivalent budget total in Swiss francs	CHF 702,333,000

74. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the resolution for the Programme and Budget for 1998-99, the text of which appears at the end of this report.

Appendices

75. A draft scale for the assessment of contributions for 1998 is attached as Appendix I to this report.

76. A table showing the proposed summarized budget of expenditure and income for 1998-99 is attached to this report (Appendix II), together with a summary of the proposed expenditure budget for 1998-99 by major programme (Appendix III).

77. A statement showing the contributions due from each member State for 1998 is also attached (Appendix IV).

Geneva, June 1997.

Chairman and Reporter.

Resolutions submitted to the Conference

Resolution concerning the assessment of contributions of new member States

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2 of the Financial Regulations, that the contribution of Saint Kitts and Nevis to the ILO budget for the period of its membership in the Organization in 1996 and 1997 be based on an annual assessment rate of 0.01 per cent.

Resolution concerning the scales of assessment to the budget for 1998-99 biennium

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

(a) Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2 of the Financial Regulations, to adopt, for the assessment of the contributions of member States for 1998, the draft scale of assessments set out in column 3 of Appendix I to this report;

(b) Requests the Director-General, through the Governing Body, to report to the International Labour Conference at its 86th Session on changes, if any, to the scale of assessment adopted by the United Nations General Assembly at its 52nd Session, and on all the implications for the ILO, including its earliest comparable application, taking due consideration of the established practice, taking into account the deliberations of its 268th Session and of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, and in accordance with the Constitution, Financial Regulations, related resolutions and decisions;

(c) Reaffirms that the ILO scale of assessments should be based upon the latest available scale of assessment adopted by the United Nations General Assembly.

Resolution concerning the management of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling its resolution of 9 October 1946 by which it adopted revised Staff Pensions Regulations, under which, in particular, the Staff Pensions Fund became the property of the International Labour Organization to be administered for the purposes of the Regulations and managed by an Administrative Board,

Reaffirming the International Labour Organization's guarantee, in article 13 of the Regulations, of the payment of all annuities or capital sums due under those Regulations,

Considering that management by an Administrative Board is no longer justified having regard to the small number of beneficiaries and to the absence in recent years of any direct participation of the latter on the Board;

1. Decides —

(a) that the International Labour Office shall, under the supervision of its Governing Body, to which it shall annually report, henceforth have direct responsibility for the management of the Staff Pensions Fund and for the payment of benefits in accordance with the substantive provisions of the Regulations;

(b) that the pension adjustment system for the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund shall continue to be applied to benefits due under the Regulations and that any subsequent improvements in that system shall be reflected in the payment of those benefits.

2. Hereby abrogates, without prejudice to operative paragraph 1 above, all provisions of the Staff Pensions Regulations that are inconsistent with the present resolution or with any decision that may be adopted by the Governing Body pursuant to it.

Resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Expressing its profound appreciation to Sir William Douglas and Mr. Edilbert Razafindralambo of the services which they have diligently and consistently rendered for 15 years to the international community;

Decides, in accordance with Article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization, to appoint as judges of the Administrative Tribunal for a term of three years with effect from 1 July 1997 and, for the sake of uniformity, until 31 July 2000:

— Mr. Seydou Ba (Senegal);

— Mr. James K. Hugessen (Canada).

Resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization:

(a) in virtue of the Financial Regulations, adopts for the 66th financial period, ending 31 December 1999, the budget of expenditure for the International Labour Organization amounting to US$481,050,000 and the budget of income amounting to US$481,050,000, which, at the budget rate of exchange of 1.46 Swiss francs to the US dollar, amounts to 702,333,000 Swiss francs.

(b) bearing in mind —

— that, in adopting the budgets of income and expenditure for the 65th financial period, the General Conference requested the Director-General to present proposals to the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee for adjustments to the budget of expenditure;

- that the Governing Body, at its 264th (November 1995) Session, accordingly agreed to make downward adjustments amounting to US$21,704,950;
- that, in consequence, if the budget of income is fully received, it is expected that there will be a budgetary surplus for the 65th financial period arising from the downward adjustments and amounting to US$21,704,950, which, at the budget rate of exchange for that financial period, would amount to 25,177,742 Swiss francs;

the General Conference resolves —

- that, in derogation from article 18 of the Financial Regulations, the said expected budgetary surplus of 25,177,742 Swiss francs shall be treated as budgetary income for 1998;
- that, in derogation from article 10.1 of the Financial Regulations, the remainder of the budget of income, denominated in Swiss francs, shall be financed from contributions from member States amounting to 338,577,629 Swiss francs in 1998 and 338,577,629 Swiss francs in 1999, allocated among member States in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives for those years; and
- that, should the said budgetary surplus be less than 25,177,742 Swiss francs, arrears of contributions received shall be used to finance the income budget for the 66th financial period, subject however to the resolution adopted by the General Conference at its 82nd Session (June 1995) concerning the utilization of arrears of contributions to cover budgetary deficits.

Fourth item on the agenda: Revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96)

Report of the Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96

1. The Committee on the Revision of Convention No. 96 was set up by the Conference at its first sitting on 4 June 1997 to consider the fourth item on its agenda, the revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96).

2. The Committee was originally composed of 175 members (85 Government members, 37 Employer members and 53 Worker members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member with the right to vote was allotted 1,961 votes, each Employer member 4,505 votes and each Worker member 3,145 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified eight times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.[1]

3. The Committee elected the following Officers:

Chairperson: Mr. M. Ramond (Government member, France);

[1] The following adjustments were made:

(a) 5 June (a.m.): 175 members (88 Government members with 280 votes each, 30 Employer members with 836 votes each and 57 Worker members with 440 votes each);

(b) 5 June (p.m.): 177 members (90 Government members with 19 votes each, 30 Employer members with 57 votes each and 57 Worker members with 30 votes each);

(c) 6 June: 165 members (90 Government members with 1 vote each, 30 Employer members with 3 votes each and 45 Worker members with 2 votes each);

(d) 7 June: 152 members (90 Government members with 817 votes each, 19 Employer members with 3,870 votes each and 43 Worker members with 1,710 votes each);

(e) 9 June: 142 members (90 Government members with 209 votes each, 19 Employer members with 990 votes each and 33 Worker members with 570 votes each);

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. O. Magnussen (Employer member, Norway); and Ms. P. O'Donovan (Worker member, Ireland);

Reporter: Ms. P. Maesela (Government member, South Africa).

4. At its 13th sitting the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mr. P. Hadley (Government member, United Kingdom), Mr. O. Magnussen (Employer member, Norway), Mrs. P. O'Donovan (Worker member, Ireland) and the Reporter of the Committee.

5. The Committee had before it Reports IV(1) and IV(2) entitled "Revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96)", which had been prepared by the Office for consideration by the Conference as the fourth item of its agenda. These reports were used as a basis for the Committee's discussions. The proposed text for the Convention and Recommendation contained therein had been prepared by the Office on the basis of the conclusions adopted by the Committee on Private Employment Agencies, which had convened at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1994.

6. The Committee held 19 sittings.

7. Opening the discussion, the Chairperson thanked the Committee for the confidence it placed in him. He was optimistic about the outcome of the meeting and stressed three points: (1) the proposed new instrument was breaking new ground; it was important that it should be a "living" Convention; (2) the instrument should balance the various interests of employers and workers. Temporary work agencies (TWA) should be made lawful and the ILO would serve as a guarantor of universal justice; and (3) the new instrument would be commensurate with the recommendations to streamline standard setting, made by the Director-General in his Report to the Conference in 1997. He also stated that although consensus had been reached in 1994, the task of the Committee would not be entirely free of difficulties because of the existing ways of thinking and working, and the various definitions and terminologies contained in the proposed text.

General discussion

8. Introducing the two Reports (IV(1) and IV(2)) entitled "Revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96)", the representative of the Secretary-General noted that they had been drafted in the light of the discussions held on the role of private employment agencies (PREA) in the functioning of labour markets held at the 81st Session of the International Labour Conference in 1994 and the unanimously adopted conclusions; Report IV(2) summarized the official communications received in reply to the questionnaire in Report IV(1) which had provided very valuable insights into the operations of fee-charging private employment agencies. She recalled that in 1994, most of the members of the Committee found that, with one exception, the principles underlying Convention No. 96 no longer corresponded to the realities of modern labour markets. The exception was that employment agencies should not charge fees to jobseekers. This principle was reaffirmed in Article 6, paragraph 1, of the proposed Convention. Accordingly, the revised standard should pursue the following five objectives:

- firstly, set the pattern for response to the dynamics of changing labour market functions and recall the role of its actors;
- secondly, draw up general parameters to describe the main actors, namely the public employment services (PES) and private employment agencies (PREA), as well as the nature of the relationship both between themselves and with their clients;
- thirdly, establish general principles and provide guidance that protect: (i) labour markets against poor and unethical practices; (ii) workers' interests, including where the stability of industrial relations systems might be affected by some practices of PREA, for instance, in the context of triangular employment relationships such as contract labour, temporary work agencies (TWA) and staff-leasing arrangements; and (iii) workers recruited in one country for work in another;
- fourthly, create environments that allow for the improved functioning of all employment agencies;
- fifthly, ensure that national governments were free to determine how the above objectives were met.

Based on this clear framework for the revision of Convention No. 96, the proposed text set out to eliminate existing gaps in legislation concerning the functioning of PREA, and at the same time to allow for adjustment to national conditions. This purpose was particularly reflected in the first three Articles of the proposed text for a Convention which provided a definition of PREA, defined the scope of the instrument and pointed out that the legal status of such agencies was to be determined according to national law and practice. The contribution of bona fide PREA to a well-functioning labour market was recognized in the Preamble and their role had been specified in the proposed text of the instruments. The text not only contained specific measures for the protection of workers which were of general relevance to all PREA but also sought to improve the functioning and governance of labour markets through the collaboration of public and private services. In addition, areas of complementarity with other labour standards had been clearly identified. She hoped that a relatively short Convention with a supplementary Recommendation would result in a wide ratification of this first modern standard on labour market services. The Recommendation took account of the maturity of the labour market concerned, attaching much importance to tripartite involvement in the formulation of technical standards, guidelines, codes of ethics and self-regulatory measures. It also identified specific areas which were prone to poor practices by PREA, and listed several specific measures for improving cooperation between the PES and PREA.

9. The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that the decision to revise Convention No. 96 had not been taken lightly. Ten years ago an ILO survey revealing that many new types of PREA were emerging and giving rise to problems of abuse and malpractice had prompted the ILO Governing Body to propose that there should be a general discussion on this issue at the 81st Session of the Conference (1994). This resulted in a consensus in favour of the revision of Convention No. 96. However, this consensus was reached on the understanding that the revised standard should achieve a balance between the needs to establish a new institutional framework for PREA and the need to protect workers against the possible abuses committed by these agencies. The Workers' group felt it was vital that the new standards should provide adequate protection for all workers and jobseekers, regardless of their relationship with the various parties concerned. The work of this Committee was to build on the work done in 1994 and to keep faith with those conclusions. She stressed the importance of abiding by the fundamental principle, which guided the first instruments specifically concerning the operations of private agencies adopted in 1933, that "labour is not a commodity". Consequently, workers should not have to pay to work. Labour standards should be governed by standards different from those that governed commodity markets. Balancing supply and demand at any cost was unacceptable; this implied that human dignity and social justice were cast aside. Discussions in the Workers' group had revealed that although there was evidence of many positive contributions by PREA, there was an overwhelming feeling that they tended to bring abuse and malpractice in their wake. She listed a number of abuses by employment agencies which had been specifically mentioned: (1) demanding unreasonable amounts of money in advance or taking a percentage of the wages of jobseekers; (2) sending workers to non-existent jobs; (3) sending workers at their expense to non-existent jobs in another country; (4) colluding with employers to enslave workers and force them into labour; (5) supplying labour to break strikes; and (6) acting as "front organizations" to enable employers to escape their legal obligations. The Workers' group felt that the primary objective of the new instrument must be to protect workers against abuse. Of course, good PREA did exist. However, she hoped that Employers and Governments would agree to include in the instrument some form of supervision based on licensing or certification by the competent authority. Another concern of the Workers' group was that freedom of association and collective bargaining should not be undermined by the practices of some of these agencies. This would only result in a deterioration of labour relations and productivity with negative consequences for all concerned. She felt that the proposed text did not address this issue adequately and the group would be submitting amendments to this effect. She also felt that the text lacked substance with overemphasis on the need to have a Convention which would be "ratifiable". She also felt that some of the provisions contained in the draft Recommendation should be included in the Convention. She concluded by saying that although the labour market had radically changed since 1949, one thing had not changed: the need to ensure that all workers enjoyed the right to work in freedom and dignity.

10. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stressed the positive role of PREA. The revision of Convention No. 96 was important for three reasons: (1) it would allow PREA a wider scope than did the present Convention, thus increasing the efficiency of the labour market — with positive benefits for jobseekers; (2) it would take into account the interest of workers by ensuring that agencies operated in line with ethical codes; and (3) the new Convention would give the national authorities the necessary flexibility to put the two previous goals into practice. He stressed that conditions under which PREA operated varied considerably from country to country and the new instrument had to give governments the means to deal with the different situations they had to confront. He welcomed the possibility to modernize Convention No. 96, of which some of the provisions were obsolete. The Employers' group agreed that the general thrust of the proposed revised Convention was positive but there were some weaknesses — although these were not the same as those listed by the Workers' group. He felt there were certain flaws concerning the question of control, which would be taken up in the discussion of the various articles. He referred to the Director-General's Report, in which it was proposed that Recommendations should be given a higher status. Indeed, the Employers believed that Recommendations provided greater flexibility and allowed agreement on wider issues than a Convention could. He concluded by saying that we had to recognize that PREA were with us, whether we liked it or not, and should be regarded as normal business enterprises. However, they had to operate within certain framework and conditions, in the spirit of the 1994 conclusions. He expressed the wish that the new instrument would be up to the expectations of governments and social partners — a "living" Convention which member States would see fit to ratify.

11. On behalf of the Member States of the European Union (EU), the Government member of the Netherlands pointed out that the Member States of the EU felt that a revision of Convention No. 96 was desirable. They agreed with the broad lines of the proposed draft instrument but expressed reservations on a few points — to which she would return on the discussion of the Articles of the text. The Member States had also requested that special attention be paid to the relation between the PREA and PES in Article 10.

12. The Government member of Sweden reaffirmed that Convention No. 96 had always been controversial. His country had denounced it in 1992 and had been present at the 1994 meeting to try and encourage the revision of this instrument. Sweden had been satisfied with the conclusions of this meeting and felt that the Office had done good work on the basis of these conclusions. However, he felt that there were some problems with the proposed text. First, there was a possible confusion between this text and the proposed text on contract labour. Second, he felt that there should be a possibility to leave TWA out of the scope of the Convention (Article 2, paragraph 3). Third, Article 4 was troublesome. Fourth, Article 10 required provisions for registration and licensing — which might go too far or might be inadequate for monitoring. Fifth, Paragraph 4 of the Recommendation could infringe freedom of association. He concluded by hoping that the Convention would be both ratifiable and modern.

13. The Government members of Germany, Croatia and France shared the concerns expressed by the Government of Sweden on the draft text. They asked the Office to clarify the following points and Articles: (1) the inclusion of TWA among the various categories of PREA which were not consistent with their national laws (Article 1, paragraph 1(b)); (2) the scope of the Convention (Article 2); and (3) the measures of protection of temporary workers (Article 9).

14. Replying to questions raised by a number of Government members, the Legal Adviser of the ILO stated that, in his view, there were two problems. The first was related to the debate of whether or not TWA should be included in the proposed draft instrument. He was of the opinion that their inclusion in the text did reflect the intentions of the 1994 Conference discussion — even if this was not actually spelled out in its conclusions. Furthermore, if TWA were not included, the proposed revised Convention would lose much of its raison d'être because it would address only the private placement agencies. Moreover, temporary workers would become unprotected to the extent that they could not be covered by any other Convention. The second problem was related to the interpretation of Article 2.3(a).

He pointed out that the proposed draft Convention was aiming at offering maximum "ratifiability". Thus, as the Convention gave legal recognition to PREA — including TWA — it would not be possible for any country which banned TWA to ratify the proposed draft Convention. In the absence of such an exclusion clause, Article 2.3(a) would allow a country which banned PREA and TWA in certain branches of activity to ratify the proposed draft Convention.

15. The Worker member of India pointed out that specific problems on the recruitment of workers and migrant workers in developing countries should be looked into as there were many abuses and malpractices. He also indicated that regulations presented in the draft text were not sufficient to cover these problems.

16. The Government member of Denmark stated that his country had abolished all restrictions on the operations of PREA — and placement agencies in general — in June 1990. All agencies were subject to the same rules on sound business practices as other enterprises and could charge fees for their services. In parallel, the PES had been strengthened. Liberalization had improved the servicing of the labour market, resulting in benefits for both employers and jobseekers.

17. A number of other Government members referred to the situation of employment services in their respective countries. Greece had banned PREA in 1931, except when they were non-profit-making. The Employment and Manpower Organization was the only PES. It dealt with supply and demand in the labour market, as well as the provision of vocational training and information to jobseekers. However, a new law would soon allow the establishment of employment services by employers' and workers' organizations in cooperation with the PES in order to provide free job placement and information to jobseekers. Greece did not intend drastically changing its legislation, but wished to contribute to the formulation of the new instrument, which the Government member of Greece hoped would respond to the needs on the labour market. The Government member of China pointed out that the PES in her country had been created within the framework of a socialist economy. These services had been extended by establishing agencies not only in the cities but also in rural areas. She believed that PREA could contribute towards the sound functioning of the labour market and alleviating unemployment. In Australia, PREA had been in existence since 1947 and this country had not ratified Convention No. 96. The monopoly of PES was not appropriate as they were complemented by PREA. The Government member of Australia welcomed the revision of Convention No. 96 by a non-prescriptive Convention supplemented by a more detailed Recommendation. The Government member of Lebanon recalled that after 1977, when the National Employment Bureau had been set up and made solely responsible for the recruitment and placement of workers, PREA had no longer been granted licences. The Government member of Luxembourg stated that his country had ratified Convention No. 96 in 1958 and had not found it necessary to allow PREA to operate; indeed, it had reaffirmed the monopoly of the PES. Luxembourg would not accept being compelled to abolish this monopoly. His Government would nevertheless closely follow the work of the Committee.

18. Some Government members insisted on the need for flexibility. The Government member of Japan believed that the revision of Convention No. 96 should aim at protecting workers. The new instrument should, however, be flexible in order to suit different national practices. The Government member of Ireland, while stressing the need for flexibility, pointed out that PREA were already regulated in Ireland. The Government member of Tunisia favoured the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation, on the grounds that these instruments should allow PREA to contribute to the efficiency of the labour market and protect workers against all possible abuses. The Convention should be flexible to take account of the diversity of situations; all detailed provisions should be in the Recommendation.

19. The Government member of Ethiopia stressed the importance of the Committee's agenda, not only in the context of changes in the labour market but also with regard to structural adjustment programmes in developing countries. PES could no longer cope with the number of jobseekers. But there should be appropriate safeguards to avoid exploitation of the unemployed.

20. The Government member of Niger said that his Government had created a PES and had permitted PREA to operate under regulation. However, he pointed out some problems related to PREA activities and their relations with PES. He favoured the adoption of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

21. The Chairperson, before closing the general discussion, stressed the need to find a solution to the issue of the protection of workers provided through TWA. He felt that if these workers were excluded from the scope of the proposed instrument, their protection would be delayed for an indefinite period.

Consideration of the proposed texts contained in Report IV(2)

A. Proposed Convention concerning private employment agencies

Preamble

22. An amendment was submitted by the Employer members to insert in paragraph 3 the word "obsolete" between "the" and "provisions". Introducing the amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that his group wanted to tie the text of the proposed instrument to the wording and spirit of the consensus reached at the 1994 Conference, which made it clear that Convention No. 96 was obsolete. The Worker Vice-Chairperson understood the desire of the Employers' group to create a link between the 1994 discussion and now, but felt that the insertion of such a provision would jeopardize the position of countries which had ratified Convention No. 96 and might continue to respect it. For them, Convention No. 96 was not obsolete; indeed, Argentina had ratified Convention No. 96 as late as 1996. They were therefore reluctant to insert the word "obsolete" and could not accept the amendment. The Government members from the Netherlands, Norway and Sweden supported the Workers' group. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

23. The Employer members submitted an amendment to add the following new paragraph after paragraph 3: "Being aware of the importance of flexibility in the functioning of labour markets and the reduction of the number of unemployed". They felt this would reflect the 1994 discussion. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group had great difficulty with this text since flexibility in the labour market did not reduce unemployment. Consequently, she could not support the proposed amendment. In response, the Employer Vice-Chairperson suggested a subamendment to delete the words "and the reduction of the number of unemployed" from the proposed amendment which would make it more acceptable to the Worker members. The Government members of the Netherlands and Norway supported the amendment as subamended by the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The Worker members also agreed with the proposal as subamended.

24. The proposed amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

25. The Employer members proposed an amendment to add a new paragraph after the above: "Recalling that the International Labour Conference at its 81st Session, 1994, held the view that the ILO should proceed to revise Convention No. 96, and". The Employer Vice-Chairperson stressed that this was merely a reminder of the fact that the 1994 Conference wanted a revision of Convention No. 96. The Workers' group wondered whether it was necessary to include this paragraph but in the absence of strong feelings from Government members, the amendment was adopted.

26. An amendment was proposed by the Employer members to put the word "environment", in paragraph 4, in the plural. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that the Office questionnaire used the singular, and after some discussions the amendment was withdrawn.

27. Two amendments relating to the same paragraph 5 were discussed together. The Employer members, in one amendment, proposed to insert the word "positive" to qualify the role of PREA in the labour market. In another amendment, the Worker members proposed to insert the word "supplementary" in the same context. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, in presenting his group's amendment, stressed that PREA made a positive contribution to the labour market and this had been recognized by the 1994 Conference. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed this since the role of PREA was not always positive. It was for this reason that her group proposed to insert the word "supplementary". The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted that the word "positive" might not be the best word and that was why the word "may" had been left in the text. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed that the two amendments under discussion could be combined. However, the Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Employer member of the United Kingdom preferred the word "complementary" to "supplementary", as the latter had a subordinate nuance. The Worker Vice-Chairperson was prepared to concede reluctantly to the term "positive" on the understanding that the word "supplementary" was included. The Government members of Germany, Italy and Sweden questioned whether one or both of the amendments were necessary or precise enough. There was an exchange of views between the Chairperson, the Government member of Germany, the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the Employer Vice-Chairperson on the significance of the word "supplementary" and its translation into French (complémentaire). Finally, the Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to withdraw her amendment if the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his. Both amendments were withdrawn and the Office text of paragraph 5 remained unchanged.

28. The Government member of Mauritius, seconded by the Government member of Morocco, introduced an amendment to replace "in a well-functioning labour market" by "in a functioning labour market" in paragraph 5 to widen the scope of the instrument. The amendment was not supported by the Employers' group while the Worker Vice-Chairperson was only prepared to support it if it did not change the substance of the text. Although the Government members of Italy, Morocco and the Netherlands agreed with this amendment, the Government members of the United Kingdom and Sweden preferred the original Office text. In view of the divergent positions which had emerged, and which would imply a vote, the Worker Vice-Chairperson asked the Government member of Mauritius to withdraw his amendment. The amendment was withdrawn and paragraph 5 remained unchanged.

29. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, introducing an amendment to delete the word "possible" before the word "abuses" in paragraph 6, stressed that abuses by PREA were not in doubt; this must be unequivocally acknowledged in the text, as it had been during the 1994 discussion. The Employer Vice-Chairperson went along with this in so far as protection of workers was only possible against "factual" abuses. As there was no opposition from the Government members, the amendment was adopted.

30. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed to add after paragraph 6 a new paragraph: "Recognizing the need to guarantee the right to freedom of association and to promote collective bargaining and social dialogue as necessary components of a well functioning industrial relations system." Her justification was that the flexibility of the new instrument should not undermine the basic rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining. Although the Employer Vice-Chairperson felt this was somewhat superfluous, he was prepared to accept the insertion of the new sentence in a spirit of cooperation. As the Government members did not object, the amendment was adopted.

31. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert in paragraph 8 of the original Office text the following text after the words "Recalling the provisions ...":

> ... of the Freedom of Association and the Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948; the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949; the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958; the Employment Policy Convention, 1964; the Minimum Age Convention, 1973; the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 and those ...".

She felt the need to highlight the core Conventions of the ILO as many workers did not enjoy these fundamental rights. She also proposed a subamendment to her amendment — the inclusion of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 — after "the Minimum Age Convention, 1973". The Employer Vice-Chairperson saw no objection to this; it was decided that the ultimate placing of the reference to the Convention would be left up to the Office to decide. The amendment with its subamendment was adopted.

32. The Chairperson asked the Government member of Lebanon if she still wanted to maintain her amendment which deleted paragraph 8, as this was made somewhat redundant by the adoption of the Workers' group amendment and its subamendment. The Government member of Lebanon felt that any reference to migrant workers was irrelevant in the context of the present text because they should be only a matter for the PES. The Worker Vice-Chairperson raised a point of order; she asked if this amendment had been seconded. As this was not the case, the amendment was not considered.

33. The Preamble, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 1

34. Two amendments, both seeking to delete the words "as a primary activity" were submitted, one by the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom and the other by the Workers' group. Introducing the first amendment on behalf of the Government members concerned, the Government member of the Netherlands stated that agencies providing services to the labour market as a secondary activity should not be allowed to do so without falling within the scope of appropriate legislation. The Worker members also pointed out that such "secondary activity" might involve large numbers of workers. This might encourage PREA to develop other activities in order to escape from the scope of the Convention.

35. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed with the two amendments since his group believed that the exemption of certain agencies might give rise to unfair competition. The Government member of Japan also supported the proposed amendments, provided that firms which did not carry out their services on a continuing basis should not be included under the scope of the Convention. The Employer members of the United Kingdom and the United States, as well as the Government members of Norway, Sweden and Venezuela, were concerned that the scope of the Convention would be unduly wide, ranging from newspaper advertising to organizations such as professional and educational institutions as well as research centres. The Government member of Sweden proposed to discuss Articles 1 and 2 together as they were connected.

36. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stressed that her group's intention was not to cover incidental activities in the labour market. They had submitted an amendment to exclude newspapers and similar publications. The present amendment needed to be considered in the context of Article 1.1(c). In this connection, they asked if the Office could clarify points made in the proposed text.

37. In response to the requests for clarification, a member of the secretariat explained that the term "primary activity" had been included in the text for a number of reasons. First, he drew attention to Report IV(1) of the Office which described numerous forms of intermediaries in employment. The Office wanted the Convention to be applicable to all those whose profession was to mediate in employment. Second, the proposed text under consideration had been prepared in the light of the law of numerous States which regulated labour market mediation as a primary activity. Third, he referred to the Office questionnaire to which many member States had replied. Whereas a majority of replies had shown preference for the inclusion of the words "as a primary activity", it was to be noted that still many other replies had raised objections in this respect. He also drew attention to the comments made by the Office (Report IV(2), page 26) which concluded that the final wording of this provision was a point deserving close attention by the Conference.

38. The Government member of Denmark referred to the situation in which a large enterprise carried out the cited services as supplementary activities. Even if they did not constitute its primary activity, they might nevertheless be very significant because of the size of the enterprise. He then proposed a subamendment to substitute the word "primary" by "ordinary". This would imply that recruitment was not an exceptional activity. This was supported by the Government member of Japan.

39. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that after consultations with the Worker members, it had been decided that they would maintain their position on the proposed amendment. She realized that the debate had raised points which appeared problematic, but these were only of a superficial nature and would be dispensed with once the matter had been looked into more closely. The Workers' group felt that the concerns raised were not well founded. She explained that it would be an exaggerated reading of the text to say that it included all firms. One way of allaying the fears, she felt, would be to reflect fully the points of the debate in the report of the meeting. There would be an opportunity to elaborate further on the matter during discussions of the Recommendation and she did not wish to have any "artificial" disagreements at this stage.

40. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of the Netherlands also said that they would abide by their proposed amendment. She recognized that there might be some problems but felt that these could be handled under Article 2. The Employer Vice-Chairperson restated that they had no objections to the amendment.

41. The amendment was adopted.

Subparagraph (b)

42. The Government member of Norway proposed an amendment to delete subparagraph (b) which was seconded by the Government members of Denmark, Germany, the Netherlands and Austria. The Government member of Norway explained that the activities of TWA should not fall under the scope of a Convention on fee-charging employment agencies since they were treated differently in the national legislation of many countries. In the opinion of Norway, since the original Convention No. 96 did not apply to the temporary hiring out of workers, the new revised instrument should not extend to these services. He recognized, however, that there was strong support from the Workers' and Employers' groups for the inclusion of these services. He was therefore prepared to withdraw his proposed amendment if Articles 2 and 3 were retained, under which the legal status of PREA would be determined by each country in accordance with its national legislation. The amendment was withdrawn.

43. Another amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon proposing the addition of "provided that such services are directed to national workers only and with the guidance of the Public Employment Bureau" to the subparagraph was not seconded and therefore not considered.

44. The subparagraph remained unchanged.

New subparagraph after subparagraph (b)

45. An amendment was submitted by the Government member of Lebanon proposing the insertion of a new subparagraph as follows: "Private employment agencies must follow the unified classifications and job descriptions as determined by the competent authority all over the country place." This amendment was not seconded and therefore not considered.

Subparagraph (c)

46. The Employer members proposed an amendment to delete this subparagraph. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that while his group was mindful of the concern of the Workers' group about abuses committed by the PREA, they felt that the Convention should not include activities of lesser significance. He said the definition of PREA should be meaningful and set limits, otherwise, it would only create unnecessary bureaucracy.

47. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that subparagraph (c) was necessary and should be seen in the context of the discussion in 1994 when it was felt that Convention No. 96 was not broad enough to cover the full range of services already available on the labour market. She understood that the Office had included subparagraph (c) precisely to address the rapidly changing nature of these services. The report of the Office had identified 18 types of PREA and this subparagraph was an attempt to ensure that the evolution of the labour market was taken into consideration. The Workers' group would not wish to see exceptions and exemptions but recognized the need for flexibility. It felt that Article 2 already provided such flexibility. She stressed that subparagraph (c) reflected recognition that the revised Convention should not only address the present but also the future trends in the evolution of services in the labour market.

48. The Government members of Croatia, Denmark, Germany and the Netherlands supported the Employers' proposal while the Government members of Belgium, Finland and France supported the view of the Workers' group that the Office text should be kept. The Government member of Japan supported the original text under the assumption that training is not included in the service referred to in Article 1.1(c).

49. Several compromise texts proposed by the Employer member of the United Kingdom and the Government members of Austria and the Netherlands were not taken up by the Committee.

50. In trying to reach a compromise, the Worker members proposed a subamendment to ensure that governments would have the opportunity of determining which services would be covered by the subparagraph after consultations with the social partners. They proposed inserting the words "which shall be determined by the competent authority after consultations with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations" after "other services relating to jobseeking".

51. The Government members of Denmark and Croatia suggested two subamendments to the Workers' subamendment, namely the deletion of "relating to jobseeking" and "which shall be". The Government member of Denmark also proposed a subamendment to delete the reference to the "provision of information". The Committee accepted the proposal to delete from the modified text the words "which shall be" but did not accept the other two subamendments.

52. The subparagraph, as subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 2

53. A proposed amendment to this paragraph submitted by the Government member of Lebanon to insert the words "and unemployed workers" after "jobseekers" was not seconded and therefore not considered.

54. Paragraph 2 remained unchanged.

55. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon to insert "provided that the processing of personal data and the respect of privacy of workers are treated in accordance with national law" was not seconded and therefore not considered.

56. Another amendment proposing the insertion of "provided the data is in a structured form and can be accessed according to specific criteria" at the end of paragraph 3 was submitted by the Government member of the Netherlands on behalf of the Member States of the EU. The Government members of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom explained that their intention was to make sure that manual records would be covered in the instrument if the information was organized in a way which made it retrievable while linked to individuals.

57. The Employer and Worker members said that the text was somewhat obscure as to the actual aim of the amendment. They found the actual wording rather vague and preferred the Office text. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the governments concerned, withdrew the proposed amendment.

58. The paragraph was adopted without change.

New paragraph after paragraph 3

59. The Worker members submitted an amendment proposing the insertion of the following new paragraph: "For the purpose of this Convention, the term 'private employment agency' does not include newspapers or other publications unless they are published wholly or mainly for the purpose of acting as intermediaries between employers and workers." Introducing this amendment, the Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that this text had been taken from Convention No. 96. She proposed a subamendment to take account of recent changes relating to electronic media such as the Internet, by inserting a reference to "electronic and other forms of media".

60. The Employer members questioned whether this amendment was necessary in the light of the text adopted in subparagraph 1(c) which allowed governments to determine services to be excluded after the necessary consultations. The Worker members, consequently, agreed to withdraw this proposed amendment.

61. Article 1, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 2

62. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon to insert "where private employment agencies are authorized to operate" was not seconded and therefore not considered.

63. Concerning the legal scope of paragraph 3, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that the purpose of the Office text was to allow member States to exclude from the scope of the revised Convention certain categories of workers and branches of economic activity, as well as the services identified in Article 1.1(c). The intention was, as stated by the ILO Legal Adviser, to give greater flexibility to the Convention which would make it more widely ratifiable, and to adapt it to the diversity and changing character of the labour market. The replies to the ILO questionnaire gave several examples of possible exclusions such as the placement of seafarers and au pairs. She noted that the legal effects of exclusion could give rise to different interpretations. According to the first interpretation, the legal implication of this exclusion would be to allow member States to ban activities of PREA with respect to certain categories of workers and branches of economic activity. According to the second interpretation, the same text could imply the exclusion of certain categories of workers and branches of economic activity from the obligations imposed by the Convention on agencies referred to under Article 1.1, notably placement services and TWA. A number of replies to questions Nos. 5 and 6 in the ILO questionnaire went in this direction. Whichever interpretation was retained, the text did not allow a total exclusion from the Convention of services covered under Article 1.1(a) and (b). Only services such as the provisions of information or other services envisaged under Article 1.1(c) were liable to be totally excluded from the scope of the Convention. Thus, as shown by the discussions on the previous day, there were two possible interpretations and it was up to the Committee to determine which interpretation it wished to retain.

64. The Worker Vice-Chairperson appreciated that the representative of the Secretary-General was attempting to introduce clarity, but she noted that her explanation differed radically from what the Legal Adviser had said at the previous day's sitting. According to the Legal Adviser the provision of Article 2.3(a) meant that PREA could be banned from certain activities and he did not indicate an alternative interpretation. The Workers' group had based its discussion of the proposed amendments on the Legal Adviser's interpretation — and it had not anticipated any alternative interpretation. Although she recognized and agreed with the representative of the Secretary-General and the Chairperson that the role of the Committee was to agree on the text, she regretted that the possibility of a new interpretation had introduced an element of confusion.

65. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to delete paragraph 3. His group had taken this position because it felt that paragraph 3 could be interpreted to mean that the authorities would be allowed to ban PREA from operating in certain branches of economic activity — and the Employers were opposed to such bans. However, they were now in a dilemma as to how to proceed in view of the interpretations of subparagraph (a), namely that it would make it possible to exempt PREA from the application of the provisions of the revised Convention. He asked for a further clarification from the Office.

66. At the request of the Chairperson and after consultation with the Legal Adviser, the representative of the Secretary-General indicated that there was no contradiction between the statement made by the Legal Adviser and her own. The aim was to allow flexibility so that member States could ratify the Convention more easily. The explanation given by the Legal Adviser was intended to illustrate one possible interpretation. However, in the light of the deliberations of the Committee, there was clearly a possibility of different interpretations. It was now up to the Committee to decide on how they should interpret this provision. The Chairperson agreed with this position and said that the Committee would have to decide on the scope of Article 2.

67. The Government member of Sweden stated that both interpretations could be valid at the same time. Reminding the Committee that the 1994 discussions had focused on ways to ensure flexibility, the revised Convention could provide for both a ban and an exemption. At this point the Government member of Croatia urged the Committee to adopt a wording that would not leave any doubt as to the interpretation.

68. The Government member of Germany believed that a provision relating to the ban of certain services was superfluous; member States ratifying the Convention could settle the issue under their own national legislation, as provided for under Article 3.

69. The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that the reason for revising Convention No. 96 was to open up the possibility for PREA to operate. She interpreted Article 2 as an attempt to identify the circumstances under which the PREA might be limited in their sphere of activity to certain categories of workers or certain branches of economic activity.

70. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that it was impossible to avoid both interpretations, and that an element of uncertainty would remain irrespective of whether or not they accepted or rejected paragraph 3. The Employers' group withdrew their amendment but favoured moving towards the Swedish amendment to paragraph 3 which seemed to respond to the concerns of his group.

71. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to replace paragraph 3 by the following text:

> After consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, the competent authority may: (a) prohibit private employment agencies from operating in respect of certain categories of workers or branches of economic activity in the provision of one or more of the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1; (b) exclude from the scope of application of the Convention the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1(c).

Introducing the amendment, she stated that the Convention was opening up the possibility for PREA to operate alongside PES. She was, however, concerned by the extent and effect of such rapid changes. Indeed, the situation was evolving from a situation of monopoly of PES to one in which PREA could operate freely. Paragraph 3, as amended, should be read in the context of the two preceding paragraphs which set out the wide scope of the Convention. It gave governments the possibility of narrowing down the application of the Convention. For social, economic and public policy reasons, some governments might want to prohibit agencies from operating in certain sectors. The Workers felt that this flexibility was necessary to enable the Convention to be widely ratified. Their text was offered as an alternative to the Office text.

72. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that this amendment seemed to be based on the premise that restrictions and exclusions would exist alongside each other; he felt, however, that the thrust should be on opening up the possibility for PREA to operate, which was implicit in the amendment submitted by the Government member of Sweden. The Convention was unnecessary in cases in which there was already adequate protection for workers. His group also wanted the word "exempt" included instead of "exclude", since this gave a more precise meaning to the text.

73. The Government members of Germany and Ireland found the Workers' text clearer but more restrictive. They felt that governments would have difficulties ratifying the Convention if the Workers' amendment on the entire paragraph 3 was adopted. The Government member of Sweden felt that the proposal of the Workers' group "to prohibit" PREA from operating in respect of certain categories of workers or branches of economic activity, was not in line with the 1994 discussions which aimed at increasing the transparency and the flexibility of Convention No. 96.

74. The Government member of Sweden submitted a subamendment to replace the words "the competent authority" by "a Member" in the introductory sentence of the Workers' amendment to replace paragraph 3; such an exclusion would require changes in legislation.

75. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a subamendment to add a new introductory sentence to the Workers' amendment: "Members ratifying this Convention shall permit the operations of private employment agencies." This sentence should precede any mention of restrictions in order to highlight the positive contribution of PREA to a well-functioning labour market. The Worker Vice-Chairperson indicated that her group would not accept any proposal which placed the onus on member States to promote PREA.

76. The Government member of Morocco, referring to the amendment submitted by the Workers' group, felt that two complementary notions were being debated: firstly, the exclusion from the scope of the instrument of certain services and categories of workers; and, secondly, the exclusion of PREA from certain branches of economic activity. Paragraph 3 could be drafted as follows:

> The competent authority may: (a) exclude from the application of the Convention certain categories of workers and certain branches of economic activity and/or certain services referred to in Article 1.1; and (b) exclude from the activities of PREA certain categories of workers and branches of economic activity and/or certain services referred to in Article 1.1.

77. The Chairperson recalled that the discussion was on the subamendment submitted by the Employers' group and therefore the Moroccan proposal could not be accepted for discussion.

Subparagraph (a)

78. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to replace the Office text with: "prohibit private employment agencies from operating in respect of certain categories of workers or branches of economic activity in the provision of one or more of the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1".

79. The Employer member from the United Kingdom indicated that, on the one hand, the Committee was deregulating and accepting that PREA contribute to the functioning of the labour market but that, on the other hand, the Workers' amendment wanted to put a limitation on a whole range of PREA. In his view, attention should be focused on ways to limit abuses and subparagraph (a) should offer a sensible framework for regulation of the activities of PREA.

80. The Government member of the Netherlands felt that it was illogical and somewhat surprising that a Convention setting out to regulate the activities of PREA started by prohibiting them. He asked whether it would be possible to limit the restrictions to cases in which industrial relations were being endangered and where workers were unprotected. The Government member of Lebanon pointed out that the Office text of Article 2(2), by stipulating that the Convention should apply to all branches of economic activity, could also include the public sector. It was therefore important that member States should be allowed to exclude certain branches of activity from its scope.

81. The Employer Vice-Chairperson claimed that it would not be logical to prohibit certain PREA. The Convention should aim at regulating the work of the PREA, especially where there was a threat of serious damage to the well-being of the workers.

82. The Government member of Sweden introduced a subamendment which replaced the word "prohibit" by "exclude". The proposal was supported by the Employers' group, even though the Employer member of the United Kingdom thought that the word "exempt" would be a better term. The Workers' group considered favourably the Swedish subamendment.

83. The Employer members proposed a subamendment which added the following sentence at the end of the Workers' amendment: "when the application of the Convention raises special problems or risks of a substantial nature".

84. The Government member of Sweden found that the subamendment of the Employers' group was unacceptable because it would amount to an infringement of the powers of governments to legislate.

Subparagraph (b)

85. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed an amendment to replace the Office text with: "exclude from the scope of application of the Convention the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1(c)".

86. The Government member of Sweden recalled that the 1994 discussions had been about flexibility and ways to adapt Convention No. 96 to varying national conditions. However, the Workers' amendment only provided for one option — and that was to prohibit PREA. He suggested a subamendment to replace the Workers' amendment as follows: "exclude one or more of the services, provided that the workers concerned are covered by the protections applying to workers generally under national law". The idea of this subamendment was to introduce the possibility of excluding such bodies as subcontractors and rental firms from the Convention in cases in which workers had much wider coverage under other legislation. After all, the main idea behind the Convention was not to regulate PREA but to provide protection for workers.

87. The Government member of Croatia supported the Swedish subamendment as she felt that certain PREA could be excluded from the Convention by the national authorities under Article 1.1(c). Therefore, specifying their exclusion from the scope of the Convention was superfluous. The Worker Vice-Chairperson acknowledged that her group's amendment to subparagraph (b) was now superfluous following the adoption of an amendment to Article 1.1(c).

88. The Government members of Belgium, Ireland and Norway agreed with the Workers' amendment as subamended by Sweden since this text provided the necessary flexibility.

89. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that she was not entirely in agreement with the Swedish subamendment. This would imply that member States could ratify the Convention and then exclude all services defined under Article 1.1(c), with the caveat of worker protection. She proposed a first sub-subamendment to the Swedish subamendment on subparagraph (b) which read as follows: "exclude certain categories of workers from one or more provisions of the Convention, provided that there is adequate protection otherwise available for the workers concerned". She believed that exclusion should not be focused on services but rather on certain categories of workers such as professional sportspersons, actors and artists. The aim of the Convention was surely to provide a broad framework of protection against the abuse of workers by PREA.

90. The Government member of Sweden felt that there was a problem with the concept of excluding certain categories of workers. After all, the Convention set out to protect workers — it was therefore illogical to talk about exclusion. The focus should rather be on certain businesses or practices.

91. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted a second sub-subamendment to replace the words "exclude certain categories of workers" by "exclude workers in certain branches or sectors of the economy or part thereof".

92. To facilitate the discussions, the spokesperson of the Employers' group restated its sub-subamendments to paragraph 3 as follows:

> Member states ratifying this Convention shall permit the operations of private employment agencies. After consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, the competent authority may:
> (a) exclude private employment agencies from operating in respect of certain categories of workers or branches of economic activity in the provision of one or more of the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1, when application of the Convention raises special problems or risks of a substantial nature;
> (b) exclude workers in certain branches or sectors of the economy, or parts thereof from one or more provisions of the Convention, provided that there is adequate protection otherwise available for the workers concerned.

93. To take account of discussions on the amendment, subamendments and sub-subamendments proposed by the Workers' and Employers' groups and the Government member of Sweden, the Chairperson proposed the following amendment to the Office text on paragraph 3:

A Member which ratifies this Convention shall allow the operations of private employment agencies within the framework of the provisions of this Convention. After consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, it may:

(a) prohibit private employment agencies from operating in respect of certain categories of workers or branches of economic activity in the provision of one or more of the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1;

(b) exclude certain categories of workers from the scope of the Convention, or from certain of its provisions, provided that appropriate protection is otherwise made available for the workers concerned.

94. The Worker Vice-Chairperson commended the Office's worthy attempt to capture the main points of the discussion. Her group agreed more or less except for the word "shall" in the introductory sentence and proposed to change it to "may".

95. The Employer Vice-Chairperson thought that the whole idea of the work of the Committee was to open up PREA activities. He could not understand why the Committee was now discussing restrictions on these activities. In fact, the whole Article, as it now stood, was going in the opposite direction from the conclusions reached in the 1994 discussions — which aimed at more openness and flexibility.

96. The Government member of Sweden found the Chairperson's proposal helpful; he thought that the Committee was moving towards some sort of a solution but he was surprised that no account had been taken of the subamendment he had submitted on subparagraph (b).

97. The Government members of Austria, France and Norway also had difficulties with the word "shall" in the introductory sentence in view of their respective legislation on PREA. They doubted whether countries could ratify the Convention with the word "shall" in the text.

98. The Government member of Germany could understand why the governments had reservations with the Office text. He felt that the term "prohibit" had no place in the Convention. He also indicated that the word "shall" balanced the restrictions contained in Article 2. After all, if a member State was intending ratifying the Convention, it should have made up its mind beforehand whether or not it authorized PREA.

99. The Government member of Croatia indicated that no government would have any problem with subparagraph (a) — but it did not have any place in this Convention. A compromise would not give a good text.

100. The Government member of Morocco recalled the need for a flexible instrument to make the Convention ratifiable and thought that the word "authorize" would be a more appropriate term than "allow". He also proposed a subamendment to insert in subparagraph (b) the words "and certain economic activities" after "certain categories of workers". The Government member of Lebanon thought that it should be forbidden for PREA to intervene in the field of activities of the PES. She felt that PREA should be subject to licensing and registration and she supported the word "prohibit" in subparagraph (a).

101. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained why his group was so concerned with the words "shall allow". They felt that Article 2.3 only talked about restrictions. The word "shall" was to counter what he considered to be the excessive restrictions in subparagraph (a). After all, he wondered why the Committee was sitting to examine the adoption of a Convention on PREA, when all they seemed to be doing was to restrict their activity.

102. The Worker Vice-Chairperson reacted by saying that the role of the Committee was to revise Convention No. 96 — which provided for the abolition of PREA. It had been agreed in 1994 that there was a need to update and revise the Convention to take account of labour market realities and to allow PES and PREA to exist alongside each other; the idea was not to promote the activities of PREA but to protect working conditions. Her group could not accept that the Convention be used for the promotion of PREA activities. Moreover, it was not the role of the ILO to promote the development of PREA but the protection of workers. Therefore, her group could not and would not accept any wording which resulted in serving the interests of the private economic sector. Most of the Governments had stressed they did not want to be compelled to allow PREA to operate.

103. The Employer Vice-Chairperson clarified a misunderstanding on why his group was opposed to the words "may allow" proposed by the Workers' group. His group was not "wedded" to the term "shall allow"; they only wanted it to temper subparagraph (a). He recalled that in the discussions in 1994, the Committee had concluded that "well-functioning PREA could most certainly contribute to the effective functioning of the labour market".

104. The Chairperson introduced the following subamendment to his amendment on paragraph 3 which might be a compromise between the Workers' and Employers' groups:

> One purpose of this Convention is to allow the operation of private employment agencies, within the framework of its provisions. After consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, a Member may:
> (a) exclude, under specific circumstances, private employment agencies from operating in respect of certain categories of workers or branches of economic activity in the provision of one or more of the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1;
> (b) exclude certain categories of workers or occupational sectors of the economy from the scope of the Convention, or from certain of its provisions, provided that appropriate protection is otherwise made available for the workers concerned.

105. The Workers' group proposed a sub-subamendment to the Chairperson's subamendment on paragraph 3 as follows:

> One purpose of this Convention is to allow the operation of private employment agencies as well as the protection of the workers using their services, within the framework of its provisions. After consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, a Member may:
> (a) exclude, under specific circumstances, private employment agencies from operating in respect of certain categories of workers or branches of economic activity in the provision of one or more of the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1;
> (b) exclude, under specific circumstances, workers in certain branches of economic activity, or parts thereof, from the scope of the Convention or from certain of its provisions, provided that adequate protection is otherwise made available for the workers concerned.

The Employers' group agreed to the Workers' sub-subamendment to the Chairperson's amendment and subamendment of paragraph 3

106. The Government members of Belgium and Lebanon withdrew their respective amendments.

107. Paragraph 3, as amended, subamended and sub-subamended, was adopted.

108. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that this amendment to delete the paragraph had been submitted in line with their amendment to the previous paragraph. As a consequence of the Committee's decision on paragraph 3, this amendment was withdrawn.

109. Two amendments to replace the words "in its first report" by "in the reports" and by "in reports" had been submitted by the Government member of the Netherlands on behalf of the Member States of the EU and by the Government member of Canada, seconded by Ethiopia. The Worker Vice-Chairperson suggested a subamendment to replace "in its first report" by "in its reports", which was supported by the Employers' group.

110. The Government member of the Netherlands explained that these amendments, if adopted, would imply that governments of ratifying States would have to report on exclusions. These exclusions could change over time in the light of prevailing market conditions. It was for this reason that every time an exclusion was introduced, it should be reported after consultation with the social partners. The Government member of Canada agreed with this explanation.

111. The Government member of Lebanon asked for clarification as to how exclusions would have to be reported, especially if they could be modified.

112. The Chairperson explained that it was normal practice only to make amendments with a view to improving social protection; they should not imply a step backwards in this area.

113. The Government members of Norway, Spain and Sweden were of the opinion that governments should be left free to modify their exclusions in the light of evolving conditions in the labour market. They would prefer having the freedom to introduce new exclusions or eliminate existing ones. The Employer members agreed with this position, stating that governments should be entitled to adopt both approaches.

114. The Worker members acknowledged there was consensus on the amendment. They considered that the point did not call for further discussion.

115. Paragraph 4 was therefore adopted as amended and subamended.

116. Article 2 was adopted as amended, subamended and sub-subamended.

117. The Employer members withdrew their amendment to delete and replace Article 3 by: "The activities of private employment agencies shall be permitted in accordance with the standards established by this Convention. National law and practice will determine their legal status." The issues it proposed for inclusion had already been incorporated in Article 2 as adopted.

118. The Government member of Japan, seconded by the Workers' group, submitted an amendment to insert at the end of the Office text of Article 3 the following words: "and after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers". The Government member of Japan, introducing his amendment, stressed that the objective of the Convention was to protect workers and that consultation with employers' and workers' organizations was therefore a prerequisite to the adoption of appropriate measures.

119. The Government member of the United States sought clarification as to whether the consultations envisaged under the Japanese amendment would be necessary if a country already had an established system for PREA consultation and, if such was the case, whether such consultations with the social partners would be required before the country could implement the Convention. The Government member of Japan clarified that the proposed amendment would no longer make tripartite consultations an obligation if the system of PREA already existed. This amendment was intended for countries where such a system was not yet established or in operation.

120. The Employer members had no objection to the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

New paragraph

121. The Worker members originally submitted an amendment which replaced Article 3 by: "Where private employment agencies have been or are to be established, they shall be operated within the territory of a Member only in conformity with a system of licencing or certification or other form of regulation." Introducing the amendment, the Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that this amendment was one of the most important. It was essential to provide a mechanism to ensure that the objectives of the Convention could be met. It would be impossible to eliminate the universally recognized abuses and malpractices unless there was a mechanism for monitoring the activities of PREA. This was not acknowledged in the Office text which simply provided for the status quo. If the concern was to provide protection to workers, there inevitably had to be a monitoring mechanism. The amendment took into account the varying conditions which applied in different parts of the world. Some countries had licensing systems; however, that was not the only option and the proposed text left member States the flexibility to choose the most effective mechanism. This was also an area which could be regulated by collective agreement. It was vital to attain a balance between entitlement to operate and worker protection — and this could only be achieved by adopting this amendment.

122. The Employer Vice-Chairperson referred to the previous intervention of the Danish Government member who had described the system in his country. In Denmark private employment agencies were regulated in the same way as other businesses. In addition, the 1994 meeting warned of the dangers of over-regulation. This amendment did not allow for systems in which private employment agencies could be regulated in the same way as any other business and in a manner which was satisfactory. The Employers' group felt therefore that this amendment was too restrictive and preferred the formulation suggested by the Government members of the Member States of the European Union in another amendment.

123. The Worker Vice-Chairperson did not feel that the position of the Employers' group was in line with the conclusions of the 1994 Conference. It failed to take account of countries which did not have strong trade unions and highly developed systems for regulating business activity. This Convention was not aiming at countries where conditions were ideal. It had to address the needs of workers who were being abused in countries where there was inadequate protection. She recalled the string of abuses to which reference had been made earlier in the meeting. In addition, abuses were not restricted to developing countries, but also occurred in countries with sophisticated monitoring systems. She drew the Committee's attention to the wording of the amendment based on a provision in the Recruitment and Placement of Seafarers Convention (No. 179), which had been adopted by the ILO in 1996. If this provision was appropriate for seafarers why should it not apply to other categories of workers?

124. Several Government members, including Australia, Denmark, Germany and the Netherlands found the proposal of the Workers' group too restrictive and believed that Articles 8 and 11 of the proposed text for the Convention provided the necessary safeguards for workers. They felt that governments required flexibility in regulating their own affairs and that self-regulation had proved effective in a number of countries.

125. The Government members of Papua New Guinea, South Africa and the Republic of Korea acknowledged the relevance and advantage of the amendment of the Workers' group in countries which had no national legislation regulating PREA to prevent worker abuse. However, they were in favour of flexibility and a balance between protection and freedom to operate in order to make the Convention more ratifiable.

126. The Government member of Morocco pointed out that according to replies to the ILO questionnaire, PREA in most countries — with few exceptions — were registered or regulated either for legal reasons or statistical purposes. He proposed a subamendment to add the words "and conditions of operations" after "the legal status".

127. The Employer member of the United Kingdom and the Government members of Croatia and Germany found that it was inappropriate to compare the situation of seafarers with that of PREA. Seafarers represented a limited category of workers who were recruited and placed internationally, whereas PREA dealt with the entire spectrum of workers and were subject to the laws of the country in which they operated. The Government member of Croatia proposed a subamendment as follows: "Private employment agencies shall operate only in conformity with a system of licensing."

128. The Employer member of the United Kingdom pointed out that according to the Office text, PREA would only be able to operate within their national boundaries and this would constitute a serious limitation — particularly in the European Union. The Government member of the United Kingdom was concerned about the regulation of PREA operating outside national boundaries, for example those using the Internet, and the degree of extraterritoriality implied in the exercise of the law.

129. Replying to the Government member of the United Kingdom, the Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed willingness to subamend the amendment if an appropriate wording to cover the activities of PREA outside national boundaries could be found. She explained that her reference to the Recruitment and Placement of Seafarers Convention, 1996 (No. 179) was to illustrate that the language was already part of ILO standards. She appealed to governments which were looking only at their own situation to reflect on ways to tackle the abuses which existed in other countries.

130. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, taking account of all the views expressed by the Committee, proposed a subamendment to her amendment for Article 3. It consisted of adding to the Office text a new second paragraph: "A Member shall determine the conditions governing the operation of private employment agencies in accordance with a system of licensing or certification except where they are otherwise regulated by appropriate national law and practice." It had been apparent from the previous discussions that the activities of PREA in a number of countries were adequately regulated by company law; there was therefore no need to institute a parallel law. This wording would allow countries to continue with existing arrangements; but it would also, from the point of view of the Workers' group, include countries where there were no arrangements. Any ratifying member State would be bound to introduce some sort of mechanism of control.

131. The Employer Vice-Chairperson thought there might be two ways of interpreting this subamendment. It could be understood to mean that there should always be some sort of licensing system for PREA; or it could be interpreted as meaning that a system of licensing should only be introduced in cases in which there were no satisfactory arrangements under existing or company law. His group could only accept this wording if it implied the second interpretation.

132. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that she had intended the second interpretation. The subamendment would only impose an obligation for specific measures in cases in which PREA operated within an unsatisfactory legal framework, which did not provide sufficient safeguards against abuses and fraudulent practices.

133. The Government member of Sweden was concerned about the term "regulated". He submitted a sub-subamendment to replace "regulated" by "adequately determined".

134. The Government members of Austria and France felt that the subamendment of the Workers' group was constructive and covered both the Workers' and Employers' points of view.

135. The Government member of Spain proposed a sub-subamendment to replace the words "regulated by appropriate national law and practice" by "covered by appropriate legislation" to allow those countries which had no legislation on the matter to be able to regulate in the future. For instance, Spain did not authorize PREA and allowance had to be made for the transition from a system of monopoly to one of liberalization.

136. The Government members of Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Ireland, Italy, Lebanon, the Netherlands, Norway and Venezuela agreed with the subamendment of the Workers' group. The Government members of Denmark and the Netherlands asked that the Drafting Committee should look into the difference between "regulated" and "adequately determined". The Government member of Denmark thought that these two words were very much interchangeable but suggested "covered by".

137. The Chairperson pointed out that it was not the role of the Drafting Committee to deal with a matter of substance; it could only deal with the actual legal language involved.

138. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed with the Government member of Denmark that "covered" might be more in the spirit of what was implied by this Article.

139. The Worker Vice-Chairperson thought that by changing the word "regulated" to "covered" the Committee was moving away from the consensus they had reached. She had understood from the previous discussions that most of the countries felt that PREA were adequately covered; this did not have to be spelled out again in the text. She had no intention of allowing any changes to be made to the substance of the Workers' subamendment.

140. Given the support of the Employers' group and the majority of Government members, the amendment and subamendment of the Workers' group to Article 3 were adopted.

141. In the light of the adoption of the amendment and subamendment of the Workers' group, the amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States was not considered. The Government member of Lebanon also withdrew her amendment.

142. Article 3, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

New Article after Article 3

143. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment which added a new Article after Article 3.

144. The Workers' group introduced the following new paragraph as an amendment: "Measures shall be taken to ensure that the workers recruited by private employment agencies providing the services referred to in Article 1 are guaranteed the right to freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively." This reflected the 1994 discussions on malpractice of freedom of association and collective bargaining. The amendment ensured that these fundamental rights of workers, already stated in the Preamble, be included in the Convention on PREA.

145. The Employers' group agreed with the spirit of the amendment even though they felt that the fundamental rights of freedom of association and collective bargaining were covered by other Conventions and that workers were sufficiently protected by these Conventions. They also had some difficulties with the word "guaranteed" and proposed a subamendment to replace this word by "not denied" as it was very difficult for governments and/or intermediaries to guarantee that workers under PREA had these fundamental rights.

146. The Workers' group appreciated the acknowledgement by the Employers' group that these issues were important and the subamendment suggested by them represented a possible compromise. Several Government members also supported the Employers' subamendment.

147. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

148. Paragraph 1, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

149. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced the following new paragraph as an amendment: "Private employment agencies shall not make workers available to a user enterprise to replace workers of that enterprise who are exercising their right to strike." She also proposed a first subamendment to replace the words "a user enterprise" by "an enterprise", which would include the replacement of workers either on a temporary or permanent basis. This new paragraph dealt with PREA which could be used to undermine the parties to labour disputes, for example, to break strikes — thus undermining the rights laid down in Conventions No. 87 and No.98. The Workers' group felt that it should be specifically stated that PREA could not be used to undermine the fundamental rights spelled out in paragraph 1. The group had taken the wording for this amendment from Paragraph 4 of the Recommendation because they felt that it should be in the text of the Convention. The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that Report IV(1) prepared by the Office gave details of improving practice by means other than legislation, and cited the code established by the International Confederation of Temporary Work Businesses (CIETT) according to which: "Temporary staff shall not knowingly be assigned to work on premises where a labour dispute is in progress unless the authorized representatives of all parties to the labour dispute have been given advance notice of, and are in general agreement with, such assignment." This was an example of a best practice already followed by the industry. Consequently, she expected support from the Employer members on this new paragraph.

150. According to the Employer Vice-Chairperson, the problem was that there was no universally acknowledged right to strike; and in countries where it was recognized, certain governments did not interfere since the right to strike depended on the collective bargaining process. Employers might undertake under collective agreement not to replace striking workers by workers sent by PREA, but the Employers' group could not agree that all employers could be compelled to take such a position.

151. The Government member of Sweden already found that this concept was difficult to contain in a Recommendation; it was even more difficult in the case of a Convention because some governments found it problematic to guarantee the right to organize and bargain collectively. It was extremely difficult to impose this duty on intermediaries. This matter had already been dealt with in the Preamble and, as far as Sweden was concerned, that wording would suffice. In Sweden, the Government did not interfere in bargaining and disputes between parties; moreover, the PES were obliged, in the interests of neutrality, to continue providing their services in a labour dispute. The Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), had no similar provisions and this reflected the principle of neutrality. Workers involved in a legal strike kept their jobs and could not be replaced permanently. Sweden therefore rejected the amendment because it would not be able to ratify the resulting Convention.

152. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced a second subamendment: "Private employment agencies shall not make workers available to an enterprise to replace workers who are on strike in that enterprise." This subamendment was supported by the Government members of Austria, Belgium, France and Spain.

153. The Employers' group stressed that governments should not interfere in labour disputes and that this neutrality should be reflected in the Convention.

154. The Government member of Denmark felt that the key word was neutrality; this implied that PREA should stop supplying workers to enterprises in a state of conflict. Other countries, however, did exactly the opposite in the name of neutrality. He therefore proposed a third subamendment to paragraph 2: "Members should adopt all necessary measures to ensure that private employment agencies maintain neutrality in labour conflicts when exercising their activities."

155. The Government member of Germany understood the spirit of paragraph 2. However, the text did not fully correspond to German law and therefore, if adopted, his country would have difficulties ratifying the Convention as it would limit TWA activities compared to those of the PES.

156. The Chairperson reminded the Committee that irrespective of whether or not member States had ratified Conventions No. 87 and No. 98, the Committee on Freedom of Association could call upon any member State in which agencies supplied workers to replace strikers to give account of their actions.

157. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a fourth subamendment to insert at the beginning of paragraph 2: "Having due regard to the autonomy of the parties concerned, private employment agencies shall not make workers available to an enterprise to replace workers who are on strike in that enterprise." Her group agreed that the parties were autonomous and did not mean to imply that there was a role for governments to interfere. The problem was that many national systems had been cited as examples but the Convention had to be universal and her group was seeking wording to that effect.

158. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the third subamendment advanced by the Danish Government since it met the two considerations of preventing PREA from replacing striking workers while ensuring that public authorities did not interfere. He suggested a sub-subamendment to this subamendment by replacing the words "maintain neutrality" by "do not interfere". It was supported by the Government member of Norway who felt, however, that there should be no implication of legal obligation on member States; the onus should be on the social partners.

159. The Worker Vice-Chairperson asked if the Employers could reflect on the fourth subamendment that the Workers' group had proposed. The Danish subamendment referred to a concept which was specific to a number of countries; it would not be relevant to all systems. However, she did agree with the Employers' group that parties concerned should remain autonomous.

160. The Government member of Canada felt that the whole issue of replacement of workers was very controversial; this Convention was about placement agencies not industrial relations. She proposed a sub-subamendment to the fourth subamendment of the Workers' group by adding at the end of the paragraph: "where national law and practice so provides".

161. The Government member of the Netherlands felt that the concept of neutrality was too vague in the Convention. She agreed with the amendment by the Workers' group as subamended and sub-subamended.

162. The Government member of Finland was against any reference to national legislation; this would make it impossible to ratify the Convention. Both the PES and PREA had to be neutral and stay outside this "trite" situation.

163. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that governments could not undertake any legal obligation to ensure neutrality. He preferred the words "do not interfere" to "maintain neutrality". He could accept the sub-subamendment proposed by the Canadian Government.

164. The Worker Vice-Chairperson found the reference to national law and practice unacceptable; if everything was left up to national legislation, the ILO would have no role to play. She did, however, agree with the Employer Vice-Chairperson that there should be a movement away from "neutrality". She proposed a fifth subamendment to replace paragraph 2: "Having due regard to the autonomy of the workers concerned, private employment agencies shall not interfere by making workers available to an enterprise to replace workers of that enterprise who are exercising their right to strike." The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that his group could accept this more or less — but could not accept the legal obligation. The Chairperson stated that he was perplexed as to the terminology and understood that "autonomy" implied neutrality. The Worker Vice-Chairperson clarified the meaning of "autonomy". She felt that a situation in which "one might or might not" take a particular line was not, as far as the Workers were concerned, neutral. PREA should not be allowed to intervene and break up strikes.

165. The Employer member of the United Kingdom referred to the code established by the International Confederation of Temporary Work Businesses (CIETT), referred to in Report IV(1). The situation was not as cut and dried as the one before us; many countries would find it difficult to ratify such a wording. Indeed, there might be situations in which the PES would be free to intervene. Why therefore legislate only on PREA?

166. The Employer member of Germany stated that concepts of neutrality varied from country to country. In his own country, striking workers could not be replaced by the PES unless the workers expressly agreed. The Committee could end up with a Convention putting PREA in a less favourable situation.

167. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that, on the one hand, Government members were stating that the PES were neutral and, on the other hand, the Employer members were asserting that PREA were at a competitive disadvantage. The issue at stake at this meeting was what principles should govern the activities of PREA. Her group was prepared to vote on its amendment as subamended.

168. The Employer Vice-Chairperson added that he did not mean to imply that PREA should replace strikers but that his group could go no further than "do not interfere".

169. The Government member of Sweden felt that it was incorrect to say that the ILO should not take into account national systems. It was precisely the strength of the ILO that it did take account of national realities. However, the State must be neutral on this matter — which was up to the social partners.

170. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted a sixth subamendment to paragraph 2 as follows: "Having due regard to the autonomy of parties involved, a Member shall adopt all necessary measures to ensure that private employment agencies do not interfere with, or become involved in, labour disputes including, inter alia, not replacing workers on strike."

171. The Employer Vice-Chairperson responded to this proposal by proposing a sub-subamendment. He proposed to add to the proposal of the Workers' group the phrase "where national law and practice so provides". The Worker Vice-Chairperson immediately stated that they found the Employer sub-subamendment unacceptable because they believed the task of this Committee was to try to establish international standards. There were many countries where PREA were allowed by national law to replace workers on strike. The Workers' group would therefore propose to add "in accordance with national law and practice". The Government member of Italy also expressed disagreement with the Employer members' sub-subamendment, while the Government member of Sweden said that they were in favour of it.

172. The Government member of the Netherlands explained why he supported the position of the Workers' group. He said that while enterprises were entitled to try and limit the damage caused by strikes, this was a short-term solution; there were much greater things at stake, such as the long-term damage to industrial relations.

173. The Government member of the United States said that he fully appreciated the idea behind the sixth subamendment of the Workers, but could not support it because he felt that it would be inappropriate to include this idea in the Convention. If adopted, the Government of the United States would not be able to ratify it.

174. At this point, the Worker Vice-Chairperson asked for a vote by show of hands on her sixth subamendment. However, the Employers' group recalled the procedure that the vote should be on the latest sub-subamendment. The Chairperson called for a vote by show of hands on this sub-subamendment. There were 23,617 votes in favour, 22,363 against, and 1,980 abstentions. In view of the close results of the vote, the Worker Vice-Chairperson called for a record vote. The result of the record vote was 24,453 votes in favour, 22,363 against, and 627 abstentions. As a result of the vote, the Chairperson declared the sub-subamendment adopted.

175. At the subsequent sitting of the Committee, questions were however raised as to the exact object and content of the decision taken. The Workers' group had understood that in the Article adopted at the previous sitting, the words "in accordance with national law and practice" were to be added at the end of the last sentence of paragraph 2; the Employers' group, on the other hand, had understood that the original wording of their latest subamendment, namely "where national law and practice so provides" was the one adopted. The Government member of Sweden stated that he had understood that the vote had been on the wording "not replacing workers on strike where national law so provides". He said that that had been the understanding of many of those who had voted in favour of it and if the text was changed there should be another vote. The Government members of Denmark and Norway both shared the Swedish Government member's view.

176. After thorough discussions within the Committee, the Chairperson considered that the change in the text which was read after the vote and before the closing of the sitting had created a situation in which it was indeed impossible to say that a decision had been taken on the original subamendment. The Employers' group and the Workers' group, authors of the amendment and subamendments, informed the Committee that, in the circumstances, they withdrew their amendment and subamendments, and the Workers' group indicated that they were ready to have the whole of paragraph 2 deleted. The Chairperson declared that paragraph 2 of the new Article had been deleted, to which the Committee unanimously agreed. The Committee formally adopted the new Article without paragraph 2 which read as follows:

> Measures shall be taken to ensure that the workers recruited by private employment agencies providing the services referred to in Article 1 are not denied the right to freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively.

177. The new Article, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

178. The Worker Vice-Chairperson wished to thank the Chairperson and the Office for all the efforts it had made concerning this question. Although she felt strongly about the content of paragraph 2, she did not want an Article in the Convention to cast a shadow on the achievements of this Committee. She appreciated the hard work of the Governments and Employers' group to reach a solution.

179. The Government member of Sweden agreed with the Worker Vice-Chairperson. In the spirit of the 1994 discussions, this decision reflected good tripartism at its best. The Employer Vice-Chairperson concurred.

180. The Chairperson, in introducing the discussion on Article 4 of the Office text, proposed to consider simultaneously the two amendments submitted respectively by the Employer members and by the Government member of the Netherlands on behalf of the Member States of the EU; both amendments sought to replace the Office text. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced his group's amendment:

> In order to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in access to employment and to particular occupations, private employment agencies shall be subject to any national legislation on: (a) discrimination in employment; (b) the processing of personal data of workers; (c) the investigation of complaints.

181. He explained that the amendment submitted by his group aimed at bringing together under one heading Articles 4, 5 and 8 of the Office text. Regarding discrimination, the Employer members felt that national legislation should cover PREA on employment discrimination, processing of personal data of workers and investigation of complaints.

182. The Government member of the Netherlands noted that the Office text of Article 4 was an improvement over the existing provisions of Convention No. 96. However, it was necessary to confirm the role of affirmative action in the promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment of workers. The following amendment proposed on behalf of the Member States of the EU aimed also at ensuring the possibility of ratification by member States without national legislation on discrimination:

> In order to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in access to employment and to particular occupations, private employment agencies shall be subject to prevailing national law and practice to ensure workers are treated without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, age, religion, political opinion, disability, national extraction or social origin.

183. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed the concern of her group on weaknesses in "prevailing national law and practice" concerning issues of discrimination and recalled the previous extensive debate on these terms. She felt that the proposals on equality in this amendment run counter to the majority of answers given by member States to the ILO questionnaire which clearly stated that equality should be dealt with in the Convention. The Workers' group had wanted to extend the list of categories of discrimination as proposed in the amendment, but preferred to abide by the ILO language in Convention No. 111 and to the replies of member States to the ILO questionnaire. Therefore her group was opposed to both of these amendments and supported the Office text.

184. The Government member of Canada proposed a first subamendment to the amendment of the Member States of the EU which replaced "private employment agencies" by "the Member" and "subject to prevailing national law and practice" by "or any other case of discrimination provided for in national law and practice" at the end of the sentence. The amendment, as subamended, was read as follows:

> In order to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in access to employment and to particular occupations, the Member shall ensure that workers are treated without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, age, religion, political opinion, disability, national extraction or social origin or any other case of discrimination provided for in national law and practice.

185. The Government member of Croatia proposed two subamendments: one to cover both the access to employment and the situation in employment; the other to extend the basis for identifying grounds for discrimination. The Government member of the Netherlands observed that it would be useful to identify clearly the responsibility of PREA in the subamendment proposed by Canada.

186. The Worker Vice-Chairperson could accept these subamendments, with the exception of the second subamendment proposed by the Government member of Croatia to extend the grounds for discrimination in the Article. She also appreciated the efforts by the Canadian Government member and was prepared to accept the text as amended and subamended.

187. The Government member of Norway also supported the European Union amendment as subamended by the Government member of Canada.

188. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the consensus.

189. The Government member from the Netherlands sought to clarify that the Canadian amendment did not include the words "private employment agencies". His Government felt that the text should specify that it applied to PREA. The Government member of Canada agreed to it.

190. The Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out that the text, as amended, would now preclude affirmative action in respect of disadvantaged groups. He also pointed out that legislation in the United Kingdom did permit discrimination on grounds of sex when it was a legitimate requirement of the job, whereas the text now seemed to prohibit this.

191. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stressed that there was a large consensus on the text, as amended and subamended, and that the discussion should move on.

192. The Chairperson also agreed that there was a large consensus.

193. The Government member of Japan stated that the reference to "age" should not be considered as discriminatory in the context of the situation in his country. Under the assumption that this is what the wording did indeed imply he withdrew his amendment.

194. The Government member of the Netherlands reminded the Committee that the term "national law and practice" in the text was essential as it provided for different interpretations on matters such as age.

195. The Government member of the United Kingdom understood that the amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada removed the obligation of PREA being subject to prevailing law and practice.

196. The Government member of Canada explained that the reason she had deleted "prevailing national law and practice" was to ensure that countries in which there was no law and practice would provide a minimum level of protection to all workers. The wording "any other form of discrimination provided for in national law and practice" would enable countries to include protection for additional forms of discrimination as included in national law and practice. She proposed to include both workers and PREA in her subamendment. Both Workers' and Employers' groups accepted.

197. The Government member of the Netherlands sought clarification as to whether the term "law and practice" in the amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada only referred to laws dealing with new forms of discrimination and not to existing forms.

198. The Government member of Canada explained that it applied to present and future law and the forms of discrimination covered therein.

199. The Government member of Sweden raised the point regarding the exact wording of the text under discussion. He asked the Canadian Government to clarify whether PREA were included in the text of the amendment.

200. The Worker Vice-Chairperson reiterated that they supported one element of the subamendment submitted by the Government member of Croatia but did not consider it substantial; she therefore asked the Government member of Croatia not to pursue the issue.

201. The Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out that as the amendment was formulated, the provision on national law and practice applied only to the last part of the list of grounds of discrimination.

202. The Government member of Ireland pointed out that the deletion of the reference to national law and practice at the beginning of the subamendment submitted by the Government member of Canada, had the effect of exempting the first part of the list of discriminatory practices from national law and practice.

203. The Government member of Canada, taking into account the concern of the Government member of the Netherlands, submitted a second subamendment to replace "workers are treated" by "private employment agencies shall treat workers". She read out the amendment and its second subamendment as follows:

> In order to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in access to employment and to particular occupations, the Member shall ensure that private employment agencies shall treat workers without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, age, religion, political opinion, disability, national extraction, social origin or any other form of discrimination provided for in national law and practice.

The Worker Vice-Chairperson felt that this subject had been exhausted. The Government member of Canada had read out her subamendment six times; if necessary, the Committee could vote on this matter in order to move on.

204. Under the assumption that national law and practice apply to the entire list of categories of discrimination, the Government members of Ireland, Sweden and the United Kingdom accepted to delete the words "subject to prevailing national law and practice" in the EU amendment and accepted the text with the second subamendment submitted by the Government member of Canada.

205. After the Chairperson had made sure that the Employer Vice-Chairperson had no objections for the same reasons explained by the Government members of Ireland, Sweden and the United Kingdom, the amendment, with its second subamendment, was adopted and the amendment of the Employers' group was withdrawn.

New paragraph

206. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment which added a new paragraph to Article 4:

> In implementing this provision, private employment agencies shall not be restricted from providing special services or targeted programmes designed to assist the most disadvantaged workers with jobseeking activities.

207. The purpose of this amendment was to ensure that affirmative action programmes for "most disadvantaged" workers such as long-term unemployed would be continued and developed by PREA and would not be undermined by Article 4 as drafted by the Office.

208. The Employers' group and Government members supported the amendment.

209. The new Paragraph was adopted.

210. Article 4, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

Article 5

211. An amendment submitted by the Employer members proposing to delete this Article was withdrawn.

Subparagraph (b)

212. The Worker members submitted an amendment to subparagraph (b) proposing to replace "services which these agencies provide" by "qualifications and professional experience of the workers". In support of this amendment, the Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that the range of matters on which workers' data could be processed by agencies under subparagraph (b) was much too wide. The text should be limited to those matters of relevance to the qualifications and professional experience of workers.

213. The Employer members felt that the Workers' proposal made the scope of the subparagraph too narrow. It was difficult, in their view, to limit the matters on which data could be processed by the agencies without omitting details which might be useful, such as the addresses and telephone numbers of jobseekers.

214. The Worker members subamended their amendment, suggesting that the words "and other directly relevant information" be added after "qualifications and professional experience of the workers".

215. The Government member of the Netherlands asked whether nationality was included in the data which could be processed. The Government member of the United Kingdom pointed out that medical data should also be among those which were relevant. The Worker Vice-Chairperson replied that the relevance of medical records and of other such information would depend on the specific case and circumstances. She agreed that details relating to the state of health of drivers in the road transport industry would be relevant to prospective employers. However, everything would depend on the work carried out; the operative word was "relevant".

216. The Government members of Australia and Germany took the view that the Workers' proposal was now very similar to the Office text.

217. The Government member of Italy agreed with the Workers' amendment, as subamended. In her view, data processed by agencies should relate to employment only.

218. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

219. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon to insert a new subparagraph as follows: "(c) The processing of personal data and the respect of privacy of workers shall be treated in accordance with national law" was not seconded and therefore not considered.

220. Article 5 was adopted as amended and subamended.

Article 6

221. An amendment submitted by the Government member of the Republic of Korea proposing to move Article 6 to the Recommendation was not seconded and hence was not considered.

Paragraph 1

222. An amendment submitted by the Employer members proposed the insertion of the words, "with regard to the services described in Article 1 (a) and (b)", at the beginning of paragraph 1. Introducing his amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that some services to jobseekers might involve payment; he mentioned the example of the preparation of curriculum vitaes. He added that if it was not possible to charge for these and other such similar services, they might not be available. This would be against the interest of workers.

223. The Worker Vice-Chairperson referred to paragraph 53 of the 1994 conclusions in which it was unequivocally stated that fee-charging to jobseekers was unacceptable. Her group had originally felt that Article 6 should consist of only the first paragraph which stated this principle. However, she believed that paragraph 2 of the Office text provided for a limited form of exception to this principle to allow flexibility when this was in the interest of the workers concerned.

224. The Government members of Australia, Cyprus, France, Ireland, Norway, South Africa and Sweden stated that they preferred the Office text. Consequently, the Employer members withdrew their amendment.

225. The Worker members withdrew an amendment they had submitted to reinforce the idea that fees or costs were to be borne by the user enterprise, on the understanding that the Office text should be interpreted as meaning that such fees or costs would be borne by the user enterprise and not by the jobseeker.

226. The Government member of the Netherlands pointed out that such fees and costs were not always borne by the employer but, in some cases, by social security authorities.

227. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of the Netherlands submitted an amendment to insert "certain categories of workers and certain branches of economic activity" before the words "specified types of services". She explained that traditionally certain professions, such as artists and musicians, were excluded from the principle of not charging fees to jobseekers.

228. The Worker Vice-Chairperson held the view that such limited flexibility was adequately reflected in the Office text for paragraph 2; consequently, this text did not need to be amended. The Employer members supported the EU position, as expressed by the Government member of the Netherlands. The Government member of Germany stated that he would like the text to be clear to ensure that certain categories of workers could be exempted.

229. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted a subamendment to the EU amendment. Her group could accept "certain categories of workers", but not "certain branches of economic activity." The Government members of Cyprus, France, Netherlands and Norway, as well as the Employer members, supported the subamendment submitted by the Worker Vice-Chairperson.

230. The Government member of Sweden could not accept the Workers' subamendment. In his view, the interest of workers and consultations of the employers' and workers' organizations would ensure that "sectors of economic activity" would not be excluded without good reason.

231. However, in view of the favourable opinion expressed by members of the Committee on the amendment of the Member States of the EU, as subamended by the Worker members, this amendment was adopted as subamended. As a result, a similar amendment, submitted by the Employer members, was not considered.

232. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon, which aimed to give more flexibility to the competent authority to determine the types of services allowed to be exempted from the provisions of paragraph 1, was not seconded and therefore not considered.

233. Paragraph 2, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

234. Article 6 was adopted as amended and subamended.

Article 7

235. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to add "so far as national laws and regulations permit" to the Article. This amendment was not seconded and therefore not considered.

236. The Worker members submitted an amendment to insert after the word "for" the words "and prevent abuses of". Introducing this amendment, the Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that it was appropriate to make a specific reference to the prevention of abuses because there were numerous examples of abuses committed by agencies.

237. The Employer members and the Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, supported the amendment.

238. The amendment was adopted.

239. The Government member of Lebanon submitted an amendment to add at the end of the Article: "provided such agencies are authorized to recruit or to place migrant workers. The scope and contents of such protection shall be determined in accordance with national law." It was not seconded and therefore not considered.

240. An amendment was submitted by the Worker members to add at the end of the Article the following new sentence: "These shall include laws or regulations which provide for penalties, including prohibition of private employment agencies engaging in fraudulent practices and abuses." The Worker Vice-Chairperson, in support of the amendment, read out a list of abuses, ranging from passport confiscation to the forcing of women workers into prostitution. She asked the Committee to send a clear, strong, unambiguous message that such abuses would not be tolerated and that penalties should be strictly enforced.

241. The Employer members stressed that they did not condone such abuses, but felt that the Office text was strong enough and contained the same message. The Government members of the Member States of the European Union and Norway agreed with the Employers.

242. The Government members of Morocco and Kenya supported the amendment. They pointed out that their nationals had been victims of unscrupulous agencies and had suffered injustices.

243. The Worker Vice-Chairperson was rather surprised that the amendment had not attracted more support from Governments and Employers since she expected them to share the concern for migrant workers subject to abuse. A recent ILO tripartite expert committee meeting on migration had recommended sanctions against fraudulent practices on the part of PREA. She asked the Employers' group and Government members to reconsider their position and to support the amendment.

244. The Government members of the Republic of Guinea, Philippines, Senegal, South Africa and Turkey supported the Workers' amendment. All these countries were concerned about the potential for abuses in the placing of migrant workers. A few pointed to actual cases which had occurred in their respective countries. They pointed out that penalties and sanctions should be severe both in the countries of origin and destination.

245. The Government member of the United States raised a technical question. He wondered whether it would be appropriate to insert this amendment under Article 7 or Article 11. He urged the Committee to approve the concept of the amendment, but to leave it up to the Drafting Committee to determine where it should be placed.

246. In response to the earlier clarification sought from the Office, a member of the secretariat said that it was not up to the Drafting Committee to decide upon the placing of amendments in the text. Its terms of reference under the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference were, first, to check whether all amendments were correctly integrated into the text finally adopted, and second, to bring the French and English texts of the approved Convention in line with each other.

247. The Worker Vice-Chairperson thanked the Government members of countries for confirming that the concerns which had prompted their proposal were legitimate and real. They obviously felt that the Convention should reflect all these concerns in a meaningful way. With respect to where the amendment should appear in the text, she said that in the interest of consensus they were prepared to agree to leave it to the Drafting Committee; however, they believed it would make more sense to group together all the provisions concerning migrant workers under in Article 7.

248. Speaking on behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of the Netherlands stated that after listening to the concerns expressed by many of the developing countries on this issue they had decided to support the Workers' amendment.

249. A subamendment with a slight rewording was proposed by the Employers' group to replace "engaging" by "which engage". It was accepted by the Workers' group.

250. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

New paragraph

251. The Worker members submitted an amendment to insert a new paragraph as follows:

> Where workers are recruited in one country to work in another, the Members concerned shall consider concluding bilateral labour agreements to prevent abuses and fraudulent practices in recruitment, placement and employment.

252. The spirit behind this amendment, according to the Worker Vice-Chairperson, was that problems of fraud and abuse arose both in the sending and receiving countries. The problems had to be tackled on both fronts.

253. The Employer Vice-Chairperson objected to the amendment because he was of the opinion that it was drafted in a language more appropriate to a Recommendation. Article 7 had already been significantly strengthened by the previous amendment. Furthermore, in view of the fact that Article 7 already provided for collaboration with other Members, the amendment seemed superfluous. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of the Netherlands did not agree with the amendment because she felt that it would be inappropriate to require Member States to conclude bilateral agreements — although she understood the idea behind the proposal and even concurred that bilateral agreements could be very useful. She also felt that this amendment belonged to a Recommendation rather than a Convention.

254. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that the only obligation for member States would be to consider concluding bilateral agreements and to report to the Office on the considerations which had taken place. It was, of course, up to the governments to decide on whether or not to conclude bilateral agreements. The Workers' amendment would not "require" them to conclude such agreements but only to "consider" concluding bilateral agreements.

255. The Government members of Canada and Norway immediately agreed to the proposed amendment. The Government member of Kenya also strongly endorsed the amendment, stating that it would strengthen multilateral and even cultural relations among States, curb abuses effectively and help improve the conditions of migrant workers. The Employers' group dropped their opposition to the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

256. The new Paragraph was adopted.

257. Article 7, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

Article 8

258. The Employers' group withdrew their amendment to delete Article 8.

259. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced her group's amendment to replace "as appropriate" by "the most" in Article 8. The Employer Vice-Chairperson preferred the amendment proposed by the Government member of Japan which included the words "as appropriate" and referred to the "most representative employers' and workers' organizations".

260. The Worker Vice-Chairperson objected to the inclusion of "as appropriate", since it would open the door to cases when it would not be appropriate to involve the most representative organizations of employers and workers. This would have the effect of allowing the possibility of establishing a complaints procedure without their involvement.

261. Several Government members supported the Japanese amendment which was also endorsed by the Employers' group. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of the Netherlands said that court procedures for the investigation of complaints were already well established and had their own structures. Consequently, it would be impossible to stipulate the involvement of workers' and employers' representatives. The Government member of Australia agreed with this statement and said that they already had commissions to investigate similar complaints. The Government member of Germany pointed out that the Committee could not include a wording which would interfere with established judicial procedures in a given member State.

262. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed to revise her group's amendment by removing the word "appropriate" from the second line of Article 8 and putting it in the first line. But the Government member of Austria, voicing the concern of many other governments, said that this change would not dispel his Government's concern about the proposed amendment. They would want to retain the wording as proposed by the Japanese amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson subsequently withdrew her group's proposed amendment in favour of the one proposed by the Government member of Japan.

263. The amendment was adopted.

264. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced the amendment submitted by the Worker members to delete "if necessary" and to insert after the word "complaint" the following words: "alleged abuses and fraudulent practices". She stated that it would, in the opinion of her group, always be necessary to investigate complaints, even if the scope of the investigation could vary according to the circumstances of the case. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that he could accept the addition proposed by the Workers' group but wanted to maintain the flexibility conveyed by the expression "if necessary". He noted that this issue was mainly of concern to the Government members.

265. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, indicated that they leaned towards the position of the Employers' group. The Government member of the Netherlands brought to the attention of the Committee that the text adopted during the 84th Session of the Conference for the Recruitment and Placement of Seafarers Convention, 1996 (No. 179) included also, in its Article 6, the expression "if necessary". The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that improvements could be made to the text adopted last year and maintained her proposal. The Government members of Canada, Italy, Kenya, Norway and the United States supported her in this amendment.

266. After consulting the Government members of the Member States of the EU and noting that the Worker Vice-Chairperson had conceded that not every complaint needed a detailed investigation, the Government member of the Netherlands expressed her support for the proposal of the Workers' group. The amendment was adopted.

267. Article 8, as amended, was adopted.

New Article after Article 8

268. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced the Worker members' amendment to add the following new Article after Article 8:

> The Member shall take the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection for the workers using the services of private employment agencies, as described in Article 1 above, in relation to: (a) freedom of association; (b) collective bargaining; (c) remuneration; (d) working time and other working conditions; (e) statutory social security benefits; (f) access to training; (g) protection in the field of occupational safety and health; (h) compensation in case of occupational accidents or diseases; (i) compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims; (j) maternity protection and maternity benefits.

269. The Workers' group felt that the Office had made a serious omission when drafting the text. Indeed, the main thrust of the conclusions of the 1994 discussions was that Convention No. 96 should allow flexibility whilst providing adequate protection for workers. The amendment was therefore designed to provide for adequate protection in a number of key areas. For instance, it had added a reference to "remuneration". The Workers' group felt that placed workers should have the same protection as other regular employees, if there was a statutory minimum wage. The amendment also referred to statutory social benefits, protection in the field of occupational safety and health, compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims and maternity protection and maternity benefits. The Workers' group was of the opinion that the omission to deal with protection of workers in Article 9 should be rectified.

270. The Employer Vice-Chairperson conceded that there was a certain logic in the reasoning of the Workers' group but he felt that reference should be made to national conditions and practice; he also hesitated about a reference to remuneration in an Article of the Convention because no distinction was made, in the Workers' amended text, between subparagraph 1(a) and subparagraph 1(b) of Article 1. He wondered whether this new Article was intended to apply to both categories of services. He then presented the following three subamendments to the Workers' amendment: (1) to add in the introductory sentence the words "in accordance with national conditions and practice" after the word "shall"; (2) to replace "Article 1" by "Article 1.1(b)"; and (3) to delete subparagraph (c) referring to "remuneration".

271. The Government members of Denmark and Norway understood the spirit of the amendment of the Workers' group but felt that it should be confined to firms hiring out workers. The Worker Vice-Chairperson confirmed the intention of the Workers' group to confine their amendment to the services under Article 1.1(b) and was prepared to accept the Employers' second subamendment.

272. The Government member of Norway stated that he would like to see a reference to child labour in the text of this new Article proposed by the Workers' group and submitted a subamendment to add the following paragraph: "A member State shall take measures to ensure that child labour is not used or supplied by private employment agencies."

273. The Government member of Sweden proposed to replace "maternity protection" by "parental protection". The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that she would accept the addition of the term "parental" — but this should not replace the word "maternity".

274. Taking into account these subamendments, the Workers' group submitted a first subamendment to its amendment as follows.

> 1. The Member shall take the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection for the workers using the services of private employment agencies, as described in Article 1.1.(b) above, in relation to: (a) freedom of association; (b) collective bargaining; (c) remuneration; (d) working time and other working conditions; (e) statutory social security benefits; (f) access to training; (g) protection in the field of occupational safety and health; (h) compensation in case of occupational accidents or diseases; (i) compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims; (j) maternity protection and maternity benefits, parental protection and parental benefits.
> 2. A member State shall take measures to ensure that child labour is not used or supplied by private employment agencies.

275. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of the Netherlands could accept the reference to Article 1.1(b), child labour and parental rights. However, the European Union would like to retain: "in accordance with national conditions and practice".

276. The Government member of the United States felt that the Worker members' amendment and its first subamendment were relevant to the new global economy; he therefore supported it.

277. The Government member of the Netherlands raised the question of whether these traditional workers' rights extended to jobseekers. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, replying to the concerns of the Government member of the Netherlands, thought that it was not necessary to change the language of the Article; the areas listed would not apply to jobseekers because of the express mention of Article 1.1(b). She stressed that there should be measures to ensure that workers in user enterprises were entitled to the statutory minimum wage.

278. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that remuneration was more a matter for the labour market and social partners rather than governments. In reference to Article 1.1(b), he felt it clear that these people were in employment — he therefore suggested a subamendment to replace the words "using the services of" by "employed by". The Worker Vice-Chairperson accepted this subamendment; she also submitted a second subamendment to change subparagraph (c) from "remuneration" to "minimum wages".

279. The Government members of Kenya, Lebanon and Morocco felt that there should be mention of national law and practice, although they pointed out that some of these areas might not be regulated in national legislation. The Government member of Lebanon also felt that there should be a reference to the minimum age of admission to employment.

280. After consulting with the Government members of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of the Netherlands stated that she could support the Workers' second subamendment; however, she agreed with the Employers' group that the reference to national law and practice should be added. The Government member of Australia thought that this reference to national law and practice would solve the Employers' concern about remuneration. The Government member of Switzerland felt that there had to be a reference to national law and practice because in their country there was no minimum wage as this was agreed upon under collective agreements.

281. As there was a consensus on "in accordance with national law and practice", the Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a third subamendment to their amendment:

> 1. The Member shall, in accordance with national law and practice, take the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection for the workers employed by private employment agencies, as described in Article 1.1(b) above, in relation to: (a) freedom of association; (b) collective bargaining; (c) minimum wages; (d) working time and other working conditions; (e) statutory social security benefits; (f) access to training; (g) protection in the field of occupational safety and health; (h) compensation in case of occupational accidents or diseases; (i) compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims; (j) maternity protection and maternity benefits, parental protection and parental benefits.
> 2. A Member shall take measures to ensure that child labour is not used or supplied by private employment agencies.

282. With regard to paragraph 2 in the third subamendment of the Workers' group, the Workers' group agreed that the Drafting Committee might consider it more appropriate to situate this paragraph in another article; however, it felt that it should be included in the instrument. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated his group's acceptance.

283. The amendment of the Workers' group, as subamended, was adopted.

284. The new Article as amended and subamended was adopted.

Article 9

285. The Worker members submitted an amendment to replace Article 9 with the following text:

> The Member shall allocate the respective responsibilities of private employment agencies providing the services referred to in paragraph 1(b) of Article 1 and of user enterprises in relation to: (a) collective bargaining; (b) remuneration; (c) working time and other working conditions; (d) statutory social security benefits; (e) access to training; (f) protection in the field of occupational safety and health; (g) compensation in case of occupational accidents or diseases; (h) compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims; (i) maternity protection and benefits.

286. Introducing the amendment, the Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the amendment was designed to allocate responsibilities to PREA and user enterprises in relation to the different rights and benefits listed in the amendment. It was necessary to avoid uncertainty over responsibility as regards the rights of workers placed by PREA. The list in this amendment should be brought into line with the one in the previously discussed amendment and should be adapted to the adopted new Article — with one important exception relating to freedom of association. The Workers' group believed that the right to freedom of association belonged to the workers and did not need to be allocated in the same way as the other rights and benefits in the list.

287. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that much of what the Workers' group sought to achieve in this amendment had already been taken care of in the new Article after Article 8. Governments should not involve themselves in the employer/employee relationship. In every employment relationship, the employer had certain responsibilities. Protection in the field of occupational safety and health was the only area in which governments should allocate responsibilities. Hence, member States should ensure that workers' protection was provided for, while allowing flexibility in the relationship between the user enterprise and PREA. Both this amendment and the Office text failed to allow for adequate flexibility and the Employers' group therefore felt that this situation would have been better dealt with elsewhere.

288. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member from the Netherlands understood the amendment to mean that Members should not take responsibility themselves but ensure that the protections were in place. They wished to add the words "in accordance with national law and practice" in the text and preferred the Office text.

289. The Government members of India, Japan and Norway, as well as the Employer members, also expressed their support for the Office text.

290. The Government members of Kenya and Morocco supported the Workers' amendment. The list, they believed, should match the one adopted in the previous amendment. The Government member of Kenya favoured the insertion of a reference to "national conditions and practice".

291. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted a subamendment to her amendment by inserting "in accordance with national law and practice" as well as "and determine" based on another amendment, submitted by the Government member of the United Kingdom, which had not yet been discussed. However, she could not accept moving away from the word "allocate".

292. The Government members of Norway and Sweden agreed with the word "allocate", which they felt was a flexible concept.

293. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, replying to a question from the Government member of Germany, stated that by using the term "allocate", her group wanted to make it perfectly clear who had responsibility in a given situation. For instance, if employees were sent by TWA to a user enterprise, there had to be a clear understanding about whether the TWA or the user enterprise was responsible. It did not matter which — but someone had to bear the responsibility. "Allocate" was synonymous to "assign".

294. The Government member of Austria could support the subamendment if it implied that allocation was not intended to be exclusive, i.e. that responsibility could be shared. The Government members of Germany, Morocco, Japan, Sweden and the United Kingdom, as well as the Employer members, agreed with the Workers' subamendment. The text as subamended was as follows:

> The Member shall determine and allocate, in accordance with national law and practice, the respective responsibilities of private employment agencies providing the services referred to in paragraph 1(b) of Article 1 and of user enterprises in relation to: (a) collective bargaining; (b) minimum wages; (c) working time and other working conditions; (d) statutory social security benefits; (e) access to training; (f) protection in the field of occupational safety and health; (g) compensation in case of occupational accidents or diseases; (h) compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims; (i) maternity protection and benefits and parental protection and benefits.

295. The Workers' amendment as subamended was adopted.

296. The other amendments to Article 9 were no longer valid in the light of the adoption of this amendment and therefore withdrawn.

297. Article 9 as amended and subamended was adopted.

Article 10

298. The Employer members submitted an amendment to move the provisions of this Article to the Recommendation. Introducing the amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that all measures in this Article were within the confines of member States and the issues involved in this Article were more relevant to the Recommendation than to the Convention.

299. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that while the PES and PREA should function alongside each other, the public authorities should retain final authority on labour market policy and be able to direct public funds to implement that policy. Therefore, she was opposed to moving this Article to the Recommendation as it reflected the respective role of the PREA and PES.

300. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of Germany and the Government members of Morocco and Sweden expressed their preference for keeping this Article in the Convention to reflect the conclusions of the 1994 Conference and to be in line with the Organisation of Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88).

301. The Employer members, considering the lack of support, withdrew their amendment.

302. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of Germany submitted an amendment to replace the words "formulate, implement and periodically review measures" by "establish conditions" because he felt that the Office text implied that PES and PREA should be forced to work together and, in practice, this was impossible. Their proposed amendment was designed to make it easier for countries to promote cooperation between PREA and PES. States could only create the necessary conditions for cooperation and could not force parties to cooperate. The amendment was supported by the Employers' group.

303. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that they were opposed to the EU amendment because it fell short of obtaining a commitment to bring about cooperation between PREA and PES. She also recalled Article 11 of Convention No. 88 which ensured an effective cooperation between PES and PREA. The Office text in Article 10.1 specified how cooperation could be promoted by placing an obligation on member States to start putting in place regulations to promote cooperation and periodically reviewing them. She also pointed out that "establishing conditions" was an empty formula. In her view, to promote cooperation, member States must formulate measures and review them periodically to see how they conformed to changing circumstances. In addition, the wording of the Office text would go beyond the EU amendment in meeting the situation of countries which did not have well-developed public employment services. Consequently, the Workers' group wished to retain the Office text.

304. The Employer Vice-Chairperson strongly voiced opposition to any provision which would oblige private business to cooperate with their competitors. This would constitute a serious interference by Government. In response to this, the Worker Vice-Chairperson clarified that the Office text was intended "to promote" and not "to require" cooperation between public and private employment agencies.

305. The Government members of Austria and Australia expressed support for the EU amendment. According to the Government member of Australia, it offered a framework within which members could take appropriate steps to promote cooperation. Moreover, Paragraph 10 of the proposed Recommendation spelled out ways in which they should cooperate. The Government member of Switzerland agreed with the need to recognize the principle of cooperation in the Convention but suggested that the wording of the amendment be more explicit.

306. The Member States of the EU submitted a subamendment to replace "establish conditions" by "establish and periodically review conditions".

307. The Worker Vice-Chairperson thought that the subamendment still failed to address the difficulties in the lack of cooperation and coordination between PES and PREA, highlighted at the 1994 meeting. Indeed, at that 1994 meeting, the member States had gone so far as to stress the need "to establish permanent cooperation" between these two services. The Committee should therefore take into account these concerns in this Convention. She also pointed out that there was no need for wasteful competition between PES and PREA in the labour market. The Employer Vice-Chairperson wished to stress that he had never questioned the desirability of cooperation; he merely felt that it could not be forced. To this the Worker Vice-Chairperson replied that the Workers' group had understood the intention behind this Convention was not to create a "free-for-all" in the market but to regulate the manner in which PREA would be allowed to operate alongside the PES.

308. The Government member of Germany stressed that the amendment submitted by the EU was in no way intended to undermine cooperation. On the contrary, they were attempting to ensure that the Convention would be more ratifiable as an international instrument. He added that competition could act as a stimulus for improvement and might make the PES become more competitive.

309. The Worker Vice-Chairperson understood the main concern to be the need for legal requirements to promote cooperation. The Workers' group would be prepared to accept replacing the word "measures" by "conditions". They did, however, want member States to be obliged to promote cooperation between PES and PREA.

310. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that his group could not accept the word "implement" as it implied as much compulsion as the word "measures". The Employer member of the United Kingdom felt that cooperation was desirable; however, this should not be brought about by regulation but by consent and agreement between the parties concerned. If there were any perception of compulsion, many PREA would take cooperation to mean control. In his view, the EU amendment, as subamended, was the best formulation.

311. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a sub-subamendment to the EU amendment to replace "establish and periodically review conditions" by "formulate, establish and periodically review conditions". This was designed to address the concerns about the word "implement".

312. The Member States of the EU and the Employers' group accepted the sub-subamendment submitted by the Workers' group.

313. The amendment, as subamended and sub-subamended, was adopted.

314. The Government member of Germany, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, submitted an amendment to replace the words "in accordance with national conditions and practice" by "in accordance with national circumstances".

315. The Worker Vice-Chairperson appreciated that the Member States of the EU wanted to change the substance of the text but her group felt that the Office text was the standard language used in ILO texts and the changes they were proposing might introduce an element of uncertainty. She asked the Member States of the EU to consider withdrawing their amendment.

316. The Employers' group understood that the standard ILO wording was "national law and practice" and not "national conditions and practice". Therefore, the Workers' group could not use it as an argument and the Employers' group supported the amendment submitted by the Member States of the EU.

317. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of Germany found the subamendment "in accordance with national law and practice" acceptable.

318. Both the Workers' and Employers' groups supported the subamendment

319. The amendment as subamended was adopted. Consequently, the Government member of Lebanon withdrew her amendment.

320. Paragraph 1, as amended, subamended and sub-subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 2

321. On behalf of the Member States of the EU, the Government member of Germany submitted an amendment to replace: (1) the word "measures" by "conditions" at the beginning of the paragraph and (2) the word "final" by "exclusive" in the second line. Changing the wording "measures" to "conditions" would be consistent with the previous adopted amendment. The change of the word "final" to "exclusive" was to ensure that public authorities would be exclusively responsible for the formulation of labour market policy and the utilization or control of the use of public funds.

322. The Employer Vice-Chairperson asked the Member States of the EU to reflect on the mention of "exclusive authority"; this would exclude the social partners from all labour market issues. His group proposed a subamendment to replace "exclusive authority" by "exclusive responsibility".

323. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the replacement of the word "measures" by "conditions" but preferred keeping the words "final authority" contained in the Office text.

324. The Government member of Spain indicated that although she would prefer the text to establish clearly the competence of the authorities called upon to formulate employment policy, by adopting the amendment submitted, she submitted, after consulting with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, a subamendment to delete the word "exclusive" because the text only referred to the "authority" of the public authorities. In the final analysis, she could accept the Office wording if the report indicated clearly that the competence for formulating labour market policy and controlling the use of public funds was only of a "residual" nature and lay always with the public authority. A member of the secretariat confirmed this by reading out a correct Spanish version of paragraph 2 which was similar to the French version.

325. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, explained that they had no intention of doing away with tripartite consultation; neither did they want to imply that labour market policy issues should be left exclusively to governments. She pointed out, however, that the national authorities could formulate labour market policy whenever they wanted. Moreover, if the Government member of Spain could now accept the words "final authority", as interpreted by the Committee, she felt she could withdraw the amendment to delete "final authority".

326. The first part of the amendment was adopted.

327. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon was not seconded and therefore not considered.

328. Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 3

329. The Government member of Germany, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, submitted an amendment to replace this paragraph by the following text:

Private employment agencies shall, at intervals to be determined by the competent authority, provide to that authority the information identified by it as being required:

(a) to allow the competent authority to be aware of the structure and activities of private employment agencies in accordance with national conditions and practices;

(b) for statistical purposes.

330. The Government member of Germany, introducing the amendment, thought that the Office text gave an over-specific list of information to be periodically provided by PREA which might not adequately cover the actual situation of PREA in the many different countries. The aim of this amendment was to provide for a broader general clause which would indicate the intention and the purpose of collecting information. It would give greater flexibility to the competent authority.

331. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that his group's concern for safeguarding confidentiality of information was not reflected in the text as submitted. Otherwise, he could agree with the amendment. He proposed three subamendments to insert: (1) the words "on request" after "shall" in the introductory sentence; (2) at the end of the introductory sentence the words "with due regard to the confidential nature of such information: ..." and (3) at the end of subparagraph (b) the words "where the information will be published on a summary basis only".

332. The Worker Vice-Chairperson was disappointed with this wording since she wanted the language to be clear, comprehensible and precise and appealed to the Committee not to dilute the intention of Article 10. She requested that the Office text should be retained because it was necessary to give transparency to the operation of PREA in the labour market. Changing it would take the substance out of this Article.

333. The Government member of Germany, commenting on the Employers' subamendments, pointed out that confidentiality of data was already safeguarded under Article 5 and, therefore, the Employers' second subamendment to subparagraph (b) was superfluous. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that Article 5 was concerned with information relating to jobseekers and not to PREA.

334. The Worker Vice-Chairperson appealed again to the Committee not to water down Article 10 which was originally intended to ensure that there was information on the way PREA were operating. In fact, subparagraph (b) already contained too few requirements for information. In her view, governments ought to protect the integrity of PES and make sure that PREA did not operate under different rules. With respect to confidentiality, she agreed that it needed to be safeguarded and could accept the Employers' second subamendment. She stressed that the Convention should lay down minimum requirements for disclosure.

335. The Government members of Australia, Japan and the United States supported the EU amendment. The Government member of Japan, citing differences among countries, stated that it was inappropriate to list requirements for information. Governments should be able to establish their own respective requirements. The Government member of Australia said that PES and PREA had coexisted for the past 50 years in his country; his Government required a minimum of information to be reported by PREA and no problems had been encountered. Although he felt that the second subamendment submitted by the Employers on confidentiality was unnecessary, he would nonetheless be prepared to support it as further subamended. The Government member of the United States appreciated the concerns of the Employers but felt that the nature of the reporting should be left to member States. Reporting was best carried out on a case-by-case basis and it was therefore not appropriate to impose global standards on such matters. The Government member of Cyprus also supported the EU amendment, underlining that it was more important to stress goals rather than to list minimum requirements.

336. The Government member of Norway said that he found the amendment submitted by the Member States of the EU too vague and would like to see the Office text retained together with the second subamendment on confidentiality proposed by the Employers.

337. The Government members of the Member States of the EU supported the Employers' second subamendment but not the first one nor the third. The Worker members, in view of the lack of support from Government members for the Office text, accepted the amendment with its second subamendment.

338. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

339. The Government members of Japan and Lebanon withdrew their respective amendments on this paragraph.

340. Paragraph 3, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 4

341. The Government members of Japan and Lebanon withdrew the amendments they had submitted to this paragraph. The Government member of Japan felt that the concerns of his Government had been addressed.

342. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, withdrew an amendment they had submitted to this paragraph and supported another similar amendment submitted by the Worker members. That amendment proposed to replace "distribute the information so collected" by "make the information publicly available". The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that this amendment clarified paragraph 4 since the information should be made public.

343. The Employer members expressed disappointment at the withdrawal of the EU amendment but accepted the Workers' amendment.

344. The amendment was adopted.

345. Paragraph 4, as amended, was adopted.

346. Article 10 was adopted as amended, subamended and sub-subamended.

Paragraph 2

347. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon was not seconded. However, she explained her reasons for introducing this text. She felt that some provisions in the draft instrument were self-regulating and would not, if the Office text were maintained, require the intervention of the labour inspectorate. She was of the opinion that the labour inspectorate should supervise the application of all the provisions in the Convention and not only the provisions to "give effect" to the Convention. Meanwhile, the Government member of Switzerland queried the French translation of the word "supervision" and felt that the words "le contrôle de l'application" did not have the same meaning in her country's national legislation. This would be determined by the Drafting Committee.

348. The Government member of Japan withdrew his amendment as he felt that the concerns of his Government had been addressed.

349. The Worker members submitted an amendment to replace "referred to in paragraph 2" by "of this Convention". The Worker Vice-Chairperson, introducing the amendment, explained that she wanted to ensure that all the relevant areas were covered. It was not enough only to refer to the provisions in paragraph 2.

350. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that the Office text was perfectly adequate. The Government member of Morocco supported the amendment because he felt that penalties should apply to the violation of any one of the provisions. The Member States of the EU, as well as the Employers' group, agreed to the amendment and it was adopted.

351. Article 11 as amended was adopted.

Article 12

352. The Worker members submitted an amendment to insert "recruited, placed or employed by private employment agencies", after "workers". The Worker Vice-Chairperson, introducing her amendment, felt it was important to specify the category of workers covered by this Convention. She wanted to stress that her group did not want jobseekers excluded in this amendment — the definition in Article 1 made this clear.

353. The Employer Vice-Chairperson thought that the Office text was a standard text contained in other instruments, although he was not opposed to the principle. The Government member of Turkey also agreed with the Employer Vice-Chairperson.

354. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that a similar Article in the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177), referred to homeworkers; this Article could therefore refer to workers recruited, placed or employed by PREA. The Member States of the EU, the Government members of Australia, Canada, Norway and the Employers' group agreed to the amendment and it was adopted.

355. Article 12 as amended was adopted.

356. The Draft Convention and its Preamble were approved.

B. Proposed Recommendation on private employment agencies

Paragraph 1

357. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon sought to replace "and should be applied in conjunction with them" by "and constitute guidelines on the methods of its application". The amendment was seconded by the Government member of the United States.

358. Introducing her statement, the Government member of Lebanon observed that the provisions of the Recommendation were only guidelines in the process of implementation of the Convention and could not therefore impose obligations on member States. Moreover, if the Recommendation was only a supplement to the Convention, it did not mean that the State could not look to the Recommendation for guidance in formulating national legislation, even if it had not ratified the Convention. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that her group could not accept the amendment. The Employer Vice-Chairperson understood that the Office text was a standard text which should be retained. The Government member of Lebanon asked if the standard format of that provision was untouchable. However, given the lack of support for the amendment, she withdrew it while retaining her position.

359. Paragraph 1 was adopted without change.

New Paragraph before Paragraph 2

360. The Employer members submitted an amendment to insert a new paragraph as follows: "Members should permit the operation of private employment agencies in accordance with the provisions of the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997."

361. Introducing the amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that the Recommendation should be self-contained. It should expressly allow the operation of PREA before setting out the details. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that her group could not accept the amendment. They did not feel that it was wise to reopen the discussion on points which had already been thoroughly looked into under the proposed Convention.

362. The Government member of Cyprus saw the amendment as imposing an obligation on governments to accept the operation of PREA even though some governments did not approve of such agencies. His Government could therefore not accept the amendment.

363. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment. The new Paragraph was withdrawn.

Subparagraph (1)

364. The Worker members submitted an amendment to delete the words "as far as possible". The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that the Recommendation should encourage a commitment to the involvement of the tripartite partners in the application of the Convention. The words in question were therefore inappropriate.

365. The Employer Vice-Chairperson saw the need for a qualification regarding tripartite consultation to avoid the social partners being constantly involved in monitoring Conventions. His group found the Office text acceptable.

366. The Member States of the EU supported the Office text since it left some discretion to governments to decide when to involve the social partners. The Government members of Australia and the Republic of Korea opposed the amendment and preferred the flexibility in the Office text.

367. The Worker members withdrew their amendment.

Subparagraph (2)

368. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon was not seconded and, therefore, not considered.

369. Paragraph 2 remained unchanged.

370. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced his group's amendment to add the words "consistent with national law and practice" after "measures" to reflect the discussions on the Convention which had indicated that there were many ways of taking these measures.

371. The Worker Vice-Chairperson disagreed. In her opinion, a Recommendation did not create any obligations but only provided guidelines and advice on measures to take. She felt that this amendment would introduce restrictive language; it might be necessary in a Convention but it was inappropriate in a Recommendation. Moreover, she felt that the word "appropriate" gave sufficient scope for considerations of national law and practice. The Government members of Austria and Sweden agreed with the Workers' group, and as there was no Government support for this amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his amendment.

372. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted her group's amendment to add after the word "agencies" the following sentence: "These measures should include laws or regulations which provide for penalties, including prohibition of private employment agencies engaging in unethical practices."

373. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that the amendment would extend the provisions of the Convention relating to abuses and fraudulent practices to include unethical practices. The penalties envisaged would not be criminal but they could include some restriction on the activities of PREA.

374. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that the Office text referred to all necessary and appropriate measures and that governments could decide what the penalties should be. His group therefore saw the amendment as unnecessary and supported the Office text. The Government members of India and Papua New Guinea agreed with the Employers' group to support the Office text.

375. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, indicated that they could support the amendment even though they did not find it went much further than the Office text.

376. The Government member of Australia proposed a subamendment to replace "should" with "may" and would accept the amendment as subamended. The Workers' and Employers' groups, as well as the Government members of Cyprus and Norway, supported the amendment as subamended.

377. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

378. Paragraph 3, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

New Paragraph after Paragraph 3

379. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a new paragraph composed of the two following subparagraphs:

(1) Workers employed by private employment agencies, as defined in Article 1.1(b) of the Convention, should have a written contract of employment specifying their terms and conditions of employment.

(2) The terms and conditions of employment, including appropriate occupational benefits of workers employed by private employment agencies, as defined in Article 1.1(b) of the Convention, should be no less favourable than those applying to comparable employees of either the user enterprises or enterprises in the same or similar branches of economic activity.

380. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that this proposal built on the new Article after Article 8 of the Convention. Workers employed in PREA should receive a written contract of employment and their terms and conditions of employment should not be less favourable than those applying to workers in the same or similar branches of activity. This would not imply obligations since it was in the Recommendation.

381. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that written contracts were not required in many Member States; indeed if they were required, workers could not in many cases be deployed in time. The Employers' group suggested the following subamendment to replace subparagraph (1) of the Workers' amendment by: "According to national law and practice, workers employed in private employment agencies, as defined in Article 1.1(b) of the Convention, should be informed of the conditions of employment before the effective beginning of the assignment."

382. The Government member of Norway understood the reasons behind the Workers' amendment but stressed that a requirement to have a written contract would slow down the deployment of workers. He suggested a subamendment to subparagraph (1) by inserting after "should have" the words "where appropriate" and adding at the end of subparagraph (1) "and should, as a minimum requirement, be informed of the conditions of employment before the effective beginning of the assignment" as suggested in the Employers' subamendment.

383. The Government member of the Netherlands, after consulting the Member States of the EU, proposed a subamendment to add after "written contract" the words "or other written document".

384. The Government members of Australia, Botswana, Cyprus, Switzerland and the United States expressed their support for the Norwegian subamendment. Both Workers' and Employers' groups accepted the Norwegian subamendment.

385. Subparagraph (1), as amended and subamended, was adopted.

386. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that it was generally accepted that short-term contract holders could not be compared with regular workers. This did not mean that they should be treated negatively. Permanent workers often had different preferences regarding the distribution of wages and benefits to those of short-term workers. The Employers' group therefore rejected subparagraph (2).

387. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that subparagraph (2) was designed to avoid the development of a second-class workforce which had second-class wages and benefits and might be used to undermine the terms and conditions provided for under collective agreement. More and more workers found themselves in triangular work arrangements and there was no rationale for excluding them from normal wages and benefits. The Workers' group did not want PREA to provide cheap and unprotected labour which undermined collective agreements and labour relations.

388. Some Government members, although sharing the Workers' concern and agreeing with the spirit of subparagraph (2), felt that this subparagraph would imply interference in the collective bargaining process and wage setting. In their view, the Committee should not set rules aimed at equalizing all forms of worker-employer relationships. Therefore, they would prefer to delete subparagraph (2).

389. The Government member of the United States suggested a subamendment to replace the last part of subparagraph (2) by "should take into account the terms and conditions of employment and reflect, where appropriate, the worker-employer relationship provided for in Article 4". The subamendment was supported by the Government member of Australia.

390. The Worker Vice-Chairperson was concerned that there was not a general acceptance of the sentiments contained in the second part of the amendment because it might imply the possibility that temporary workers undermined the terms and conditions set by collective bargaining. She suggested a subamendment to insert in the third line between "should" and "no less favourable" the words "be established and determined through normal collective bargaining arrangements and should in principle be ...".

391. The Employer Vice-Chairperson still felt that this subamendment interfered in the normal collective bargaining process and free wage-setting. He also indicated that it was difficult to have a basis for comparison. In most cases PREA supplied a few workers who were employed in a fashion which made comparison with permanent workers difficult. This would not create conditions for favourable employment.

392. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that Recommendations were simply guidelines or codes of "good practice" and they implied no obligation on the part of governments. The Recommendation should make a strong plea for not allowing workers employed by PREA to be used as cheap labour and to undermine collective bargaining. She also reminded the Committee that many temporary workers had nothing to fall back on at the end of their working life.

393. The Government member of Australia wondered where the line would be drawn with respect to the proposal that the terms and conditions of employment should be "no less favourable than those applying to comparable employees". He feared that this would have a ratchet effect on wages leading to higher unemployment. Legislation in Australia allowed permanent employees to enter into individual contracts making the idea of comparison of conditions unsustainable.

394. The Government member of the United States cited the phenomenon observed in the United States of temporary workers moving on to permanent employment after an average of eight weeks and two days. He said that flexibility in the labour market had encouraged this process. If subparagraph (2) of the proposed amendment was adopted those who sought temporary employment would be priced out of the market.

395. The Government member of Switzerland enquired if it would be possible to list the conditions of employment that would be "no less favourable". She felt that this should include protection under social security.

396. The Government member of Botswana agreed with subparagraph (2) proposed by the Workers' group but he would prefer to delete the term "user enterprises".

397. The Worker Vice-Chairperson indicated that her group had tried to take into account the concerns of the Employer members and a number of Government members on the need to support collective bargaining. Referring to the earlier statement of the Australian Government member, she pointed out that there were instances when collective bargaining did not work and they wanted wording which provided for those workers in this situation. Replying to the United States Government member, she said that one should remember that cheap and unprotected labour priced "quality and real" jobs out of the market. This gave unfair advantage to firms hiring cheap labour. Responding to the Employers' group, she said that her group was not concerned about restricting competition but with unfair competition in the labour market.

398. A large majority of Government members expressed their preference for deleting subparagraph (2) and the Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew her group's amendment to that effect.

399. The new Paragraph with its subparagraph (1), as amended and subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 4

400. The Employer members submitted an amendment to delete Paragraph 4. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled that there had been a fairly difficult debate on this issue when the draft Convention was being discussed. They had earlier thought that this paragraph might have been part of the draft Convention and that was why they had moved to delete it.

401. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the deletion of Paragraph 4 since it not only gave guidance on this important question but it also gave a general thrust to the principle.

402. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, stated that it was the practice in most countries to avoid strike breaking by temporary work agencies. Therefore she could not support the amendment and would support retaining the Office text. Similarly, the Government member of Sweden supported the Office text, but asked for clarification as to whether the text also envisaged illegal strikes.

403. The Employer members, in view of the position expressed by the Government members, accepted the Office text with an amendment to replace "exercising the right to strike" by "on strike". The Workers' group endorsed the subamendment.

404. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon was not seconded and therefore not considered.

405. Paragraph 4, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 5

406. The Government members of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, submitted an amendment to replace the Office text by the following: "The competent authority should combat unfair advertising practices and misleading advertisements, including advertisements for inexistent jobs" to improve the wording.

407. Both the Employer and Worker members supported the amendment.

408. The amendment was adopted and Paragraph 5, as amended, was adopted.

New Paragraph after Paragraph 5

409. The Worker members submitted an amendment to insert a new Paragraph in the proposed Recommendation as follows:

> Private employment agencies should: (a) not knowingly recruit workers for jobs involving undue hazards or risks or where they may be subjected to abuse or discriminatory treatment of any kind; (b) inform migrant workers, as far as possible in their own language or in a language with which they are familiar, of the terms and conditions of employment.

410. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, introducing the amendment, explained that it covered two areas of problems in the activities of PREA. Firstly, that temporary workers were asked to take risks which permanent workers would not. This gave rise to some kind of discriminatory treatment which was unacceptable. Secondly, that migrant workers faced difficulties of language in the transmission of information. PREA should give relevant information "as far as possible" in the language of the worker or in a language with which the latter was familiar. It was not always possible to arrange for this, but some safeguards were necessary.

411. The Employer Vice-Chairperson asked for clarification as to whether clause (a) of the amendment recognized that employment existed in high-risk occupations; if so the wording had to be slightly revised. He also indicated that the Employers' group supported clause (b) of the Workers' amendment and would even be prepared to build on it.

Clause (a)

412. The Worker Vice-Chairperson acknowledged that the wording of clause (a) might be confusing and said that her group had intended that workers should not "knowingly" be recruited for jobs that would expose them to undue hazards and risks. They did not want to rule out workers undertaking risky jobs but they wanted to ensure that there should be adequate safety and health measures. The Government member of Cyprus proposed a subamendment to replace "hazards or risks" by "risks to safety and health".

413. With the consent of the Committee, the Chairperson agreed to submit the rewording of clause (a) of the Workers' amendment to the Drafting Committee to reflect the concerns expressed by the Employers' group.

Clause (b)

414. The Government member of Japan said that the phrase "as far as possible" would raise practical difficulties in Japan and proposed a subamendment to replace "as far as possible" by "if possible". The Workers' group opposed this subamendment. On the same issue, the Government member of Switzerland asked to be clarified if trans-border workers should be included under the term "migrant workers".

415. The Employers' group proposed a subamendment to insert after the word "familiar" the phrase "of the nature of the position offered and of the applicable ...". The Workers' group agreed with the subamendment.

416. Clause (b), as subamended, was adopted.

417. The new Paragraph, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 6

418. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon was not seconded and therefore not considered.

419. The Employer members submitted an amendment to add at the beginning of Paragraph 6 the following: "Subject to national law and practice, private employment agencies should not draw up and publish vacancy notices...". He felt that the word "prohibited" was too strong; ethical guidelines or codes of practice were often more effective.

420. The Worker members preferred the Office text. They replied that if there was no prohibition, it would mean that the practices concerned would be permitted in some circumstances. They also repeated their objections to the reference to "national law and practice" in a Recommendation.

421. The Employer Vice-Chairperson clarified the misunderstanding by stating that the Employers' group wanted to throw a wider net to include trade associations because without their support, prohibition would be ineffective.

422. Following the Employer Vice-Chairperson's explanations, the Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed to insert in the Office text after the word "prohibited" "by other means".

423. The subamendment of the Workers' group was as follows:

> Private employment agencies should be prohibited, or by other means prevented, from drawing up and publishing vacancy notices or offers of employment in ways that directly or indirectly result in discrimination on grounds such as race, colour, sex, age, religion, political opinion, national extraction, social origin, ethnic origin, disability, marital or family status, sexual orientation or membership of a workers' organization.

She felt that if the Committee agreed upon the general spirit of this text, it could be submitted to the Drafting Committee. The Employers' group agreed with this proposal.

424. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

425. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, introduced his amendment to add after "social origin" the words "or any other form of discrimination provided for in national law and practice". His intention was to bring the text of this Paragraph in line with the Convention. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed.

426. The Worker Vice-Chairperson repeated that a Recommendation should not be used as a vehicle to repeat what was in the Convention. She wondered whether the European Union might not withdraw its amendment to make way for the Workers' amendment.

427. When asked for an explanation of this amendment, the Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that the grounds listed in its amendment reflected ILO instruments on discrimination. She felt that the Recommendation should give an indicative list of forms of discrimination, which were not necessarily covered by law and practice. The Government member of the Netherlands agreed to withdraw the EU amendment.

428. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced her group's amendment to add at the end of Paragraph 6: "ethnic origin, disability, marital or family status, sexual orientation, trade union membership" She stressed that their intention was to encourage governments to consider including more "grounds" for non-discrimination than those referred to in the Convention. These would not imply additional obligations because they were contained in the Recommendation.

429. The Employer Vice-Chairperson had a problem with what he termed "this shopping list". This was not the language of international instruments. He submitted a subamendment to replace "trade union membership" by "membership of workers' organizations". The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed.

430. The Government members of Norway, Canada and Cyprus agreed with the amendment as subamended.

431. Paragraph 6, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

New Paragraph after Paragraph 6

432. The Worker members submitted an amendment to introduce a new Paragraph as follows: "Private employment agencies should be encouraged to promote equality in employment through affirmative action programmes." This was intended to give guidelines to PREA since affirmative action programmes should not be considered as being exclusively a matter for the PES.

433. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that "affirmative action" was not applicable to the transient nature of the work covered by this Convention. It might have the opposite effect.

434. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the EU, could support the amendment on the understanding that PREA should not have any claims to the public budget. In such a case she would support the proposal of the Workers' group.

435. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that cooperation between PES and PREA was already well established in some countries where PES could, and often did, subcontract their activities to PREA. Moreover, PREA should not have rights to public funds.

436. The amendment was adopted and the new Paragraph, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 7

437. The Employer members submitted an amendment to replace this Paragraph by the text of Article 5 of the proposed Convention.

438. The Employer Vice-Chairperson was of the view that Article 5 of the proposed Convention was detailed enough and there was consequently no need to have a different wording in the Recommendation. However, he had no problems with the principles contained in the Office text.

439. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that this paragraph was intended to build on Article 5 of the Convention. She did not want to lose the additional guidance contained in the Office text on the handling of personal data.

440. In the absence of support, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his amendment.

441. Paragraph 7 remained unchanged.

New Paragraph after Paragraph 7

442. The Worker members submitted an amendment to introduce a new Paragraph after Paragraph 7 as follows:

(1) Private employment agencies should store the personal data of a worker only for so long as it is justified by the specific purposes for which they have been collected unless the worker wishes to be on a list of potential job candidates for a specified period.

(2) Measures should be taken to ensure that workers have access to all their personal data as processed by automated/electronic systems or are kept in a manual file. These measures should include the right of workers to examine and obtain a copy of any such data and the right to demand that incorrect data be deleted or corrected.

(3) Unless directly relevant to the requirements for a particular occupation, private employment agencies should be prohibited from maintaining information on the medical status of a worker, or from using such information disqualifying a worker from employment.

443. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted the amendment and explained that it had been prompted by the need to protect the privacy of workers. Only data directly relevant to employment should be held by PREA, and only for a limited period of time. Moreover, workers should have the right of access to the data. Medical data in general could be extremely important to the health and safety of the worker and his or her colleagues, but certain medical data liable to restrict employment opportunities should not be used by PREA.

444. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to replace the word "disqualifying" by the phrase "to determine the suitability of a worker for employment".

445. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that they had problems with the word "prohibited" which was too strong but otherwise they agreed with the essence of this amendment and subamendment. They would also want to ensure that workers themselves had a say on whether such medical information could be maintained by PREA. He then suggested a first subamendment to the Workers' amendment and subamendment as follows: "Unless directly relevant to the requirements of a particular occupation or if a worker wishes to be on the list of potential job candidates for a specific period of time, private employment agencies should not require, maintain, or use information on the medical status of a worker or use such information to determine the suitability of the worker for employment."

446. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said that they could go along with the Employers' subamendment but would like to express their concern that it might open the way for unrestricted maintenance of information by PREA since, in the real world, the vast majority of workers would want to be considered for as many jobs as possible. For this reason wording such as "with the express permission of the workers" should be included.

447. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a second subamendment to deal with this issue by adding: "except in cases where the worker himself accepted it" at the end of his first subamendment.

448. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a third subamendment as follows: "Unless directly relevant to the requirements for a particular occupation, or with the express permission of the worker himself, private employment agencies should not require, maintain, or use information on the medical status of a worker or use such information to determine the suitability of a worker for employment."

449. The Government member of Germany pointed out that agencies might put pressure on workers to agree to their collecting and maintaining medical data. This wording might therefore actually pave the way for pressure being applied on workers.

450. The Government member of Japan said that in his country there were frequent health check-ups of workers. This was in the interest of workers since they themselves might not be aware of their own health problems. He therefore did not feel that it was wise to introduce this limitation of requiring the permission of workers. He would prefer some wording to the effect that the information could be kept if it was in the interest of the workers concerned.

451. In order to deal with the issue raised by the Government member of Germany, the Government member of Australia proposed a sub-subamendment replacing the word "or" by "and" before the words "with the express permission of the workers concerned".

452. Consensus was reached on the amendment and its subamendment, and subparagraph 3 of the Workers' proposed amendment. It would read as follows: unless directly relevant to the requirements of a particular occupation and with the express permission of the workers concerned, PREA should not require, maintain or use information on the medical status of a worker, or use such information to determine the suitability of the worker for employment.

453. Subparagraph 3, as amended, subamended and sub-subamended, was adopted.

454. The new Paragraph, with its subparagraphs as amended, subamended and sub-subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 8

455. The Employer members submitted an amendment to delete this paragraph. Introducing his amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson said that this paragraph seemed pointless. He expressed doubts about the ability of any governmental authority to determine the adequacy of selection procedures. The Employers' group was certainly not against the adoption of adequate procedures but it was up to PREA to determine the best method of selection. Their survival depended on their efficiency.

456. The Worker Vice-Chairperson said they were opposed to deleting the whole paragraph but agreed that the Office text was not very meaningful. For that reason, they would propose its modification in a later amendment.

457. The Government member of the United States was opposed to the deletion of the paragraph but proposed rewording to include the notion of "proper and efficient selection methods".

458. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then agreed to withdraw the amendment.

459. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment submitted by her group which proposed to replace the word "adequate" by the words "proper and fair". She suggested that she could take up the previous proposal of the Government member of the United States to include also the word "efficient" to qualify "selection methods".

460. The Employer Vice-Chairperson insisted that leaving this issue to the competent authority would amount to interference in the normal business of enterprises. The Employer member of the United Kingdom further explained that in the real world no agency would send an unsuitable worker to an employer, otherwise they would not stay long in business. Paragraph 8 was therefore meaningless since, in practice, PREA themselves were the ones that took the initiative to use the most efficient methods of selection.

461. The Government member of Norway agreed with the amendment of the Workers' group but also appreciated the concerns of the Employers. The Government member of South Africa asked whether the word "fair" included the idea of being culturally fair.

462. At this point, the Government member of Sweden proposed a subamendment to take into account both the Workers' and Employers' concerns:

> The private employment agencies and the competent authority should take measures to promote the utilization of fair, proper and efficient selection methods.

463. There was general agreement with the Swedish proposed amendment.

464. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon was not seconded and therefore not considered.

465. Paragraph 8, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 9

466. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to replace Paragraph 9 by the following:

> (1) Private employment agencies providing the services referred to in Article 1.1(b) of the Convention should not prevent the user enterprise from hiring the employee.

(2) Private employment agencies providing the services referred to in Article 1.1(b) of the Convention should not restrict the occupational mobility of the employee or impose penalties on the employee accepting employment with another enterprise.

467. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that the amendment was designed to specify in greater detail the problems identified in Paragraph 9. Her group did not want to see unnecessary restrictions on employees placed by PREA. The amendment also addressed the question of restrictions on the user enterprise and deleted the reference to "at the end of an assignment" to protect the freedom of choice at all stages of the employment relationship. Subparagraph (2) of the amendment related to restrictions on the employee such as limitations on the occupational mobility of the employee.

468. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated that his group had no problems with either the Office or the Workers' group's text, except for the omission of the words "at the end of an assignment" from the Office text. If these words were omitted, workers would be able to breach contracts. Therefore, his group opposed the deletion of these words.

469. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that many of these workers were on indefinite assignments and they too should have the same rights, freedoms, duties and obligations as other workers.

470. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that in the case of a contract of indefinite duration, the usual laws of contract applied; however, if it was of definite duration there was a need for rules regarding mobility.

471. Noting that the intention of both groups was similar, the Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a sub-amendment to insert "having due regard to conditions regulating standard employment contracts" at the beginning of both subparagraphs.

472. The Employer Vice-Chairperson was not worried about standard employment contracts but about the non-standard ones; he therefore suggested a sub-subamendment to insert at the beginning of both subparagraphs the following: "subject to the terms and conditions of the workers' contract with the private employment agency".

473. The Worker Vice-Chairperson rejected this sub-subamendment because her group wanted precisely to ensure that workers who were placed by PREA were not given contracts with restrictive clauses which penalized them.

474. The Government member from Switzerland quoted the relevant Swiss legislation and pointed out that there were provisions to ensure that both parties concerned could interrupt fixed-term contracts by giving suitable notice.

475. The Government member of Germany did not know of any country where an employee on a fixed-term contract did not have to give notice of intention to leave before its expiry and suggested the inclusion of a similar clause.

476. The Employer Vice-Chairperson suggested a subamendment to add the words "at the end of a fixed-term contract" at the end of both subparagraphs.

477. The Worker Vice-Chairperson saw a fundamental difference in that a fixed-term contract usually specified terms for termination. However, contracts with PREA often carried additional penalties which the Workers' group wanted to address in their proposed amendment.

478. The Government member from Sweden suggested an introductory sentence to subparagraphs (1) and (2) as follows: "Having due regard to the rights and duties laid down in national law concerning the termination of contracts of employment, private employment agencies providing the services referred to in Article 1.1(b) of the Convention should not ...". The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons saw the proposal of the Government member from Sweden as a possible compromise and agreed to it.

479. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

480. Paragraph 9, as amended and subamended, was adopted.

Paragraph 10

481. The Government member of Lebanon had submitted an amendment to include "according to national law" after "should be encouraged". This amendment was not seconded and therefore not considered.

482. The Employer Vice-Chairperson presented an amendment to delete the last sentence of Paragraph 10. Even though he felt that it was appropriate to recommend cooperation between the PES and PREA, it was not necessary to spell out the modalities of this cooperation. Therefore, the second part of the Article could be deleted.

483. The Worker Vice-Chairperson could not agree with this proposal of the Employers as the Recommendation should give guidance on how cooperation and tripartism could be achieved in practice.

484. On behalf of the Member States of the European Union, the Government member of the Netherlands supported the Office text. The Government members of Norway and the United States also wished to retain the full Office text on this paragraph.

485. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, noting that there was little support for deleting the second part of the paragraph, withdrew his group's amendment.

486. The amendment submitted by the Worker members to replace "may" by "should" aimed at making it obligatory to establish tripartite bodies for enhancing the cooperation between the PES and PREA.

487. The Employers' group preferred the Office text and recommended that the word "may" should be retained rather than "should". On behalf of the Member States of the European Union, the Government member of the Netherlands concurred with the Employer members.

488. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed her concern at the hesitancy about activities promoting tripartism. After the Government members from Australia and Cyprus had indicated their preference for "may" and pointed out the voluntary nature of cooperation, the Workers' group withdrew their amendment.

489. Paragraph 10 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 11

490. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Lebanon to replace "cooperation" by "coordination" in the introductory sentence was not seconded and therefore not considered.

Clause (a)

491. The Employer members submitted an amendment to delete clause (a) which referred to the "pooling of information and use of common terminology so as to improve transparency of labour market functioning;".

492. Introducing the amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that information was a very important component of the competitive advantage of PREA. It was collected at a cost and could be compared to sensitive business data in other companies. To open this information to outsiders and to a public company in the same sector would be inconsistent with normal business practice. The Office text, however, suggested that such information be made freely available to the public employment services. This was not acceptable to the Employers' group.

493. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that she could not agree to delete clause (a). The PES and PREA should be able to work alongside each other, as a two-way process of exchange of information. She felt that information should be pooled for reasons of transparency and pointed out that this paragraph was in no way mandatory. It did not call for the pooling of all information and stated that measures "could include" the sharing of information especially of a non-sensitive nature. Therefore, she could not accept the proposal of deletion.

494. The Employer Vice-Chairperson indicated that the activities of PREA and PES were not comparable in this area; individual companies had to pay for information whereas the PES was funded by the taxpayers.

495. The Government member of Australia and the Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, did not understand the fears of the Employers. They felt the Office text was sufficiently flexible.

496. The Government member of Turkey pointed out the problems of wage differentials between regions. He supported the Workers' group in this matter and wanted to introduce a few additional words to the amendment; however, he was told by the Chairperson that this was impossible for procedural reasons, namely that the amendment was to delete a paragraph and at this stage it was too late to introduce a new amendment.

497. The Government members of Cyprus, Kenya and Norway also agreed with the Office text and felt that it provided enough flexibility. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, noting that the Governments showed little concern for the Employers, withdrew his group's amendment.

Clause (b)

498. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced his group's amendment to delete clause (b), which referred to the "exchanging of vacancy notices". He stated that this was an important point of principle for his group. He reiterated his position on the value of sensitive business information vital for its competitivity.

499. The Worker Vice-Chairperson was opposed to the deletion of this clause for the same reasons she had given in relation to clause (a). She believed that exchanging vacancy notices was another possible area of cooperation between the PES and PREA.

500. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, thought that exchanging vacancy notices could be helpful even if not all information was given. She basically could not see any problem with this clause.

501. The Employer member of the United Kingdom explained the reality behind this amendment. PREA often canvassed to find clients. It was not reasonable to expect that it should then hand over all its information to a subsidized competitor like PES. He felt there was no objection to handing over statistical information — but there should be no inference that agencies should be obliged to hand over these details.

502. The Government member of Switzerland shared the concern of the Employers. She thought it might be relevant to mention the system recently introduced in Switzerland. Two-way information was entered into the Internet — but on a voluntary basis. The Government member of the Republic of Korea also agreed with the Employers' position; he did not feel that this exchange of information would be useful.

503. The Government members of Cyprus, Kenya and Turkey felt that the Office text was sufficiently flexible.

504. The Employer Vice-Chairperson thought that the Government member of Switzerland had understood his point of view because Switzerland had had some experience in this area. He could accept a reference to statistical data on vacancies because this would exclude sensitive data being communicated to the PES. He also noted that he was very surprised that the Government members seemed unconcerned by the problems of PREA on this subject.

505. The Worker Vice-Chairperson was rather perplexed and wondered why PREA might not consider it appropriate to exchange information on vacancies to improve the functioning of the labour market. Were they really interested in improving cooperation with PES? She did not agree with the proposal of the Employers' group to change the wording of clause (a).

506. The Employer Vice-Chairperson believed that the Government member of Switzerland had clearly appreciated the Employers' concern and point of view. He was prepared to submit a subamendment to ensure that there was a reference to the anonymous nature of information — which did not belong to the public domain.

507. On behalf of the Member States of the European Union, the Government member of the Netherlands could agree to introduce the concept of "anonymous" but she repeated that, on the whole, she had no problem with the Office text. The Government member of Germany felt that PREA and PES could cooperate in many areas — for example, in the placement of handicapped workers

508. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that clause (b) did not define the nature of the exchange of vacancy notices. The term "anonymous" could rule out situations in which countries might accept an open exchange of vacancy notices. She pointed out that the Committee was discussing a Recommendation which did not contain any legal obligation and the term "could include" was sufficiently flexible.

509. The Government members of Australia and Sweden agreed with the Workers' position. The list was not exhaustive and the clause involved no obligation.

510. The Government member of the United States agreed with the Government member of Australia that the list of measures to promote cooperation under Paragraph 11 was only a list of possibilities. However, he could agree with the Employers' subamendment.

511. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that it was procedurally incorrect to submit a subamendment to an amendment designed to delete a clause. The Chairperson clarified that if there were tripartite consensus, the proposal to introduce a change at this stage could be considered. However, the Worker Vice-Chairperson disagreed with this proposal and the Chairperson had to concur that there was no consensus.

512. The Employer Vice-Chairperson acknowledged that procedural rules did not allow for any subamendment at this stage of the discussion and he withdrew his group's amendment.

513. Paragraph 11 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 12

514. The Government member of Japan, seconded by the Government member of India, introduced an amendment to replace "should have" by "should in accordance with national conditions and practice, have". In his view, the staff of PREA should be qualified and trained according to national requirements.

515. The Worker Vice-Chairperson considered this amendment unnecessary. She recalled that it had been agreed earlier not to include any reference to national conditions and practice in the Recommendation. The Employer Vice-Chairperson did not support the amendment and the Government member of Japan withdrew it.

516. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment to move this Paragraph between Paragraphs 7 and 8 as it was a matter for the Drafting Committee. The Committee agreed to refer the amendment to the Drafting Committee.

517. Paragraph 12 was adopted without change.

Paragraph 13

518. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's amendment to move Paragraph 13 to the "General provisions" section of the Recommendation as it was a matter for the Drafting Committee. The Committee agreed to refer the amendment to the Drafting Committee.

519. Paragraph 13 as adopted without change.

Adoption of the report, the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation

520. At its 18th sitting, the Committee had before it a draft report on its proceedings, which was introduced by the Reporter.

521. The Reporter, when introducing the report, drew the Committee's attention to the context in which its work had taken place. She recalled that the Committee had dealt not only with important issues of principle but also with many details which would have a major impact on the regulation of PREA and the protection of workers. Although she felt that the report was not sufficiently concise on certain controversial issues and did not therefore reflect the finer points expressed by some members, it nevertheless reflected accurately and fairly the positions expressed by them.

522. The Government member of Canada clarified her statement reproduced in paragraphs 196 and 203 of the report. She stressed that every country should have a basic list of categories of discrimination and that national law and practice was intended for any additional form of discrimination. Consequently, she asked that the sentence "She confirmed that national law and practice applied to the entire list of categories of discrimination" be deleted in paragraph 203. The proposed change was accepted by the Committee members.

523. As a result of the above change, the Government members of Sweden and the United Kingdom introduced a change to paragraph 204 of the report by adding at the beginning: "Under the assumption that national law and practice applies to the entire list of categories of discrimination, ...".

524. Several members proposed a number of changes in respect of their respective statements during the discussions, so that the report might reflect more accurately their statements. Subject to these changes the report was unanimously adopted by the Committee.

525. At its 19th sitting, the Committee examined the draft Convention and the draft Recommendation, as they were submitted to it by the Drafting Committee. The Committee noted that the Drafting Committee had not been able to agree upon a final wording for Article 5.1 of the Convention in respect of which it had considered two different wordings. It was therefore obliged to refer the issue back to the Committee, in particular the wording within brackets ",insofar as these are".

526. The Government member of Sweden was very concerned about the text in square brackets; he did not feel that this text reflected the discussion of the Committee. He also queried the meaning of the words "a Member shall ensure" with regard to the obligation that would stem from the Convention. Would this imply that if the list of grounds of discrimination were not covered by national law and practice, a ratifying Member might have to introduce legislation to that end?

527. The Government members of Denmark, the Netherlands and Switzerland indicated that the brackets should be removed and the words within brackets retained in the text.

528. The Government member of Canada did not accept the words within brackets and referred to Article 14 of the draft Convention which stated that: "the provisions of this Convention shall be applied by means of laws or regulations or by any other means consistent with national practice ...".

529. The Government member of Germany held the view that the removal of the square brackets would imply that any discrimination authorized at national level would be accepted as a result of this wording. He also felt that the words within brackets should be deleted. The Government members of France, Italy, Portugal, the United Kingdom and Norway agreed with the Government member of Germany.

530. The Government member of the Netherlands pointed out that age was not a ground for discrimination in his country. If the words in square brackets were deleted, he wondered whether legislation would have to be adopted on the matter.

531. In response to the request for clarifications raised by the Government members of Denmark, the Netherlands and Sweden, the Legal Adviser confirmed that under Article 14.1 of the Convention it would not be necessary for any Member to adopt legislation to implement Article 5.1, provided implementation could be ensured under other means such as court decisions, arbitration awards or collective agreements. The Legal Adviser's interpretation in the light of Article 14.1 was well received by the Committee members.

532. The Government member of Japan, in view of the Legal Adviser's explanation, accepted to delete the words: "insofar as these are" but still had problems with "age". He proposed to put the word "age" after "any other form of discrimination".

533. The Government member of Switzerland agreed with the Government member of the Netherlands and pointed out that in Switzerland there was no specific legislation on grounds for discrimination. Therefore, if the revised Convention No. 96 were ratified, PREA would be disadvantaged as compared to other enterprises. The Worker Vice-Chairperson reacted that she was surprised at Switzerland's statement since it had ratified the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) in 1961.

534. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that there was a large minority which did not want to delete the words in square brackets. He proposed a solution to add a new sentence to Article 5.1 as follows: "a member State may authorize exceptions to the provisions of subparagraph 1 above based on existing national law and practice". The Worker Vice-Chairperson said this was obviously unacceptable at this stage as this would undermine Convention No. 111.

535. The Chairperson stated that in accordance with article 67 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, amendments to a text submitted to a committee by its drafting committee could be proposed by the Chairperson after consultation with the Vice-Chairpersons. He therefore briefly suspended the meeting for consultation with the two Vice-Chairpersons. Following this consultation, he proposed an amendment to Article 5.1 as follows:

> In order to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in access to employment and to particular occupations, a Member shall ensure that private employment agencies treat workers without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction, social origin, or any other form of discrimination covered by national law and practice, such as age or disability.

536. The Committee understood that such a wording would imply that Members had to ensure, as a minimum requirement, that PREA would not discriminate on the grounds of discrimination that were forbidden under Article 1(a) of Convention No. 111. However, Members could expand the list of prohibited grounds for discrimination, in particular those relating to age or disability.

537. The Worker and Employer Vice-Chairpersons and the Government members agreed to the amendment proposed by the Chairperson.

538. Article 5, as amended, was adopted.

539. The Committee also made several changes in the French version of the draft Convention and the draft Recommendation, to bring it more into line with the English version.

540. The Reporter, the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons expressed their thanks to the Committee members for their work.

541. The Chairperson thanked the three groups for having worked together in a spirit of tripartism reaching satisfactory compromise solutions. The Committee had formulated and adopted modern and ambitious new standards. Moreover, since governments had ample opportunity to expose their concerns, consensus had been reached on major issues, including on the problems raised by age and disability, he expressed his hope and confidence that the Convention on Private Employment Agencies would be widely ratified.

542. The texts of the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation are reproduced below.

543. The report of the Committee and the texts of the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation are submitted to the Conference for consideration.

Geneva, 18 June 1997.

A. Draft Convention on Private Employment Agencies, 1997

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Eighty-fifth Session on 3 June 1997, and

Noting the provisions of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, and

Being aware of the importance of flexibility in the functioning of labour markets, and

Recalling that the International Labour Conference at its 81st Session, 1994, held the view that the ILO should proceed to revise the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, and

Considering the very different environment in which private employment agencies operate, when compared to the conditions prevailing when the above-mentioned Convention was adopted, and

Recognizing the role which private employment agencies may play in a well-functioning labour market, and

Recalling the need to protect workers against abuses, and

Recognizing the need to guarantee the right to freedom of association and to promote collective bargaining and social dialogue as necessary components of a well-functioning industrial relations system, and

Noting the provisions of the Employment Service Convention, 1948, and

Recalling the provisions of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, the Freedom of Association and the Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, the Employment Policy Convention, 1964, the Minimum Age Convention, 1973, the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988, and the provisions relating to recruitment and placement in the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949, and the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and adopts, this … day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven, the following Convention, which may be cited as the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997:

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention,

Article 1

1. For the purpose of this Convention the term "private employment agency" means any natural or legal person, independent of the public authorities, which provides one or more of the following labour market services:

(a) services for matching offers of and applications for employment, without the private employment agency becoming a party to the employment relationships which may arise therefrom;

(b) services consisting of employing workers with a view to making them available to a third party, who may be a natural or legal person (referred to below as a "user enterprise") which assigns their tasks and supervises the execution of these tasks;

(c) other services relating to jobseeking, determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, such as the provision of information, that do not set out to match specific offers of and applications for employment.

2. For the purpose of this Convention, the term "workers" includes jobseekers.

3. For the purpose of this Convention, the term "processing of personal data of workers" means the collection, storage, combination, communication or any other use of information related to an identified or identifiable worker.

Article 2

1. This Convention applies to all private employment agencies.

2. This Convention applies to all categories of workers and all branches of economic activity. It does not apply to the recruitment and placement of seafarers.

3. One purpose of this Convention is to allow the operation of private employment agencies as well as the protection of the workers using their services, within the framework of its provisions.

4. After consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, a Member may:

(a) prohibit, under specific circumstances, private employment agencies from operating in respect of certain categories of workers or branches of economic activity in the provision of one or more of the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1;

(b) exclude, under specific circumstances, workers in certain branches of economic activity, or parts thereof, from the scope of the Convention or from certain of its provisions, provided that adequate protection is otherwise assured for the workers concerned.

5. A Member which ratifies this Convention shall specify, in its reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, any prohibition or exclusion of which it avails itself under paragraph 4 above, and give the reasons therefor.

Article 3

1. The legal status of private employment agencies shall be determined in accordance with national law and practice, and after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers.

2. A Member shall determine the conditions governing the operation of private employment agencies in accordance with a system of licensing or certification, except where they are otherwise regulated or determined by appropriate national law and practice.

Article 4

Measures shall be taken to ensure that the workers recruited by private employment agencies providing the services referred to in Article 1 are not denied the right to freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively.

Article 5

1. In order to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in access to employment and to particular occupations, a Member shall ensure that private employment agencies treat workers without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction, social origin, or any other form of discrimination covered by national law and practice, such as age or disability.

2. Paragraph 1 of this Article shall not be implemented in such a way as to prevent private employment agencies from providing special services or targeted programmes designed to assist the most disadvantaged workers in their jobseeking activities.

Article 6

The processing of personal data of workers by private employment agencies shall be:

(a) done in a manner that protects this data and ensures respect for workers' privacy in accordance with national law and practice;

(b) limited to matters related to the qualifications and professional experience of the workers concerned and any other directly relevant information.

Article 7

1. Private employment agencies shall not charge directly or indirectly, in whole or in part, any fees or costs to workers.

2. In the interest of the workers concerned, and after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, the competent authority may authorize exceptions to the provisions of paragraph 1 above in respect of certain categories of workers, as well as specified types of services provided by private employment agencies.

3. A Member which has authorized exceptions under paragraph 2 above shall, in its reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, provide information on such exceptions and give the reasons therefor.

Article 8

1. A Member shall, after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, adopt all necessary and appropriate measures, both within its jurisdiction and, where appropriate, in collaboration with other

Members, to provide adequate protection for and prevent abuses of migrant workers recruited or placed in its territory by private employment agencies. These shall include laws or regulations which provide for penalties, including prohibition of those private employment agencies which engage in fraudulent practices and abuses.

2. Where workers are recruited in one country for work in another, the Members concerned shall consider concluding bilateral agreements to prevent abuses and fraudulent practices in recruitment, placement and employment.

Article 9

A Member shall take measures to ensure that child labour is not used or supplied by private employment agencies.

Article 10

The competent authority shall ensure that adequate machinery and procedures, involving as appropriate the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, exist for the investigation of complaints, alleged abuses and fraudulent practices concerning the activities of private employment agencies.

Article 11

A Member shall, in accordance with national law and practice, take the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection for the workers employed by private employment agencies as described in Article 1, paragraph 1(b) above, in relation to:

(a) freedom of association;

(b) collective bargaining;

(c) minimum wages;

(d) working time and other working conditions;

(e) statutory social security benefits;

(f) access to training;

(g) occupational safety and health;

(h) compensation in case of occupational accidents or diseases;

(i) compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims;

(j) maternity protection and benefits, and parental protection and benefits.

Article 12

A Member shall determine and allocate, in accordance with national law and practice, the respective responsibilities of private employment agencies providing the services referred to in paragraph 1(b) of Article 1 and of user enterprises in relation to:

(a) collective bargaining;

(b) minimum wages;

(c) working time and other working conditions;

(d) statutory social security benefits;

(e) access to training;

(f) protection in the field of occupational safety and health;

(g) compensation in case of occupational accidents or diseases;

(h) compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims;

(i) maternity protection and benefits, and parental protection and benefits.

Article 13

1. A Member shall, in accordance with national law and practice and after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, formulate, establish and periodically review conditions to promote cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies.

2. The conditions referred to in paragraph 1 above shall be based on the principle that the public authorities retain final authority for:

(a) formulating labour market policy;

(b) utilizing or controlling the use of public funds earmarked for the implementation of that policy.

3. Private employment agencies shall, at intervals to be determined by the competent authority, provide to that authority the information required by it, with due regard to the confidential nature of such information:

(a) to allow the competent authority to be aware of the structure and activities of private employment agencies in accordance with national conditions and practices;

(b) for statistical purposes.

4. The competent authority shall compile and, at regular intervals, make this information publicly available.

Article 14

1. The provisions of this Convention shall be applied by means of laws or regulations or by any other means consistent with national practice, such as court decisions, arbitration awards or collective agreements.

2. Supervision of the implementation of provisions to give effect to this Convention shall be ensured by the labour inspection service or other competent public authorities.

3. Adequate remedies, including penalties where appropriate, shall be provided for and effectively applied in case of violations of this Convention.

Article 15

This Convention does not affect more favourable provisions applicable under other international labour Conventions to workers recruited, placed or employed by private employment agencies.

[Final provisions]

B. Draft Recommendation concerning private employment agencies

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Eighty-fifth Session on ... 1997, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997, adopts, this ... day of ... of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven, the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Private Employment Agencies Recommendation, 1997:

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

1. The provisions of this Recommendation supplement those of the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997, (referred to as "the Convention") and should be applied in conjunction with them.

2. (1) Tripartite bodies or organizations of employers and workers should be involved as far as possible in the formulation and implementation of provisions to give effect to the Convention.

(2) Where appropriate, national laws and regulations applicable to private employment agencies should be supplemented by technical standards, guidelines, codes of ethics, self-regulatory mechanisms or other means consistent with national practice.

3. Members should, as may be appropriate and practicable, exchange information and experiences on the contributions of private employment agencies to the functioning of the labour market and communicate this to the International Labour Office.

II. PROTECTION OF WORKERS

4. Members should adopt all necessary and appropriate measures to prevent and to eliminate unethical practices by private employment agencies. These measures may include laws on regulations which provide for penalties, including prohibition of private employment agencies engaging in unethical practices.

5. Workers employed by private employment agencies as defined in Article 1.1(b) of the Convention should, where appropriate, have a written contract of employment specifying their terms and conditions of employment. As a minimum requirement, these workers should be informed of their conditions of employment before the effective beginning of their assignment.

6. Private employment agencies should not make workers available to a user enterprise to replace workers of that enterprise who are on strike.

7. The competent authority should combat unfair advertising practices and misleading advertisements, including advertisements for non-existent jobs.

8. Private employment agencies should:

(a) not knowingly recruit, place or employ workers for jobs involving unacceptable hazards or risks or where they may be subjected to abuse or discriminatory treatment of any kind;

(b) inform migrant workers, as far as possible in their own language or in a language with which they are familiar, of the nature of the position offered and the applicable terms and conditions of employment.

9. Private employment agencies should be prohibited, or by other means prevented, from drawing up and publishing vacancy notices or offers of employment in ways that directly or indirectly result in discrimination on grounds such as race, colour, sex, age, religion, political opinion, national extraction, social origin, ethnic origin, disability, marital or family status, sexual orientation or membership of a workers' organization.

10. Private employment agencies should be encouraged to promote equality in employment through affirmative action programmes.

11. Private employment agencies should be prohibited from recording, in files or registers, personal data which are not required for judging the aptitude of applicants for jobs for which they are being or could be considered.

12. (1) Private employment agencies should store the personal data of a worker only for so long as it is justified by the specific purposes for which they have been collected, or so long as the worker wishes to remain on a list of potential job candidates.

(2) Measures should be taken to ensure that workers have access to all their personal data as processed by automated or electronic systems, or kept in a manual file. These measures should include the right of workers to obtain and examine a copy of any such data and the right to demand that incorrect or incomplete data be deleted or corrected.

(3) Unless directly relevant to the requirements of a particular occupation and with the express permission of the worker concerned, private employment agencies should not require, maintain or use information on the medical status of a worker, or use such information to determine the suitability of a worker for employment.

13. Private employment agencies and the competent authority should take measures to promote the utilization of proper, fair and efficient selection methods.

14. Private employment agencies should have properly qualified and trained staff.

15. Having due regard to the rights and duties laid down in national law concerning termination of contracts of employment, private employment agencies providing the services referred to in paragraph 1(b) of Article 1 of the Convention should not:

(a) prevent the user enterprise from hiring an employee of the agency assigned to it;

(b) restrict the occupational mobility of an employee;

(c) impose penalties on an employee accepting employment in another enterprise.

III. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT SERVICE AND PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

16. Cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies in relation to the implementation of a national policy on organizing the labour market should be encouraged; for this purpose, bodies may be established that include representatives of the public employment service and private employment agencies, as well as of the most representative organizations of employers and workers.

17. Measures to promote cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies could include:

(a) pooling of information and use of common terminology so as to improve transparency of labour market functioning;

(b) exchanging vacancy notices;

(c) launching of joint projects, for example in training;

(d) concluding agreements between the public employment service and private employment agencies regarding the execution of certain activities, such as projects for the integration of the long-term unemployed;

(e) training of staff;

(f) consulting regularly with a view to improving professional practices.

Fifth item on the agenda: General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises

Report of the Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises

1. The Committee on Job Creation in Small and Medium-sized Enterprises was set up by the International Labour Conference at its first sitting on 4 June 1997. It was originally composed of 219 members (82 Government members, 68 Employer members and 69 Worker members). To achieve equality of voting strength each Government member with the right to vote was allotted 2,346 votes, each Employer member 2,829 votes and each Worker member 2,788 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified 7 times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each Member was adjusted accordingly.[1]

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Mrs. D. Mozdzenska-Mrozek (Government member, Poland);

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. A. Jeetun (Employer member, Mauritius) and Mr. C.A. Appiah Agyei (Worker member, Ghana);

Reporter: Mr. J. Ott (Government member, the Netherlands).

3. At its 11th sitting, the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mr. C. Bryant (Government member,

---

[1] The following adjustments were made:

(a) 5 June: 220 members (86 Government members with 1120 votes each, 70 Employer members with 1376 votes each and 64 Worker members with 1505 votes each);

(b) 6 June: 203 members (86 Government members with 189 votes each, 54 Employer members with 301 votes each and 63 Worker members with 258 votes each);

(c) 7 June: 200 members (87 Government members with 1064 votes each, 56 Employer members with 1653 votes each and 57 Worker members with 1624 votes each);

(d) 9 June: 189 members (87 Government members with 1288 votes each, 56 Employer members with 2001 votes each and 46 Worker members with 2436 votes each);

4. The Committee held 16 sittings. The Committee had before it Reports V(1) and V(2), prepared by the Office on the fifth item of the agenda of the Conference: General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises.

Introduction

5. Mr. Ishida, the representative of the Secretary-General, presented Reports V(1) and (2), which had been prepared by the Office as a basis for the Committee's discussion, and in particular the Proposed Conclusions at the end of Report V(2). He mentioned the scope and importance of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) in a world economy which was globalizing at a rapid pace. This was generating remarkable economic growth together with employment in some parts of the world, particularly in East Asia; but in other countries it was creating economic and social problems, such as increased unemployment, underemployment and poverty as well as a deterioration in working conditions and living standards. Many large enterprises tended to downsize and restructure to remain competitive, thus reducing employment opportunities. It was mainly in SMEs, including micro-enterprises, that new employment opportunities were being created.

6. The ILO had long been concerned with enterprise and cooperative development in developing countries through its efforts to promote employment, decent working conditions and social justice. Such efforts had included entrepreneurship and management training, productivity improvement and equitable gains-sharing and cooperative development for job creation and poverty alleviation. The ILO was also in the process of developing an international small enterprise development programme (ISEP), a comprehensive package including training components such as Start and Improve Your Business and other financial and non-financial business development support services.

7. The Governing Body had decided in March 1995 to place the topic of General conditions to stimulate employment creation in small and medium-sized enterprises on the agenda of the International Labour Conference. The discussion came at a time when employment was a major concern for most member States: statistics quoted in the report prepared by the Office for this Committee confirmed that small and medium-sized enterprises accounted for the vast majority of existing and particularly new jobs in both industrialized countries and developing countries. This situation was even more pronounced in transition economies where large-scale restructuring, privatization and the introduction of free market principles had resulted in the rapid growth of the SME sector.

8. The representative of the Secretary-General recognized, however, that the economic and social performance of the SME sector was diverse in terms of productivity, working conditions and social protection. In some cases high productivity and decent working conditions could be observed, but in many cases there was room for improvement.

9. The ILO was increasingly expected to be a centre of excellence as well as a centre of reference for employment, human and social issues in this newly globalized environment. While existing ILO instruments covered the SME sector, no fully comprehensive and coherent set of guidelines existed that specifically promoted employment through SMEs. The absence of a specific standard on general conditions to stimulate job creation in SMEs was therefore an important lacuna.

General discussion

10. In commenting on the Proposed Conclusions, the representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that at the time that these Proposed Conclusions were prepared, replies had been received from 71 Governments, and seven more had responded too late to be included. In addition, the Office had received separate replies directly from a considerable number of employers' and workers' organizations. With regard to the form the instrument should take, a large majority of the replies indicated that the most appropriate would be a Recommendation since a Recommendation provided considerable flexibility and could accommodate differing local conditions and circumstances.

11. In his opening speech, the Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed support for adoption of a Recommendation in this area and strongly favoured measures to enhance job creation in the SME sector. With an increasing number of jobs created by SMEs, workers in SMEs probably constituted the majority of the world labour force. Consequently, the quality of employment in SMEs, i.e. good working conditions, social protection, security and fairness, etc., should be an integral part of a wider strategy to promote efficient and competitive SMEs. A strong statement on the importance of improving basic working conditions in SMEs was needed.

12. Achieving higher efficiency and competitiveness could be greatly facilitated by the achievement of a higher level of workers' representation in SMEs through the fullest application of the right to freedom of association and labour protection legislation including adherence to safety regulations.

13. Equally important and needed were mechanisms to promote and achieve equal opportunities in employment, education, training, income, etc., in view of the continuing discrimination against women, and cases of racial and ethnic discrimination. Similarly, measures to ensure that SMEs did not engage in the employment and exploitation of children were needed.

14. In conclusion, the Worker Vice-Chairperson cautioned that the proposed instrument should not only cover issues related to the provision of an enabling environment and services to promote the growth of SMEs, but also cover measures related to the improvement of the quality of employment.

15. Introducing the position of the Employer members, the Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that there had been a revival of interest in SMEs, especially with the aggravation of the unemployment situation worldwide, with the average unemployment rate in the industrialized economies at 8.6 per cent, while in developing countries unemployment rates were generally even higher. In many African countries unemployment exceeded 20 per cent. Unemployment of such a magnitude was a cause of growing concern among all segments of society given its economic, social and political repercussions.

16. In such a difficult and challenging environment SMEs had been a silver lining on the horizon since they had been instrumental in minimizing the impact of unemployment and in cushioning the impact of recession by providing a means of livelihood for the bulk of the population in many countries. As they operated in all sectors, SMEs were an essential component of the industrial, commercial and economic structure of all countries of the world.

17. The case for employment creation by SMEs was based on sound and strong economic grounds. Since SMEs were labour-intensive and used local resources, additional jobs could be generated in a relatively short period. Thus, by channelling scarce capital resources to SMEs, particularly in developing and transition economies, employment opportunities could be maximized.

18. SMEs had proved to be more resilient to economic crises and had the capability of adapting themselves quickly to the changing economic environment, while it was widely recognized that they were dynamic and highly innovative.

19. The Employer Vice-Chairperson added that SMEs represented the bulk of enterprises worldwide. All these enterprises created productive jobs in the private sector and made a contribution to foreign exchange earnings in many countries. For example, in India, SMEs represented one-third of exports. He asked the participants to bear in mind all these advantages of SMEs before formulating any conclusions which could constitute constraints on SME development and thus "kill the goose that lays the golden eggs". As mentioned in the report some countries had already successfully promoted SMEs.

20. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that the performance of SMEs is also linked to the economic growth of countries. The Mauritian economy for instance had expanded by about 6 per cent a year for more than 15 years. During that time, the employment share of SMEs had gone up from 30 per cent to 42 per cent. In the nineties while employment in large enterprises had been almost stagnant, small enterprises generated virtually all the new jobs. Countries where SMEs had grown most rapidly had provided a congenial environment for enterprises to operate in and, consequently, their populations had reaped the benefits in terms of enhanced economic growth, higher per capita income, better standards of living, improved health and education opportunities. He considered it essential to create a business-friendly and enabling environment conducive to the growth of all enterprises — small, medium and large enterprises. All these enterprises formed a continuum and coexisted, belonging to the same family and standing on the basic foundation of private enterprise, the main characteristics of which were risk-taking, initiative and entrepreneurship.

21. The Employer Vice-Chairperson further mentioned that enterprises did not operate in a vacuum but in a broad political and economic framework which determined in large measure their development and success. As an ILO publication had put it "the best environment for small firms is a relatively free market that provides equal incentives and opportunities for all enterprises".

22. With rapid economic growth and higher purchasing power the demand for all types of goods and services expanded thereby enhancing the scope for SMEs. He felt that, generally, an overall policy mix favourable to large enterprises, was bound to have a salutary effect on SMEs as well. But a special package of incentives and policies targeted to SMEs could also be highly beneficial since it embodied a government's commitment to SMEs rather than just paying lip-service to it; it established a well-defined framework for SMEs to operate in; it removed to a certain extent the bias that government programmes may seem to have in favour of large enterprises; it encouraged entrepreneurship and individual initiative; and its impact on the target group could be gauged more accurately.

23. In the Employers' view key ingredients of an enabling environment for SMEs were political stability; good governance; acceptance of the concept of a mixed economy and of market mechanisms; effective and consistent policies (fiscal, monetary, wage, trade, labour, taxation, etc); appropriate investment incentives; internationalization of government regulatory measures and elimination of bureaucracy; investment in infrastructure; and investment in human capital.

24. The Employer Vice-Chairperson added that any enterprise was a combination of technical, commercial, financial and human resources, all of which formed part of production costs. To increase employment enterprises had to be competitive. This was all the more important in an era where enterprises had to adapt to a world environment characterized by a high degree of competition.

25. As the report rightly indicated "the objective for SMEs is to remain flexible and competitive by upgrading quality and productivity and keeping costs low". Their flexibility was particularly important since a rigid framework would stifle rather than promote SMEs.

26. Furthermore, to be competitive, SMEs had to improve productivity and quality which would provide the scope for a greater contribution to the economy, improved efficiency and more and better job opportunities. Productivity and quality could be enhanced through training. The ILO had spearheaded many projects and programmes in this respect and could contribute significantly through its expertise and strong comparative advantage.

27. The Employer Vice-Chairperson ended by stating that the ILO, which had always been in the forefront of SME development, had a great responsibility in providing technical assistance to help SMEs remain competitive in a globalized economy. It had promoted SMEs and entrepreneurship development perhaps more than any other institution and had helped to promote management and technical training. He wanted the ILO to continue this task with vigour and with more resources.

28. The Government member of Egypt encouraged the ILO to adopt an instrument in view of the contribution SMEs could make to employment creation worldwide and in Egypt in particular. She felt that the instrument should be flexible in order to be applicable to all sectors and keep in mind the interests of both employers and workers. She was convinced that such an instrument would reinforce tripartism.

29. The Government member of France strongly supported the initiative to put the item on the agenda. This reflected the increased importance that the ILO rightly attached to employment questions. He observed that the issue of employment creation was particularly important in a context where many workers had to be retrained and young people and women were entering the labour market. Statistics showed that SMEs were currently the main source of new jobs. He therefore recommended that the instrument to be adopted should serve as a point of reference for action to be taken by Governments and social partners and for international cooperation in this area.

30. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire informed the Committee of a tripartite workshop on the effects on employment of the devaluation of the CFA which had recently taken place. He wondered whether the report of the meeting was available and if so if it contained any conclusions with respect to SMEs which were of relevance to the deliberations of the Committee.

31. The deputy-representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee that he knew of the workshop but that he believed that the report was not yet available in Geneva. He undertook however to contact the Office's Director for Africa and would inform the Committee accordingly.

32. The Government member of Norway appreciated the initiative to put the item on the agenda. She considered that SMEs played a key role in employment. In her own country for instance they constituted 96 per cent of all enterprises and employed 40 per cent of the labour force. She felt that the Proposed Conclusions constituted a good basis for a constructive discussion which should lead to the adoption of a Recommendation which could help countries create a fertile environment for SMEs.

33. The Government member of Canada stated that his Government recognized the important contribution SMEs made to employment creation. Its policy had been founded on the establishment of a stable and non-interventionist economic and political climate which encouraged natural entrepreneurial spirit, risk-taking and business growth; the elimination of barriers to growth; and the provision of international leadership to stimulate growth and jobs. Although his Government supported the idea of a Recommendation he cautioned that such an instrument should not treat SMEs as smaller big enterprises with all the attendant rules and regulations. The instrument should rather promote effective support services, many of which did not need government intervention, and policies which encouraged growth and innovation. National policies should also take into account the social dimensions of the SME sector and the concerns of organizations representing SMEs.

34. The Government member of Kenya felt that the reports under consideration did not distinguish clearly between SMEs in the formal sector and micro-enterprises in the informal sector. He believed that it might be necessary to devote a separate section to such enterprises. In addition he stated that the eventual instrument should allow for differences between countries and regions in the sense that small in one country may be considered big in another.

35. The Government member of Greece stated that SMEs were particularly effective in respect of employment creation because of their flexibility. They therefore required simple regulations and tax regimes and ways and means needed to be found to help them introduce new technology quickly and train their workers. She also emphasized the importance of the availability of financial services for SMEs.

36. The Government member of Denmark considered the item of the agenda very important since it reflected the role SMEs could play in stimulating growth and welfare. While expressing general support for the comprehensive way the Office had listed all the issues involved in SME development she felt that particular attention needed to be paid to stimulating an entrepreneurial culture and to making available effective support services.

37. The Government member of Japan emphasized the importance of SMEs for employment and added that his Government supported the Proposed Conclusions as submitted to the Committee.

38. The Government member of the United States recalled the broad range of ILO instruments related to employment creation in SMEs. There was, however, no coherent set of guidelines integrating the best thinking on employment creation through enterprises of this scale. The Proposed Conclusions, based upon replies to a questionnaire, provided the starting-point for this initial discussion.

39. The creation and maintenance of good jobs depended largely on the business environment. Dynamic competition made an important contribution to the growth of productivity. The spirit of entrepreneurship was crucial for fostering job creation. Not all policies were conducive in this respect. Governments therefore needed to consider which policies were the most appropriate in an increasingly globalized economy.

40. He recalled in this context that regulation — which might be warranted at some point — could be an obstacle to competition and innovation. Promoting competition through ease of entry, privatization and deregulation lowered prices and improved services. This in turn created new jobs and higher incomes. Product market restrictions — such as land-use restrictions, limits on store hours and the use of part-time employment, and barriers to entry in distribution — also limited job creation.

41. Market-based economies underwent continual creation and destruction of jobs. Existing plants and businesses expanded or contracted, new plants and enterprises started up, and old plants and firms shut down. In a dynamic market economy enterprises grew and shrunk under the influence of competition from foreign and domestic rivals, negotiations between employers' and workers' organizations, restructuring, availability of credit and other financial services, regulatory and tax law changes, and changes in the cost and availability of labour and non-labour inputs.

42. He emphasized that a small number of highly successful SMEs grew very rapidly, but SMEs also failed at a disproportionate rate. Large, mature enterprises accounted for most newly created (and newly destroyed) manufacturing jobs. Smaller manufacturing enterprises exhibited sharply higher gross job-creation rates but not higher net creation rates. One-year survival rates for the stock of existing jobs increased sharply with employer size and age; the short-term survival rates of newly-created jobs rose with employer size. In terms of both new jobs and the typical existing jobs, larger employers generally offered greater job durability in manufacturing sectors.

43. He concluded by expressing support for the adoption of an instrument in the form of a Recommendation on general conditions to stimulate job creation in SMEs, which articulated the importance of a private enterprise based economy in the achievement of economic growth, employment creation and social progress.

44. The Government member of Italy noted the widespread presence of SMEs in her country and their enormous contribution to creating and maintaining jobs. As an illustration, she pointed out that in 1994 large enterprises had shed 125,000 jobs, while SMEs had created 200,000. She supported the Proposed Conclusions as they were flexible and allowed for national specificities. She encouraged tripartite consultations at local, regional and national levels as had already been suggested during the Enterprise Forum. She wished however to see more emphasis placed on women entrepreneurs.

45. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire recalled the Fifth Biennial Meeting of African Employment Planners in Pretoria held in January 1997 under the auspices of the ILO. This important regional meeting had underlined the role of SMEs in employment promotion in Africa. He recalled in particular issues related to employment strategies, the linkage between employment planning and enterprise promotion, the need for suitable financial mechanisms, and the orientation of investments towards labour-intensive public works programmes and SMEs. This general orientation had been strongly endorsed by the 20th Session of the OAU's Labour and Social Affairs Committee held in April 1997 in Addis Ababa. His Government had initiated several programmes for the self-employed, micro-enterprises and SMEs. In this context he referred specifically to the crucial role of Social Funds.

46. The Government member of Poland stated that recently many business supporting institutions had been established in Poland, including several financial assistance programmes. Government policy with regard to this group of enterprises was targeted at the creation of advantageous political, legal and economic conditions. An important contribution to the development of government policy with regard to SMEs was Poland's association with the European Union. Government policy with regard to SMEs was based on the industrial policy adopted in 1993 and the "international competitiveness of Polish industry" programme adopted by the Economic Committee of the Council of Ministers in 1994. In addition, the Ministry of Labour and Social Policy had initiated programmes aimed at promoting enterprise, vocational self-organization and supporting SME development.

47. Particular emphasis was placed on mechanisms and institutions promoting job creation through self-employment and small businesses, such as enterprise promotion centres, enterprise development funds and enterprise incubators.

48. In Poland there was growth of entrepreneurship among unemployed people. A crucial contribution in this field was made by self-employment loans through the Labour Fund. Additionally, in terms of funding, there were increasing attempts to involve employment services so that they might have access to self-employment assistance provided by the World Bank and PHARE, as well as some bilateral projects. In this context SMEs were important to absorb the manpower surplus from large enterprises, now in the process of restructuring and/or privatization.

49. The Government member of New Zealand did not support the introduction of an instrument concerning the general conditions to stimulate job creation in SMEs since he considered it inappropriate to use special instruments to target specific sectors of the labour market. The most efficient way to create jobs was to establish a supportive economic environment for all firms regardless of size. This could best be achieved by removing as much uncertainty from macroeconomic policy as possible. In New Zealand this had led to the stimulation of SMEs.

50. It was the policy of the Government of New Zealand to open up business opportunities to all firms while facilitating their ability to respond quickly to these opportunities. Opening up the labour market, deregulating capital markets, and increasing competition by lowering protective barriers to trade had created an environment in which job growth and the creation of SMEs had thrived. The goal was to reduce the compliance costs for SMEs by simplifying the company tax system and the regulatory environment.

51. Given the considerable variation in SME experience among ILO member States, his Government believed that it would be extremely difficult to draft an instrument that would accommodate the diversity of national policies and practice in this area.

52. The Government member of the Sudan said that his country had adopted a national strategy to promote social development through SMEs. To this end, several policies had been adopted to create a conducive environment. In addition, specific targeted programmes had been launched involving access to credit, other financial services and land ownership. The National Development Bank had been closely involved in this venture. He felt that international cooperation should be emphasized more in the Proposed Conclusions and the role of the ILO needed to be more clearly described.

53. The Government member of Ireland stated that SMEs were not homogeneous and that it was difficult to target measures at them. It was more appropriate to create a suitable economic environment. The instrument to be adopted needed to be flexible since not all SMEs needed support.

54. The Government member of the United Kingdom said that SMEs were crucial for the United Kingdom economy where firms with fewer than 100 employees formed 97 per cent of businesses, and these same firms employed over 80 per cent of the workforce. The United Kingdom therefore had no difficulty in accepting the spirit of the Proposed Conclusions.

55. Her Government had some difficulties with the details of the Proposed Conclusions. A standardized approach was inappropriate. Member States might indeed share similar objectives but they might have very different ways of achieving those objectives. Businesses operated best in a stable macroeconomic climate characterized by low inflation, incentive-based taxation and minimum regulation. The definition of SMEs was also not clear. Further research was needed into the common economic and other difficulties faced by SMEs in member States.

56. The Government member of Syria pointed out that the Proposed Conclusions were in the spirit of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. While the instrument to be adopted was economic in nature the goal was social. It would need to be flexible and fully take into consideration existing ILO instruments. In his country a special investment law provided financial incentives for SMEs taking on workers. It was important to ensure adequate protection of workers in SMEs. The fundamental safeguards and workers' rights were important regardless of enterprise size.

57. The Government member of Korea stressed the importance of SMEs in the national economy of his country, in terms of employment generated, production and added value. He noted, however, that each country was unique; thus, while the Proposed Conclusions were acceptable, they should not be enforced rigidly.

58. The Government member of Spain noted the priority which was accorded to the SME sector in his country in view of the current high level of unemployment. He informed the Committee that the Proposed Conclusions were in line with the current policies of his country.

59. In relation to the amendments which he had submitted, the Government member of Kenya expressed the view that the Conclusions as currently proposed would in effect marginalize the informal sector and micro-enterprises. He noted the interest of many countries in these types of enterprise, which often provided the main employment opportunities available to disadvantaged groups. The Government member of Algeria, while supporting the Proposed Conclusions, noted that micro-enterprises were especially important for job creation in his country.

60. The Government member of China stressed the importance of the SME sector in his country, in terms of numbers of enterprises and employment generated; both urban and rural SMEs played vital roles. He noted that the Proposed Conclusions should be brief and clear. In this regard, the main components of government policy in China were the reform of state-owned enterprises and the adoption of stable policies relating to taxation and supportive measures.

61. Several Employer members stressed the need for a flexible instrument which should not impose any additional regulatory burden on SMEs, but rather remove barriers to growth. Many SMEs were fragile, while the costs of regulatory compliance were higher for smaller enterprises than for large enterprises. In the United States for instance the yearly cost of complying with regulations amounted to $2,200 per worker in large enterprises, to $4,400 in enterprises with between 200 and 300 workers and to $5,500 in enterprises with fewer than 20 workers. It was noted that, while the Employer members were continuing to discuss the Proposed Conclusions, all agreed on the importance of SMEs in generating economic growth and employment opportunities.

62. The importance of adding a gender perspective was stressed by an NGO representative of the International Federation of University Women. She noted that statistical data in particular should distinguish by gender, so that those designing measures to support women in SMEs could be adequately informed of the differential impact on both women and men, which would show the competitive advantage of women in job creation in SMEs.

Consideration of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report V(2)

A. Form of the instrument

Point 1

63. Following opposition by both the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairmen to an amendment submitted by the Government of Kenya and seconded by the Government of Zimbabwe proposing to insert a reference to the informal sector and micro-enterprises, the Government member of Kenya withdrew the amendment on the understanding that he could submit a similar amendment for inclusion elsewhere in the Proposed Conclusions.

64. Point 1 was adopted without change.

Point 2

65. Since it was not seconded the Government of Kenya withdrew an amendment to adopt both a Convention and a Recommendation.

66. Point 2 was adopted without change.

B. Preamble

67. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to modify the suggestions for a possible Preamble since he felt that the Preamble should be more positive and forward-looking, while it should also acknowledge the important work undertaken with respect to SMEs by the Office. References to specific Conventions were not appropriate since most of those mentioned had not been widely ratified and the references would make the instrument overloaded whereas it should be flexible and widely diffused. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment since it was without precedent and its contents was covered in later sections of the Proposed Conclusions. He considered references to other instruments particularly important given the positive reactions received from Governments in their replies to the questionnaire contained in Report V(1).

68. The Government members of the Unites States, Canada and Côte d'Ivoire were not sure that all references to ILO instruments were relevant but although they agreed that there was a need to modernize ILO instruments they were uneasy as to the wording of the proposed amendment. They therefore suggested that the secretariat formulate new proposals for a possible Preamble on the basis of the discussion in the Committee and further consultations. The Government member of France did not support the amendment since he felt that the traditional form should be retained.

69. The deputy representative of the Secretary General clarified that the suggestions for a possible Preamble had been prepared on the basis of the replies received to the questionnaire and were in a form which was usual for ILO instruments. He indicated however that the secretariat was ready to reformulate the suggestions if the Committee so decided. The Employer Vice-Chairperson had no objection against a reformulation provided it reflected the concerns of the Employer members. The Worker Vice-Chairperson had no objection either provided the reformulation would in fact consist of additions to the suggestions for a Preamble as proposed by the Office. Following further expressions of support for reformulation by the Government members of the Philippines, Botswana and Kenya and consultations with the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons, the Chairperson informed the Committee that new suggestions for a possible Preamble would be drawn up during the current session of the Conference and submitted to the Committee for its consideration.

70. Since there seemed to be some confusion as to the Committee's decision, if any, on point 3 of the Proposed Conclusions, the Chairperson asked the representative of the Legal Adviser to inform the Committee about the legal aspects of the discussion on this point. The representative of the Legal Adviser informed the Committee that it was her understanding that the Committee had asked the Office to redraft the Proposed Conclusion concerned. She explained that this was not appropriate since it was the Committee's task to modify the text of the Proposed Conclusions. In addition, according to the Standing Orders in case of an apparent deadlock and lack of consensus in the Committee's deliberations the amendment under consideration should be voted upon or a subamendment submitted to modify the amendment.

71. The Government member of the United States stated that obviously the proposals for the Preamble needed further work and he was therefore ready to submit a subamendment to bracket the Proposed Conclusion so that new language could be agreed upon later which should include a reference to the importance of SMEs in relation to the global crisis in employment and take into account the amendment submitted by the Employers' group.

72. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported this view, emphasizing that the Preamble should in any case contain a reference to the Office's work with respect to SMEs. The Worker Vice-Chairperson suggested that the amendment be put to a vote.

73. The Government member of Egypt believed that it was important for the Proposed Conclusions, including the Preamble, to be acceptable to both Employers and Workers. She was therefore willing to submit a subamendment which would mention the importance of including in the Preamble both references to ILO instruments and to the Office's activities with respect to SMEs.

74. After some further debate and additional clarifications by the representative of the Legal Adviser the Chairperson briefly suspended the sitting to allow for informal consultations. Upon resumption of the sitting the Government member of Canada proposed a subamendment which would incorporate both the text proposed by the Office and that of the amendment submitted by the Employers and submit this combined text to a Working Party of the Committee for consideration and redrafting if necessary. The text agreed upon by the Working Party would then be submitted to the Committee for consideration. The amendment was seconded by the Government member of the United States and supported by the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons.

75. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted. A Working Party was appointed accordingly.

C. Definition, purpose and scope

76. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete detailed references to the criteria for definition of SMEs since such criteria changed over time and would make the instrument less flexible. The Worker Vice-Chairperson indicated his support for the amendment, which was then adopted.

77. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment to make it possible for Members to agree upon definitions for statistical purposes. The amendment was seconded by the Government member of the United States. It was adopted following statements of support by the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons.

78. The Government member of Kenya submitted an amendment to include references to the informal sector and micro-enterprises. The amendment was supported by the Government members of Côte d'Ivoire and South Africa but opposed by the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairperson. The Government member of Kenya then withdrew the amendment.

79. The Government member of the United States withdrew a further amendment which no longer was applicable.

Point 5

80. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment proposing to include a reference to enterprise culture. The Government member of Canada seconded the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment as the notion of enterprise culture was fairly complex and was already dealt with in point 12. The Employer Vice-Chairperson preferred the text as originally proposed. The Government member of the United States then withdrew the amendment.

81. The Government member of Kenya submitted an amendment to include a reference to the informal sector and micro-enterprises. However, in view of the earlier discussion about the informal sector and micro-enterprises, he then withdrew the amendment.

82. The Government member of the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to reflect the possibilities for workers in SMEs to acquire stocks and shares in their companies as this would benefit themselves and the enterprise. The Government member of Ireland seconded the amendment, which also received support from the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted a subamendment to clarify the meaning of the proposed amendment. The Government member of the United States stated that broad-based capital ownership was essential for the success of SMEs, and therefore supported the subamendment. The Employer Vice-Chairpersons indicated that he had no objection, and the amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

83. The Government member of the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to insert the word "sustainable" in clause (c). The Government member of Ireland seconded the amendment, which also received support from the Worker and Employer Vice-Chairperson. The amendment was then adopted.

84. The Government member of South Africa submitted an amendment proposing to add a clause concerning economic participation of disadvantaged and marginalized groups, since SMEs could play an important role in ensuring poverty alleviation and the integration of marginal groups into mainstream economic activities. The Government member of Kenya seconded the amendment, which also received support from the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that clause (b) sufficiently covered all aspects and groups of society. Hence there was no need for a special clause as proposed in the amendment. The Government member of France said that he was surprised by the Employers' position as, in his country, SMEs played an important role in the integration of marginalized groups into the labour market. This applied in particular to the long-term unemployed. The Government member of Botswana recalled that the instrument proposed was a Recommendation which only provided guidance to policy-makers and left enough flexibility. The amendment should therefore be adopted. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment and recalled the contribution that SMEs in the United States made to integrate the inner-city unemployed.

85. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that clauses (a) to (g) were macroeconomic in nature, referring to aggregates and covering all groups in society. There should not be an exception here. The Government member of South Africa recalled the success stories in South-East Asia where benefits of growth had also trickled down to the poor. A Worker member mentioned the substantial contribution that SMEs in the United States had made to integrate people on the margins of society. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then withdrew his objection and the amendment was adopted.

86. The Government member of the United Kingdom submitted an amendment to delete clause (d). The Government member of Ireland seconded the amendment. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that SMEs played an important role in increasing the capital stock and domestic savings in almost every country. They played a fundamental role in investment and therefore clause (d) should be maintained. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed and said that family businesses were characterized by high rates of reinvestment and retained earnings. The clause was very relevant. The Government member of the United Kingdom then withdrew the amendment.

87. The Government member of Brazil submitted an amendment to insert a reference to the quality of life to which SMEs could contribute. The Government member of Portugal seconded the amendment, which also received support from the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the Office was an organization that dealt with the world of work and that the notion of quality of life was much too extensive. One should not overburden the responsibility of SMEs. The Government member of Portugal said that the link between the quality of work and the quality of life was very close and could not be disassociated. The amendment was subsequently supported by the Government members of Belgium and Italy.

88. The Government member of France felt that the concept of quality of life was too broad in an instrument that dealt with job creation. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled the responsibility governments would have if the instrument placed so much emphasis on the concept of the quality of life. He recalled that SMEs contributed indirectly to the quality of life through the generation of income and the creation of jobs. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the term "possibility" left enough flexibility for policy-making by governments. The Government member of the United States felt that the amendment went beyond what was reasonably expected from SMEs and he therefore opposed the amendment.

89. The Government member of Brazil explained that his amendment was not binding but more an inspiration. The Employer Vice-Chairperson believed that the reference to the quality of life was far-reaching, difficult to implement, intangible and full of subjective value judgements. As a compromise he submitted a subamendment, qualifying the amendment, which was supported by the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

90. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to debate a reference to the responsibility of SMEs for social protection. He recalled that the Proposed Conclusions were about job creation. While social protection was a fundamental objective, it was doubtful whether SMEs alone could ensure it. The Worker Vice-Chairperson strongly opposed the amendment as society was better served by employment initiatives of SMEs that seek to give jobs to the young and unemployed. The Government member of the United States said that increased employment in SMEs would also raise the resources of the social security system and of the tax base. He therefore wished to maintain the original text.

91. The Government member of Italy pointed out that whatever the size of the enterprise there were always obligatory contributions to social protection systems. The Government member of France said that he had no problem with the text as it was. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the amendment.

92. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment which would provide for the insertion of the term "entrepreneurship" in clause (i). The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

93. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to move up clause (h). In addition, the amendment reflected more strongly the importance of good working conditions and of the right of workers to freedom of association. He pointed out that this was also in the interests of SMEs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that the notion "improved working conditions" implied adequate consultations and freedom of association. He also felt that since the section dealt generally more with macroeconomic issues the amendment was too specific. In reply a Worker member said that there was no greater macroeconomic issue for workers than the freedom to associate. This needed to be stated explicitly. The Government member of Zimbabwe pointed out that the words "higher level" and "fullest participation" implied that freedom of association existed already. The Worker Vice-Chairperson indicated that the amendment was of crucial importance for the Workers because of the low level of unionization in SMEs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled that the Preamble already mentioned freedom of association. Since the section summarized objectives it was not the place to mention means and instruments to attain these objectives. He furthermore wondered whether it was the role of SMEs to increase unionization. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then submitted a sub-amendment which would replace the word "higher" by "adequate" and the word "fullest" by the word "full". The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that the proposal would not really help job creation and might even be self-defeating. This was a question of principle because workers' participation was not an end in itself but only a means to job creation. He appealed to the Worker Vice-Chairperson to withdraw the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the rationale for the amendment was to guarantee quality jobs. The Government member of Botswana said that freedom of association and other well-established principles were adequately reflected in the Preamble. They provided the general background for the instrument. He wondered whether the amendment was really appropriate. The Government member of France supported the subamendment submitted by the Worker Vice-Chairperson as an acceptable compromise. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled that his group was not against freedom of association and reiterated his support for the text of the Proposed Conclusion. The Government member of Luxembourg proposed to suspend discussion of the amendment until the results of the Working Party constituted earlier would be known. This was supported by the Government members of the United States and Finland, as well as by the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairmen and discussion of the amendment was therefore suspended.

94. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment proposing to omit any references to specific types of ownership of enterprises. The Worker Vice-Chairperson believed that such references were useful. The Government member of South Africa was concerned about the lack of references to micro-enterprises and submitted a subamendment to include such a reference. The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons expressed their opposition against the subamendment which was then withdrawn. The Government member of Kenya expressed his disappointment at this decision since it did not seem very realistic to omit specific references to micro-enterprises and the informal sector in the Proposed Conclusions.

95. The Government member of the Sudan expressed the view that there seemed to be a contradiction between points 4 and 6 of the Proposed Conclusions. The Government member of the United States preferred to keep the references to types of ownership as originally proposed. After some further debate the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the amendment.

96. The Government member of Kenya withdrew an amendment he had submitted which had become superfluous as a result of an earlier decision of the Committee.

97. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to exclude farming enterprises from the Proposed Conclusions because of their unique character. The amendment was seconded by the Government member of Egypt. Following opposition by the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons the amendment was withdrawn.

98. The Government member of Korea submitted an amendment to exclude small-scale subsidiaries of large enterprises from the provisions of the Proposed Conclusions. The Government of Japan seconded the amendment but it was not supported by the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons. The amendment was then withdrawn.

99. The Government member of Brazil withdrew an amendment which was not seconded.

100. The Chairperson announced that after consultations with the Officers of the Committee, the Worker members had withdrawn an amendment submitted earlier, which did not contain an indication of the point under which it should be discussed. With the agreement of the Employer Vice-Chairperson, the Worker members had submitted a new amendment to be considered, later.

101. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then introduced the amendment mentioned by the Chairperson which proposed to add a new point after point 6 concerning the interests of the workers in SMEs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment on the grounds that the issues listed in the amendment were covered in clause (h) of point 5, that the amendment tended to limit the scope of this clause and that it implied that SMEs were bad employers.

102. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that the amendment reinforced clause (h) of point 5 and was neither repetitive nor restrictive. The Government member of Norway expressed the view that since the aim of the proposed instrument was job creation by SMEs and reference was made in other instruments to the issues referred to in the amendment there was no need to adopt the amendment. The Government member of Zimbabwe supported the position of the Government member of Norway. The Government member of Kenya expressed support for the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that because of the differences existing between large enterprises and SMEs, there was a need to underscore the importance of the issues raised in the amendment but in order not to create the impression that some SME practices were negative, the words "low" and "bad" in the amendment should be deleted. The Government member of Canada submitted a subamendment to reflect this. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

D. Policy and legal framework

103. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to clarify the first lines of the point. The amendment was seconded by the Government of Canada and supported by the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons. The amendment was then adopted.

104. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to include a reference to market-oriented principles. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment on the grounds that there was no agreement on the definition of market-oriented principles, and in order for qualitative jobs to be created by SMEs, there was a need for protection of not only workers' but also consumers' interests and rights. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment. The Government member of Canada opposed the amendment on the grounds that clauses (a) and (b) were broad enough to incorporate the concerns of the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The Government members of Italy, the Netherlands and the Sudan supported the position of the Government member of Canada. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the amendment.

105. The Government member of South Africa submitted an amendment to slightly modify clauses (a) and (b). The Government member of Kenya seconded the amendment. Both the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairmen opposed the amendment. The Government member of South Africa then withdrew the amendment.

106. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to add the words "and consistent" to the first clause. The rationale for this amendment was that consistency of policies was important both over time and among different policies. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment. After an inconclusive debate a vote was taken and the amendment was rejected with 117,208 votes in favour and 173,880 against, with 2,576 abstentions.

107. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to replace in clause (a) the word "pursue" by "adopt" which he felt was stronger.

He also proposed to replace the word "ensure" by "promote" as this was more realistic. The amendment was seconded by the Government member of Canada.

108. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that he was not opposed to the first part of the amendment but felt that the second part weakened the text. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment which would leave the word "pursue" and add the word "adopt". At the same time he felt that the word "ensure" was preferable to the notion "promote". The Government member of the Netherlands who had submitted a similar amendment said that the word "promote" was more realistic, as the notion "ensure" implied that governments could guarantee stability in the macroeconomic environment for SMEs. The Worker Vice-Chairperson accepted the subamendment proposed by the Employers. The Government member of the United States reiterated that the notion "ensure" was unrealistic. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire wondered what levels of inflation and what interest rate levels could be considered stable. Governments could not guarantee stability; it was only an objective towards which they could work. The Government member of Belgium supported this argument. A member of the Employers' group recalled the problems of employers in developing countries which gave governments a particular responsibility in the provision of support services, access to credit and a favourable regulatory and policy environment.

109. The Worker and Employer Vice-Chairpersons subsequently withdrew their opposition to the amendment which was then adopted.

110. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to replace in clause (b) the word "appropriate" by the word "effective", the word "zoning" by the word "location", to insert the word "adequate" before "social and labour legislation", and to insert "including labour-only subcontracting" after the words "social and labour legislation". The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the second and third part of the amendment but not the first and fourth. In particular, he felt that labour-only contracts were sufficiently covered by existing labour legislation. The Worker Vice-Chairperson wondered, if this was so, why the Employers would have a problem with it being specifically mentioned in the text. He therefore insisted that the fourth part of the amendment be maintained.

111. The Government members of Panama and South Africa emphasized that existing labour legislation covered all types of employer/worker contractual relations. The Government member of the Netherlands said that while he felt sympathetic towards the amendment, it was premature to decide at this reading on the integration of the issue of contract labour into the instrument. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the issue of contract labour was being discussed at another Committee of the Conference and that duplication should be avoided. The Worker Vice-Chairperson felt that labour-only subcontracting was not adequately covered by social and labour legislation. The Government members of Belgium and Italy argued for postponing the discussion of this particular issue to the following year. The Worker Vice-Chairperson subsequently withdrew the first and fourth part of the amendment, which was then adopted, as subamended.

112. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to replace in clause (b) the word "or" with "and" and add the words "according to national law and practice" after "legislation". The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the first part of the amendment but considered the second superfluous. The Government members of Botswana, Panama and the Netherlands also supported the first part of the amendment but not the second. The Employer Vice-Chairperson subsequently withdrew the second part of the amendment which was then adopted, as subamended.

113. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to modify clause (b). Since the amendment was not seconded the Government member of the United States withdrew the amendment.

114. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to consider the effect of structural adjustment policies in employment. The Employer Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment on the grounds that structural adjustment policies should not be singled out for review since they were part of overall economic policy. Furthermore, review of such policies was provided for under point 9 of the Proposed Conclusions. During a lengthy debate the Government members of Botswana, Côte d'Ivoire, France, the Netherlands, and the Sudan felt that the issue of structural adjustment went beyond the Committee's mandate. The Governments members of France, the Netherlands and Portugal suggested a rewording of the text, taking into consideration point 9 of the Proposed Conclusions. The Government member of Belgium then suggested that the issue be considered under point 9(2). The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to this suggestion and then withdrew the amendment.

Point 8

115. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Government members of Denmark, Finland, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, submitted an amendment to change the wording of the opening paragraph to make it more flexible.

116. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment while the Worker Vice-Chairperson , although considering the amendment unnecessary, also supported it. The amendment was then adopted.

117. The Employer Vice-Chairperson had submitted a similar amendment. He withdrew it in view of the adoption of the previous amendment.

118. The Government member of the United States proposed two amendments which were not seconded. He then withdrew the amendments.

119. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to delete a reference to taxation. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment on the grounds that SMEs should not as a general rule benefit from lower rates of taxation since this constituted an inappropriate subsidy. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed to refer the amendment to the Drafting Committee to find an appropriate wording to introduce the concept of fair taxation. The Committee accepted the proposal.

120. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment that emphasized the need for measures to protect the rights and working conditions of workers in SMEs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment on the grounds that the original text was explicit and broad enough, while introducing the word "regulation" might encourage governments to introduce administrative regulations which could inhibit the development and growth of SMEs. After some debate the Government member of the United Kingdom suggested the use of the word "legislation" instead of "laws" in the text. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that if the word "legislation" encompassed "laws and regulations" he was ready to accept the subamendment. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

121. The Government member of Japan, seconded by the Government member of the United States, submitted an amendment to exclude family enterprises from the provisions of clause 1(b). The Employer and Worker Chairmen opposed the amendment, which was then withdrawn.

122. The Government member of South Africa, seconded by the Government member of Zimbabwe, submitted an amendment to add a new clause to compensate SMEs for the relatively higher transaction costs and compliance burden. The Employer Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment since its administration would be too complicated. It would be better to adopt appropriate policies rather than resort to compensatory measures. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment in view of the contents of clauses 2(a) and 2(g). The amendment was then withdrawn.

123. The Government member of Canada, seconded by the Government member of the Netherlands, submitted an amendment promoting the observance by SMEs of international labour standards related to child labour. In seconding the amendment, the Government member of the Netherlands speaking on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, emphasized that abuse of children in the form of child labour should be abolished. This was an important issue in the context of SMEs. The Government member of the United States supported the amendment and suggested that a reference to child labour could also be incorporated in the Preamble. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported this suggestion as well as the amendment. After consultations with his group, the Employer Vice-Chairperson also expressed his support for the amendment as well as for the suggestion to include a reference to child labour in the Preamble. The amendment was then adopted.

124. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace the word "address" in paragraph 2 with "remove". The Worker Vice-Chairperson, while accepting the amendment, proposed a subamendment to delete the words "in particular". The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted the proposed subamendment. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

125. The Government member of the United States withdrew an amendment which was not seconded.

126. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to delete some words from clause 2(b) which he felt were too negative. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the constraints listed in paragraph 2 were all negative and therefore the words concerned should be retained. Accepting this point the Employer Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the proposed amendment.

127. The Government member of the Netherlands submitted an amendment on behalf of the Government members of Belgium, Finland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands and Portugal concerning possible disincentives for SMEs to hire personnel, in particular their first employee. The Worker Vice-Chairperson felt that the contents of the amendment was already covered elsewhere. He objected especially to the part referring to "first employee". The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment deleting a reference to financial risk and to the hiring of a first employee. The Government member of the United States submitted a subamendment to incorporate part of the amendment in clause 2(g). The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

128. The Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of South Africa, submitted an amendment to replace in clause 3 the word "upgrading" by the word "assisting". The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to add the word "assisting" while retaining the word "upgrading". The Government member of the United States had no objection to the subamendment, which was also supported by the Employer Vice-Chairperson . The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

129. The Chairperson proposed to deal at the same time with two practically synonymous amendments, one submitted by the Employer Vice-Chairperson, the other by the Government members of Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, providing for the insertion of "as appropriate" at the end of the first line. The Worker and Employer Vice-Chairpersons supported the amendments which were then adopted.

130. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete a reference to the administrative burden on SMEs connected with surveys and data collection, since it was already adequately covered elsewhere. The Employer Vice-Chairperson preferred the original text and expressed opposition to the amendment as it ignored the special situation and needs of SMEs. The Government members of Belgium, France, Norway, the United States and the United Kingdom also preferred the original text. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the amendment.

131. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment he had submitted since it had become superfluous.

132. The Worker Vice-Chairperson subamended an amendment his group had submitted to include a reference to the impact of structural adjustment programmes on job creation in SMEs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted the subamendment, which was then adopted.

133. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to substantially modify paragraph 3. The Employer Vice-Chairperson preferred the original text, which reflected better the particular situation of SMEs and allowed more flexibility. The amendment introduced an undue measure of uncertainty and lack of clarity. He therefore opposed the amendment. The Government member of the Netherlands pointed out that the original text already provided for tripartite consultations and there was thus no need for the amendment. This view was supported by the Government members of Belgium, Botswana, Italy and Senegal. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then submitted a subamendment to only delete a part of the paragraph to avoid a situation where it could be interpreted to lead to the dismantling of social and labour legislation. A Worker member referred to the special situation of SMEs in Italy where unionization was very low. The Worker

Vice-Chairperson then proposed another subamendment. The Employer Vice-Chairperson still felt that the existing text was sufficiently clear and adequate. The Government members of Canada, Norway and the United States also preferred the original text, while the Government member of France supported the subamendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, in a spirit of compromise, then submitted another subamendment proposing the insertion of a reference to the improvement of the conditions of workers in SMEs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson suggested a slight modification which was accepted by the Worker Vice-Chairperson . The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

134. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to replace clause 3(b) with a new text which elaborated in more detail the need for social protection and participation in social security schemes of workers in SMEs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson believed that the existing text was clear enough and had reservations concerning the amendment since it was too rigid. The Government member of Senegal expressed the view that the Proposed Conclusions should remain flexible and that the Workers' amendment was too detailed. The Government member of the Netherlands then proposed a subamendment to adopt only the first three lines of the amendment. Suggesting a slight modification, the Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the subamendment, proposing that it be included as a new paragraph 4.

135. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then suggested to delete a reference to threshold requirements. This was accepted by the Worker Vice-Chairperson . The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

136. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment proposing to delete paragraph 1. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the proposed amendment. During a drawn-out debate, the Government members of Belgium, Botswana, Cuba, Italy, the Netherlands, the United States and South Africa objected to the proposed amendment since Members should be free to consult any organization they felt it was necessary and useful to consult. As a compromise, the Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted a subamendment to retain part of the paragraph in a modified form. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

137. The Chairperson informed the Committee that two amendments concerning paragraph 1 had been withdrawn since they were no longer relevant. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to underscore the importance of gender equality. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment. The Government member of Italy suggested that the French version be reworded by the Drafting Committee. The amendment was then adopted.

138. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted an amendment to delete paragraph 3 since its retention would lead to unnecessary changes, instability and additional expenditure. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that the paragraph followed naturally from the previous ones and that policy reviews usually resulted in improvements. The Government member of the Côte d'Ivoire also opposed the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Government member of the United States and the Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed subamendments to reflect the need for a consultation mechanism. After a lengthy debate during which the Government members of Algeria, Côte d'Ivoire, the Netherlands and South Africa expressed support for the last subamendment, the amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

139. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to underscore the importance of SME growth and job creation. The Worker Vice-Chairperson was not opposed to the amendment but submitted a subamendment concerning the social protection of workers. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that the subamendment was unnecessary. The Government members of Botswana, the Netherlands, Senegal and South Africa opposed the amendment since they considered it repetitive. The amendment and subamendment were then withdrawn.

140. The Government member of Canada withdrew a similar amendment.

141. While introducing an amendment submitted by his group, the Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted a subamendment to delete the point instead of modifying it. The Government members of Belgium, Botswana, Canada, the Côte d'Ivoire, France, South Africa and the United Kingdom supported the proposed deletion since it added no real value to the Proposed Conclusions and the issue of decentralization should be left to individual Members. The Government members of Italy, Senegal and the United States were in favour of modifying the original text to provide flexibility. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that, in light of the debate and the issues raised, he was not opposed to deletion. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

142. Two other amendments were then withdrawn since they were no longer relevant.

E. Development of an enterprise culture

Point 12

143. The Worker Vice-Chairperson subamended an amendment submitted by his group deleting three paragraphs from the amendment since the issues in these paragraphs were considered elsewhere, especially in the Preamble. He underscored the importance of improving the terms and conditions of employment for workers in SMEs and suggested that this should guide the Office in its technical cooperation activities for SME development.

144. The Employer Vice-Chairperson opposed discussion of the amendment on the grounds that it was similar to an amendment withdrawn earlier on the basis of a gentleman's agreement between the Officers of the Committee. He felt that its resubmission by the Workers' group at this stage constituted a breach of the agreement and created a climate not conducive to tripartite negotiations. Under the circumstances, the Employer Vice-Chairperson requested that a representative of the Legal Adviser clarify the situation.

145. The representative of the Legal Adviser advised the Committee that in accordance with article 63 of the Standing Orders an amendment withdrawn earlier could be resubmitted later under another point. She could, of course, not make a pronouncement on the implications of any mutual or gentleman's agreement between Officers of the Committee since this was a matter strictly for the Committee to deal with.

146. The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that during the debate on an earlier amendment submitted by his group he had reserved the right to return to the matter now under discussion. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed the view that the discussion reflected a lack of trust since it was not a matter of legal rights and he was afraid the matter would be brought up again later on. He then asked for a record of the proceedings of the earlier discussion to be produced in order to clarify the situation so that nobody would be falsely blamed. He further requested that the current discussion be reflected in the record of proceedings. The Committee then briefly adjourned to allow for consultations, following which the Chairperson confirmed that the Officers of the Committee would be provided with a copy of the relevant parts of the record of proceedings.

147. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that his group had acted in good faith. In a spirit of cooperation he withdrew the amendment, while indicating that his group would return to the matter during the discussion of another amendment already submitted for discussion under point 16. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reminded the Committee that the subject under discussion was job creation. This concern should not be diluted by extraneous considerations.

148. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add the word "ethical" in the title of section E. This would reflect the role and obligation of enterprises to meet certain minimum social standards. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that there were so many amendments proposed by the Workers' group under this point that they risked deforming the original intention of the Proposed Conclusions. This point was, after all, about enterprise culture and there was no place for the insertion of notions such as "ethical" and "democratic", particularly since there was already a reference to equitable practices. Also, it was not really clear what was meant by ethical. The Government member of Zimbabwe opposed the amendment since it would create confusion. The Government member of the United States said that small business development was linked to so many basic values which were not specifically mentioned in the Proposed Conclusions such as, for example, the fight against corruption and bribery, that the insertion of "ethical" did not make much sense. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that ethics, social justice and democracy at the workplace were at the core of the Organization's mandate. Hence, a reference to these notions could not possibly dilute the concerns about job creation. The Government member of Botswana made a plea to avoid a debate about ethics. The Government member of Norway supported this. She did not wish to overload the point, but suggested the possible insertion in the text of a reference to an ethical basis. The Government member of the Netherlands felt that there were too many amendments to the point. A Worker member explained that in enterprises the employers' interests and advantages often prevailed over mutual respect and the protection of those in need of support. The Government member of the Sudan said that while he understood the concern of the Workers he felt that there was no need for the amendment. The Government member of Guinea stated that the original text already took into account the concerns of the workers about consultations and that the reference to "ethical" was not necessary. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the amendment but suggested the insertion of the word "ethical" in the first paragraph of the text. The Employer Vice-Chairperson rejected this. The Government member of the Netherlands said that the other amendments submitted by the Workers' group already covered the ground and that there was no need for this subamendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then withdrew this and another amendment.

149. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to include a reference to "full involvement of all social partners". The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that the amendments submitted by the Workers' group destroyed the spirit of the Proposed Conclusions and suggested they should be considered simultaneously. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, requesting protection from the Chair, strongly protested against the implications and the language used by the Employer Vice-Chairperson as it was his group's prerogative to suggest improvements to the Proposed Conclusions. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then accepted to consider the amendments one by one. He said that the reference to full involvement constituted a straight-jacket and suggested a subamendment qualifying the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson accepted this subamendment. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

150. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert a reference to collective and family-based initiatives. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that this addition was redundant. The Government member of Canada submitted a subamendment to replace "collective" by "cooperative". The Worker Vice-Chairperson accepted this subamendment while the Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to delete the word "individual" in the original text. The Worker Vice-Chairperson preferred this latter subamendment. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

151. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to include a reference to productive employment and social responsibility. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the Proposed Conclusions already dealt sufficiently with matters such as productivity, quality and social practices. He therefore preferred the original text. The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that productivity was not the same as productive employment. The Government member of Botswana felt that the amendment was redundant. This was supported by the Government member of the Côte d'Ivoire. The Government member of Senegal wondered what was meant by "social responsibility". The Worker Vice-Chairperson responded that it referred to the responsibility an enterprise had towards the community where it was located. The Government member of Senegal said that with this explanation he could support the amendment. In spite of this support, the Worker Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the amendment.

152. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to include a reference to environmental sustainability since this was a serious problem in developing countries. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that environmental sustainability was mainly the concern of government agencies and was external to enterprise culture. The Government members of Belgium, the Côte d'Ivoire, Ireland and Zimbabwe opposed the amendment, while those of Botswana, France, Senegal and the United Kingdom expressed qualified support.

153. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted a subamendment to insert a reference to the promotion of environmental consciousness. This subamendment was supported by the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

154. The Government member of Ireland observed that the Proposed Conclusions did not mention more obvious characteristics of enterprise culture, such as wealth creation, profits, independence, competition, market orientation, innovation and the application of new technologies. The Government member of the United States supported this observation. He suggested that the whole section was in need of reformulation and should reflect the points raised by the Government member of Ireland. This could be done during the Committee meeting the following year.

155. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment referring to good management. The amendment was not supported by the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the amendment since he felt that there was an apparent misunderstanding.

156. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert the word "adequate". The amendment received the support of the Employer Vice-Chairperson and was then adopted.

157. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to include a reference to workers' rights since respect for workers' rights was essential for good labour relations. The Employer Vice-Chairperson said that the notion of good labour relations already implied respect for workers' rights. He therefore considered the amendment redundant. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then proposed a subamendment to instead add a reference to industrial relations. The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted this. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

158. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment submitted by his group concerning the role of employers' and workers' organizations.

159. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment submitted by his group to insert a qualifying clause since he preferred a similar one submitted by the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom. The Worker Vice-Chairperson also accepted the amendment, which was then adopted.

160. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment intended to improve the formulation of the original text. The Employer Vice-Chairperson preferred the original text. He then submitted a subamendment combining part of the original text and the amendment. This was accepted by the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

161. The Government member of the Netherlands introduced an amendment submitted by the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom to introduce the notion of life-long learning which was nowadays essential for employability. A subamendment to cover both workers and employers was agreed upon between the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairmen. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

162. The Worker Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment concerning workers' rights.

163. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to include a reference to multi-skilling which was necessary in SMEs. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

164. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment to replace the term "labour relations" by "employer-employee relations" since in many SMEs unions were not present and he was uncertain whether the term "labour relations" covered such cases. Although the amendment was seconded by the Government member of the United States, the Government member of Canada withdrew the amendment immediately after his statement in order to accelerate the discussion.

165. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to clarify the wording of the text. The Worker Vice-Chairperson was willing to accept the first part of the amendment but objected to the second part since it left out some important concepts. The Government member of the Netherlands felt that the word "promote" should not be deleted since awareness campaigns automatically involved promotion. The Government member of Belgium felt that the amendment simplified the text. The Government member of the United States submitted a subamendment to introduce the notion of "rule of law". After some debate as to whether the notion of "socially beneficial" should be retained, the Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to a rewording of the amendment. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

166. In view of the adoption of the previous amendment, three other amendments concerning the same paragraph, submitted by the Government member of the United States and the Worker members, were withdrawn.

167. The Government member of South Africa submitted an amendment to replace clause (2)(d) with a new text referring to disadvantaged groups in society. The Government member of Canada seconded the amendment. The Government member of South Africa introduced a subamendment to also add a reference to women. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment and the subamendment. The Employer Vice-Chairperson preferred to maintain the reference to "both men and women". The Government member of South Africa expressed the view that this would defeat the purpose of the amendment. The Government member of Botswana agreed with the subamendment submitted by the Employer Vice-Chairperson since role models were needed in all sectors of society. After some further discussion, the amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

168. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a new clause on social and economic justice since this basic question needed to be integrated into the campaigns for the promotion of enterprise culture. The Employer Vice-Chairperson found it difficult to accept the amendment on the grounds that social and economic justice were covered extensively elsewhere. There was therefore no need to repeat it here. The Government member of Zimbabwe agreed with the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the amendment.

169. The Worker Vice-Chairperson in introducing an amendment proposed a subamendment to delete a reference to the rule of law, as this was already covered elsewhere. The issues raised in the proposed amendment were vital elements of enterprise culture in all societies. Human rights and workers' rights needed to be promoted by enterprises since these were as important as productivity improvement and improved working conditions. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that human rights was a concern of all governments and this was therefore not the right place for it. A reference to fundamental workers' rights had already been placed in the Preamble which also contained references to the core instruments. He therefore opposed the amendment. The Government members of Botswana, France, the Netherlands and Norway felt that the reference in the Preamble was sufficient. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then proposed a subamendment to include the reference elsewhere. The Employer Vice-Chairperson agreed to this. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

F. Development of an effective SME service infrastructure

170. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment, which was seconded by the Government member of Canada, to emphasize that the services mentioned could also be provided by the private sector including by SMEs and private consultants. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed support for the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to insert the words "direct and indirect". The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted. Four other similar amendments were then withdrawn.

171. The Government member of the United States, submitted an amendment to include a reference to capital markets, since these could provide additional support for SME growth and development. The amendment was seconded by Belgium. The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairmen supported the amendment. The amendment was then adopted.

172. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to include a reference to marketing research. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment. The Government member of Norway suggested that the Drafting Committee should find a more appropriate way to describe marketing research and marketing assistance. The amendment was then adopted.

173. The Government member of Brazil, seconded by the Government member of South Africa submitted an amendment to delete clause (f). The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained how important packaging was for SMEs and that the clause should therefore be retained. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The amendment was then withdrawn.

174. The Government member of Brazil, seconded by the Government member of South Africa, submitted an amendment to underscore the importance of product presentation. The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons supported the amendment. The amendment was then adopted.

175. The Government member of Brazil, seconded by the Government member of Portugal, submitted an amendment which stressed the importance of continued assistance to SMEs in order to develop and grow. The Worker and Employer Vice-Chairpersons supported the amendment. The amendment was then adopted.

176. The Government member of Canada, seconded by the Government member of the United States, submitted an amendment to underscore the importance of providing information on internal and international trade opportunities to SMEs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson also supported the amendment, while drawing the attention of the Committee to the fact that SMEs in developing countries sometimes faced unfair competition from subsidiaries of multinational enterprises. This might be a useful subject for discussion at the meeting of the Committee during the next Conference. The amendment was then adopted.

177. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to redraft a clause emphasizing the importance of innovation in SMEs to increase productivity and to benefit workers. The Employer Vice-Chairperson was in favour of support for innovation and modernization in SMEs but suggested that part of the amendment be deleted since it had already been dealt with elsewhere. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

178. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to include new clauses on workers' rights, labour legislation, gender equality, occupational health and safety, social protection issues and education and training. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment which would retain the basic idea behind the amendment and make it more consistent with other parts of the Proposed Conclusions. The Worker Vice-Chairperson suggested that the reference to "workers' rights" should be maintained since it was fundamental to the quality of employment. The Government members of Botswana, the Netherlands, Norway and Zimbabwe agreed with the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The Employer Vice-Chairperson submitted a revised subamendment to reflect this. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted. The Government member of Canada withdrew a similar amendment.

179. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to emphasize that Governments should act as a facilitating agent. The Government members of France and the United States felt that the first part of the amendment was superfluous and inconsistent with previous points. The Worker Vice-Chairperson also opposed the first part of the amendment on the grounds that it added nothing to the text and was therefore unnecessary. The amendment was subamended accordingly and adopted. A similar amendment was then withdrawn.

180. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to include a reference to the involvement of workers' and employers' organizations in consultation mechanisms. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment. The amendment was then adopted.

181. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete reference to specific examples of institutions providing services to SMEs on the grounds that it was impossible to have an exhaustive list given the variations among countries. The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to combine this and two related amendments, retaining references to specific institutions and introducing a reference to the role of the public sector. The Government member of the United States welcomed the addition of SMEs to the list of examples and supported the subamendment. After some debate a subamendment to delete a reference to "trade associations" and include a reference to "employers' and workers' organizations" was supported by the Employers and Workers Vice-Chairpersons. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

182. The Government member of the Netherlands introduced an amendment, on behalf of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom, to recognize that SMEs at different stages of development, of different sizes and in different sectors, required different services. The Employer and the Worker Vice-Chairpersons supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

183. The Government member of the United States, seconded by Canada, submitted an amendment to bring out more clearly the potential role of SMEs in the provision of services. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted a subamendment to combine the original text with the amendment. The Government member of the United States did not agree to the subamendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson accepted the proposed amendment after further explanations on the rationale of the amendment by the Government member of the United States. The amendment was then adopted.

184. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete a qualifying clause since he felt that a conditional phrase would defeat the purpose of the whole paragraph. The Employer Vice-Chairperson objected to the amendment since it would change the meaning of the paragraph. Anticipating the next amendment he indicated that he would be prepared to accept the amendment if the Worker Vice-Chairperson would withdraw the next amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed to this. The amendment was then adopted.

185. The next amendment was withdrawn by the Worker Vice-Chairperson as agreed earlier.

186. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment, which was seconded by the Government member of the United States, to add a reference to competitiveness in domestic and global markets since SMEs had to be competitive domestically and globally if they were to contribute to job creation. The amendment received support from the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The Government members of Botswana, France, the Netherlands, Norway, Senegal and the United Kingdom supported the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, although initially opposed to the amendment, accepted the amendment as proposed on the basis of the arguments presented in the discussion. The amendment was then adopted.

187. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment, which was seconded by the Government member of the United States, to make the text more precise. The Worker Vice-Chairperson objected to the amendment in view of an earlier agreement concerning the text of this point. The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted the position of the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The Government member of Canada then withdrew the amendment.

188. The Government member of Canada, seconded by the Government member of the United States, submitted an amendment to replace the words "adopt measures to ensure" with the word "facilitate". He said that the amendment would improve the text and make it clear that Governments cannot ensure access by SMEs to finance and credit. The Government members of Belgium, Botswana, Côte d'Ivoire, and the United States supported the amendment. The Government member of the Netherlands preferred the text of amendments on the same point to be considered later. The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons supported the amendment. The amendment was then adopted. In view of this adoption the next three amendments were withdrawn.

189. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to simplify the text. The Worker Vice-Chairperson accepted the amendment provided the word "supplementary" was retained from the original text. The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted this. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

190. The next amendment was withdrawn by the Government member of the United States.

191. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment, which was seconded by the Government member of Botswana, to improve the wording and delete references to examples, since they were not particularly illustrative. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment. The Government member of South Africa opposed the amendment since he felt that the examples cited were relevant, particularly in the context of the situation in his country. The Worker Vice-Chairperson also opposed the amendment. The Government member of the United States then withdrew the amendment.

192. The Employer Vice-Chairperson objected to the discussion of the next amendment since it was not in line with the gentleman's agreement that he thought had been concluded. At any rate, the contents of the amendment had already been dealt with earlier. The Chairperson recalled the earlier declaration by the representative of the Legal Adviser according to which it was possible to reintroduce an amendment with the same wording at a later stage of the discussion. Following informal consultations among the Officers of the Committee, the Worker Vice-Chairperson indicated that he was ready to withdraw the amendment and proposed a subamendment to point 17, which referred to policies to improve the terms and conditions of employment in SMEs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the best way to solve problems was by way of consultation and negotiation. He expressed thanks for the understanding and goodwill of the Worker Vice-Chairperson. He had no objection to the proposed subamendment. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

193. The Chairperson proposed to deal as one with two synonymous amendments concerning the role of Governments, one submitted by the Government member of the United States and another by the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The Employer Vice-Chairperson accepted the amendment, which was then adopted.

194. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to merge the first two paragraphs. The Employer Vice-Chairperson preferred to delete the first paragraph since the text in question seemed to advocate an involvement of Governments in the establishment of SME organizations. He felt that this should be left to employer and SME associations. The Government members of the Netherlands and South Africa were confused by the discussion and therefore preferred to keep the text as it was. This was supported by the Government member of Belgium. The Government member of Côte d'Ivoire asked the Employers to reconsider. The Worker and Employer Vice-Chairpersons then reached agreement on a subamendment, which the Government member of South Africa strongly objected to. He said that governments needed operational mechanisms for the delivery of services. Employers' and workers' organizations could not adequately provide all the services required by SMEs. The Government member of the United States supported the compromise, but pointed out that its adoption would put the responsibility for support services entirely on the shoulders of the private sector. He therefore proposed to discuss an amendment he had submitted for later discussion which explicitly recognized the role of government agencies to enhance small business growth, such as the Small Business Administration in his country. The Government member of Canada then suggested an alternative subamendment which was supported by the Government member of the United States. The Employer Vice-Chairperson also expressed support for the subamendment but wished to retain a reference to consultation with and involvement of employers' and workers' organizations. The Worker Vice-Chairperson accepted this. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted. This adoption made the following four amendments superfluous and they were consequently withdrawn.

195. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reintroduced an amendment to delete part of the third paragraph since it was not relevant. The Worker Vice-Chairperson preferred the text in its original form as it reflected better the particular situation of SMEs in subcontracting arrangements. The Government member of the United States proposed to add a reference to "national law and practice". The Worker Vice-Chairperson proposed another subamendment, which was not accepted by the Employer Vice-Chairperson, who proposed yet another formulation. The Government member of the United States reiterated his proposal to add a reference to "national law and practice". The Employer Vice-Chairperson then proposed another subamendment simplifying the paragraph further. This was accepted by the Worker Vice-Chairperson and the amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

196. The Government member of the Netherlands introduced an amendment, submitted by the Government members of Austria, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom to reflect the cooperative character of linkages between large firms and SMEs. The amendment was supported by the Worker Vice-Chairperson, but opposed by the Employer Vice-Chairperson, who proposed instead the less ambiguous term "mutually beneficial". After noting that the term "cooperative" was used here as an adjective rather than a noun, he decided to support the amendment, which was then adopted. The Government member of France noted that care should be taken in the translation into French, to avoid any ambiguity.

197. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to underscore the importance of workers' organizations. The Employer Vice-Chairperson raised no objection to the amendment, which was then adopted.

198. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete a qualification to make the text consistent with other parts of the Proposed Conclusions. He also noted the importance of preventing discrimination. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed a preference for the original text. Since the point referred to promotional activities, in addition to measures to combat discrimination, the amendment was not appropriate. Following expressions of support by the Government members of France and South Africa for the position of the Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to replace the word "special" with the word "specific". The Government member of Italy supported the subamendment. The Government member of the Netherlands wondered whether the words "to prevent discrimination" were still included. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then proposed a further subamendment to delete the reference. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

199. The Government member of South Africa submitted an amendment, which was seconded by the Government member of Zimbabwe, to refer to persons affected by restrictive and discriminatory practices "of previous dispensations". The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed the view that the amendment was only relevant to a few countries, and therefore he proposed, as a subamendment, to delete the reference to "previous dispensations". After some clarification and expressions of support by the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons and a number of Government members, the amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

200. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted, in introducing this amendment, that it corresponded closely with an amendment submitted by the Government member of Italy. The Employer Vice-Chairperson raised no objection. The amendment was then adopted. In view of this, the Government member of Italy withdrew her amendment, but proposed a subamendment "to support the development of women entrepreneurs, and the growing role of women, in the economy, who seek to become entrepreneurs, or who already are". The Government member of Canada proposed a further subamendment. The Government member of Belgium expressed the view that a more specific text was needed, to cover the needs of women, and did not support the subamendment. Returning to the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Italy, the Government member of France gave his support. However, the Government members of Botswana and the United States questioned the procedure being adopted, and the Government members of Belgium and the Netherlands therefore proposed to submit the subamendment under the next amendment.

201. The Government member of the Netherlands introduced an amendment submitted by the Government members of Austria, Finland, France, Greece, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom. He noted the importance of good communication between Government agencies and SMEs, particularly when the latter were lacking specialized support staff. The Government member of Italy then resubmitted the earlier subamendment. The Government member of the Netherlands stated that the 13 EU Government members of the Committee supported the subamendment, which they had originally hoped to submit as an amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, in the light of this explanation, supported the amendment, as subamended; the Employer Vice-Chairperson also gave his support, but drew the attention of the Drafting Committee to the need to ensure that all of the references to women in the point were still coherent. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

G. Roles of the employers' and workers' organizations

Point 18

202. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment which made the paragraph more flexible and would allow for the possibility that employers' and workers' organizations work together. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the first part of the amendment, supported the second part and opposed the third part. The Government member of Italy agreed that the words "where appropriate" weakened the text, but the Government member of Botswana considered them a useful addition. He also supported the inclusion of "/or". The Employer Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the third part of the amendment. The Worker Vice-Chairperson continued to oppose the first part. The Government member of the Netherlands supported this point of view. The Employer Vice-Chairperson considered it imperative to retain the first part, noting that the questionnaires sent out by the Office in preparation for this Committee had foreseen separate points for employers' and workers' organizations. In the Proposed Conclusions the two had been combined. Some flexibility was therefore needed to take account of their different roles. After some further debate, the Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew the first part of the amendment. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

203. The Government member of Canada withdrew the next amendment since it was similar to the one adopted.

204. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted, in introducing an amendment, that employers' organizations did not necessarily want to be involved in the actual running of SME-oriented institutions. The Worker Vice-Chairperson had no objection to this amendment, which was then adopted.

205. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, while introducing an amendment, asked for clarification of the original text. A representative of the secretariat clarified the meaning, giving as an example the needs of people who had been made redundant. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then withdrew the amendment.

206. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to improve the wording of the paragraph. The Worker Vice-Chairperson submitted a subamendment to combine the original text and the amendment. This was supported by the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

207. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to introduce a reference to social protection and vocational training. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

208. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace the word "campaigns" with the word "activities". The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

209. The Government member of Uganda submitted an amendment, which was seconded, to include a reference to gender disaggregation since it was important to make participation problems more transparent. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment and withdrew a similar one. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment. The amendment was then adopted.

210. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a reference to workers. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

211. The Employer Vice-Chairperson, introducing an amendment, proposed to bring forward an amendment to the next point and include a reference to social protection in this point. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported this, submitting a subamendment to also include a reference to workers' rights and labour legislation. The Employer Vice-Chairperson supported this. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted. As a result of this decision, four other amendments were withdrawn since the point to which they referred had been deleted.

212. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to emphasize the principle of voluntary representation. He proposed to move the whole paragraph to the previous point. The Worker Vice-Chairperson preferred the original text. The Employer Vice-Chairperson felt that a reference reflecting the voluntary aspect of representation was necessary. A Worker member noted that in her country (Canada) the difference between membership, which was voluntary, and representation, which was not always voluntary, was an important issue. The Government members of South Africa and the Netherlands supported the existing text. An Employer member noted that union membership in SMEs in his country (Canada) was low since studies had shown that some workers were happier working in non-unionized workplaces.

213. The Worker Vice-Chairperson reiterated that there was a difference between membership and representation and proposed a subamendment to reflect this. The Government member of South Africa noted that in his country both SME employers and workers went largely unrepresented. This constituted a problem for the proper functioning of the labour market. After some further debate agreement was reached on a subamendment submitted by the Worker Vice-Chairperson to include a reference to respect for freedom of association. This was supported by the Employer Vice-Chairperson and a number of Government members. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

214. Three subsequent amendments were then withdrawn by the Government member of the United States since they had become redundant.

H. International cooperation

Point 21

215. The Government member of the Netherlands introduced an amendment submitted by Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain and the United Kingdom to add the word "appropriate". The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

216. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to replace "undertaken" by "encouraged". This was accepted by the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The amendment was then adopted.

217. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to delete the word "systematic", which was supported by the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The amendment was then adopted.

218. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to make the text consistent, which was accepted by the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The amendment was then adopted.

219. The Government member of Uganda submitted an amendment, which was seconded by Canada, to introduce a reference to "gender disaggregation", stating that the ILO should make a consistent effort to include such information in future reports. The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons supported the amendment, which was then adopted. Two similar amendments were then withdrawn.

220. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment, which was seconded, to remove a reference to the Internet since it might become obsolete in the future. The amendment was acceptable to the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons and was then adopted.

221. The Government member of Italy submitted an amendment, which was seconded, to include a reference to women entrepreneurship. This was supported by the Worker and Employer Vice-Chairpersons. The amendment was then adopted.

222. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew an amendment referring to the variety of contexts and countries in which SMEs operated.

223. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a reference to job creation in view of the overall purpose of the Proposed Conclusions. The Worker Vice-Chairperson supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

224. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to add a reference to workers in SMEs, which was subamended by the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The Worker Vice-Chairperson accepted the subamendment. The amendment, as subamended, was then adopted.

225. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to include a reference to employment opportunities which was accepted by the Employer Vice-Chairperson. The amendment was then adopted.

Point 22

226. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment, which was seconded by the Government member of Canada, to delete the point. The Government members of the Netherlands, Belgium and Botswana supported the amendment. The Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons also supported the amendment, which was then adopted.

227. The Chairperson of the Working Party established by the Committee to draft point 3 of the Proposed Conclusions submitted a draft text mentioning that it had already received the support of the three groups. The Committee then adopted the draft text.

Adoption of the report, Proposed Conclusions and resolution

228. At its 16th sitting, the Committee adopted its report. At the same sitting, the Committee adopted the Proposed Conclusions presented at the end of the report.

229. Before the adoption of the report, the Government member of the Drafting Committee, in the absence of the Reporter, said that the Drafting Committee had met for six hours and had deliberated at length on both the English and French texts. Minor changes had been made in order to ensure the accuracy of the Committee's decisions and both texts had been reconciled with the assistance of the secretariat and the Legal Adviser.

230. The Employer Vice-Chairman said that the Conclusions of the Committee would have considerable importance for the economic well being of many generations to come. The Employers were in full agreement with the Conclusions of the meeting and had no hesitation in endorsing the report, the Proposed Conclusions and the resolution. He congratulated the Chairperson on the skill with which she had helped to lead the Committee to its conclusions.

231. The Worker Vice-Chairman said that his group was satisfied that the draft report and the Proposed Conclusions fully reflected all the concerns of his group. Although the discussion had at times been difficult, agreement had been reached.

232. The Chairperson expressed her thanks to the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons, the Reporter and the members of the Drafting Committee. She also extended her thanks to the interpreters and the staff of the secretariat. She said that the experiences of many countries suggested that a favourable institutional, political and social environment was indispensable for small and medium-sized enterprises to grow and prosper. Such an environment depended not only on free market principles, but had to be guided by the will and imagination of people. A coherent, proactive, even visionary, policy was needed if benefits were to be obtained from globalization. Close cooperation between the social partners was essential.

233. The report of the Committee, the Proposed Conclusions and a resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled: “General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises”, are submitted for consideration.

Geneva, 18 June 1997.

(Signed) D. Mozdzenska-Mrozek,
Chairperson.

J. Ott,
Reporter.

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS

A. Form of instrument

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt an instrument on general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs).

2. The instrument should take the form of a Recommendation.

B. Preamble

3. The instrument should contain a Preamble in the following terms:

Aware of the importance of the issue of job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises, and

Recalling the resolution concerning the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 72nd Session in 1986, as well as the Conclusions adopted under the resolution concerning employment policy in a global context, adopted by the Conference at its 83rd Session in 1996, and

Noting that small and medium-sized enterprises, as a critical factor in the ongoing growth of market economies, are responsible for the creation of the majority of jobs throughout the world, and

Recognizing that small and medium-sized enterprises provide the potential for women and other traditionally disadvantaged groups to gain improved access to productive, sustainable and quality employment opportunities, and

Convinced that promoting respect for the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949, the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, will enhance the creation of quality employment in small and medium-sized enterprises and in particular meet the concerns of Members with respect to the issue of child labour, and

Desirous of encouraging Members, in the design and implementation of policies, to take account of the provisions of this Recommendation together with the relevant provisions of international labour Conventions and Recommendations as appropriate, such as the Employment Policy Convention and Recommendation, 1964, and the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984, the Co-operatives (Developing Countries) Recommendation, 1966, the Minimum Age Convention and Recommendation, 1973, the Human Resources Development Convention and Recommendation, 1975, and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention and Recommendation, 1981, and

Affirming that this Recommendation stands as valuable guidance for Members, alongside the proven ILO initiatives to promote the role of small and medium-sized enterprises in sustainable job creation and to encourage adequate and common application of social protection, as well as Start Your Business, Improve Your Business and other programmes and the work of the International Training Centre of the ILO in training and skill enhancement.

C. Definition, purpose and scope

4. Members should define an SME by reference to such criteria as may be considered appropriate in accordance with national social and economic conditions. This flexible approach should not preclude Members from arriving at commonly agreed definitions for data collection and analysis purposes.

5. Members should adopt measures which are appropriate to national conditions and consistent with national practice in order to recognize and to promote the fundamental role that SMEs can play as regards:

(a) the promotion of full, productive and freely chosen employment;

(b) greater access to income-earning opportunities and wealth creation leading to productive and sustainable employment;

(c) sustainable economic growth and the ability to react flexibly to changes;

(d) increased economic participation of disadvantaged and marginalized groups in society;

(e) increased domestic savings and investment;

(f) training and development of human resources;

(g) balanced regional and local development;

(h) provision of goods and services which are better adapted to local market needs;

(i) the possibility of access to improved working conditions and quality of work which may contribute to the quality of life, as well as social protection for large numbers of people;

(j) stimulating innovation, entrepreneurship, technology development and research; and

(k) accessing domestic and international markets.

6. In order to promote the fundamental role of SMEs referred to in point 5, Members should adopt, where appropriate, measures and enforcement mechanisms to safeguard the interests of workers in SMEs, in accordance with the basic protection under other relevant instruments.

7. The provisions of this Recommendation should apply to all branches of economic activity and all types of enterprise, irrespective of the form of ownership (i.e. private and public companies, cooperatives, partnerships, family enterprises, sole proprietorships and others).

D. Policy and legal framework

8. In order to create a business environment conducive to the growth and development of SMEs, Members should:

(a) adopt and pursue appropriate fiscal, monetary and employment policies to promote a stable economic environment (as regards, in particular, inflation, interest and exchange rates, taxation, and employment and social stability);

(b) establish and apply appropriate rules as regards, in particular, property rights, location, enforcement of contracts, and adequate social and labour legislation.

9. The measures referred to in point 8 should be complemented by policies for the promotion of efficient and competitive SMEs able to provide productive and sustainable employment under adequate social conditions. To this end, Members should consider policies that:

(1) create conditions which:
   (a) provide for all sizes and types of enterprises:
      (i) equal opportunity as regards, in particular, access to credit, foreign exchange and imported inputs; and
      (ii) fair taxation;
   (b) ensure the equal application of labour legislation, in order to raise the quality of employment in SMEs;
   (c) promote observance by SMEs of international labour standards related to child labour;

(2) remove constraints to the development and growth of SMEs, as regards:
   (a) insufficient access to credit;
   (b) low levels of technical and managerial skills;
   (c) inadequate information;
   (d) low levels of productivity and quality;
   (e) insufficient access to markets;
   (f) difficulties of access to new technologies;
   (g) inappropriate, inadequate or overly burdensome administrative requirements, including those which are disincentives to the hiring of personnel — for instance, registration, licensing and reporting — without prejudice to the effectiveness of labour inspection and the system of supervision of working conditions and related issues;

(3) include specific measures aimed at assisting and upgrading the informal sector to become part of the organized sector.

10. With a view to the formulation of such policies, Members should where appropriate:

(1) collect adequate national data on the SME sector, including quantitative and qualitative aspects of employment, while ensuring that this does not result in undue administrative burdens for SMEs;

(2) undertake a comprehensive review of the impact of existing policies and regulations on SMEs, with particular attention to the impact of structural adjustment programmes on job creation;

(3) review labour and social legislation, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations as well as with the representative organizations of the employers and workers concerned, if they exist, to determine whether:
   (a) such legislation meets the special needs of SMEs, while ensuring adequate protection and working conditions for their workers;

(b) as regards social protection, consideration should be given to a range of supplementary measures such as voluntary schemes, cooperative initiatives and others;

(4) ensure the extension of social protection to workers in SMEs and compliance with social security regulations.

11. In formulating these policies, Members:

(1) may consult, in addition to the most representative employers' and workers' organizations referred to in point 10(3) above, other concerned and competent parties as appropriate;

(2) should take into account other policies in such areas as fiscal and monetary matters, trade and industry, employment, labour, social protection, gender equality and occupational safety and health;

(3) should establish mechanisms to review, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, and update these policies.

E. Development of an enterprise culture

12. Members should adopt measures, drawn up in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, to create and strengthen an enterprise culture which favour initiatives, enterprise creation, productivity, environmental consciousness, quality, good labour and industrial relations, and adequate social practices which are equitable. To this end, Members should consider pursuing:

(1) the development of entrepreneurial attitudes through the system and programmes of education and training, linked to job needs and the attainment of economic growth and development with particular emphasis being given to the importance of good labour relations and the multiple vocational and managerial skills needed by SMEs;

(2) a process of life-long learning for all categories of workers and entrepreneurs;

(3) the designing and implementation, with full involvement of the organizations of employers and workers concerned, of awareness campaigns to promote:

  (a) the rule of law, working conditions and workers' rights, higher productivity and quality of goods and services;

  (b) entrepreneurial role models and award schemes, taking into account the specific needs of women, disadvantaged and marginalized groups.

F. Development of an effective SME service infrastructure

13. Consideration should be given to the availability of a range of direct and indirect support services to SMEs, to enhance their growth, job-creation potential and competitiveness, to include:

(a) managerial and vocational skills enhancement;

(b) consultancy and research services;

(c) access to capital markets, credit and loan guarantees;

(d) quality testing and measurement;

(e) marketing research and assistance;

(f) packaging services;

(g) assistance in product design, development and presentation;

(h) business start-up and development assistance, including business planning;

(i) information services, including advice on government policies;

(j) assistance and services on labour legislation, including on workers' rights, human resources development and gender equality;

(k) export promotion and domestic and international trade opportunities;

(l) advice regarding technology;

(m) access to energy, telecommunications, and physical infrastructure such as water, electricity, premises, transportation and roads, provided directly or through private sector intermediaries;

(n) support for innovation and modernization;

(o) legal, accounting and other financial services;

(p) business incubators;

(q) computer systems application, information technology services;

(r) environmental management services.

14. As far as possible, the support services referred to in point 13 should be designed and provided to ensure the highest degree of relevance and efficiency through such means as:

(a) adapting the specific services and their delivery to the particular prevailing economic, social and cultural conditions;

(b) ensuring strong involvement of SMEs and the most representative employers' and workers' organizations in the determination of services to be offered;

(c) involving the public and private sector in the delivery of such services through, for example, employers' and workers' organizations, semi-public organizations, private consultants and SMEs;

(d) decentralizing the delivery of services, thereby bringing them as physically close to SMEs as possible;

(e) providing services tailored to the specific needs of SMEs of different sizes in different sectors and at differing stages of development;

(f) promoting easy access to an integrated range of services through "single window" arrangements and referral services;

(g) aiming towards self-sustainability for service providers through a reasonable degree of cost recovery from SMEs and other sources, in such a manner as to enhance the employment creation potential of SMEs and the functioning of markets;

(h) ensuring professionalism and accountability in the management of service delivery;

(i) establishing mechanisms for continuous monitoring, evaluation and updating of services.

15. Services should be designed to include productivity-enhancing and other approaches which promote efficiency, together with improved labour practices and working conditions, and help SMEs to sustain competitiveness in domestic and global markets.

16. Members should facilitate access by SMEs to finance and credit under satisfactory conditions. In this connection:

(1) except in the case of particularly vulnerable groups of entrepreneurs, credit and other financial services should as far as possible be provided on commercial terms to ensure their sustainability;

(2) supplementary measures should be taken to simplify administrative procedures, reduce transaction costs and overcome problems related to inadequate collateral by, for example, the creation of non-governmental financial retail agents and poverty-oriented development finance institutions;

(3) SMEs may be encouraged to organize in mutual guarantee associations.

17. Members should consider policies to improve the terms and conditions of employment in SMEs by ensuring equal application of protective labour legislation.

18. Members should, in addition:

(1) facilitate the development of organizations, where appropriate, which can effectively support the growth and competitiveness of SMEs. In this regard, consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations should be considered;

(2) consider adequate measures to promote cooperative linkages between large and small enterprises. In this connection, measures should be taken to safeguard the legitimate interests of SMEs;

(3) consider measures to promote linkages between SMEs to encourage mutual learning as well as resource and risk sharing. In this connection, SME consortia, enterprise networks and service cooperatives and similar structures might be encouraged and the importance of the role of employers' and workers' organizations should be recognized;

(4) consider specific measures for persons aspiring to become entrepreneurs among selected categories of the population, such as: women, long-term unemployed, persons affected by structural adjustment or restrictive and discriminatory practices, disabled persons, demilitarized personnel, young persons including graduates, elderly workers with appropriate experience, ethnic minorities and indigenous and tribal peoples. The detailed identification of these categories should be carried out taking into account national socio-economic priorities and circumstances;

(5) consider special measures to improve the communication between government agencies and SMEs which lack specialized support staff in order to improve the effectiveness of government policies aimed at job creation;

(6) encourage the development of support for female entrepreneurship, recognizing the growing importance of the role of women in the economy, through actions, designed specifically for women who are either entrepreneurs or wish to become entrepreneurs.

G. Roles of the employers' and workers' organizations

19. Employers' or workers' organizations should consider the following types of involvement in the development of SMEs:

(a) articulating the concerns of SMEs, or their workers, as appropriate, towards government regarding the policy and legal frameworks in which they operate;

(b) providing direct support services such as training, consultancy, facilitating access to credit, marketing support, promoting linkages with larger enterprises, advice on industrial relations, and similar services;

(c) involvement in national, regional and local SME-oriented institutions which provide support in such areas as training, consultancy, business start-up and quality;

(d) participation in councils, task forces and other bodies at central, regional and local levels established to deal with important economic and social issues, including policies and programmes affecting SMEs;

(e) taking part in the development of economically and socially progressive restructuring (for example, retraining and promotion of self-employment) while maintaining appropriate social safety nets;

(f) becoming involved in promotion of exchanges of experience and establishment of commercial linkages between SMEs;

(g) participating in the monitoring, analysis and promotion as appropriate, of social and labour market issues regarding SMEs, including terms and conditions of employment, working conditions, social protection and vocational training;

(h) involvement in activities to raise quality, productivity and ethical standards and to achieve gender equality;

(i) preparing studies on SMEs, collecting statistical and other types of information relevant to the sector, including gender disaggregated statistics, and sharing these as well as lessons of best practice in the promotion of SMEs among national and international employers' and workers' organizations;

(j) providing services and advice on workers' rights, labour legislation and social protection for workers in SMEs.

20. SMEs and their workers should be encouraged to be adequately represented in full respect of freedom of association. In this connection, employers' and workers' organizations should consider widening their membership base to include SMEs.

H. International cooperation

21. Appropriate international cooperation should be encouraged in the following areas:

(a) exchange of information, gender disaggregated where appropriate, on best practices in terms of policies and programmes to create jobs and to raise the quality of employment in SMEs;

(b) creation of linkages between national and international bodies and institutions that are involved in the development of SMEs, including employers' and workers' organizations, in order to facilitate:

  (i) exchange of staff and ideas;

  (ii) exchange of training materials, training methodologies and reference materials;

  (iii) compilation of research findings and other quantitative and qualitative data, gender disaggregated where appropriate, on SMEs and their development;

  (iv) establishment of international partnerships of SMEs, alliances, subcontracting arrangements and other commercial linkages;

  (v) development of new mechanisms, utilizing modern information technologies for the exchange of information between governments, workers' and employers' organizations on experience gained with regard to the promotion of SMEs;

(c) international meetings and discussion groups on approaches to job creation through the development of SMEs including, support for female entrepreneurship through actions specifically designed for women who wish to become, or who already are, entrepreneurs;

(d) systematic research into the structure, effectiveness and key success factors for promoting job creation in SMEs which are both efficient and capable of providing good working conditions and adequate social protection in a variety of contexts and countries;

(e) promotion of access by SMEs and workers to national and international databases in such areas as employment opportunities, market information, laws and regulations, technology and product standards.

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises"

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fifth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of governments, proposals for a Recommendation concerning "General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises",

Decides that an item entitled "General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion regarding the proposed adoption of a Recommendation concerning General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises.

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises" 47

No. 17 — Wednesday, 18 June 1997

International Labour Conference
Provisional Record
Eighty-fifth Session, Geneva, 1997

18(Rev.)

Sixth item on the agenda: Contract labour

Report of the Committee on Contract Labour

1. At its first sitting on 3 June 1997, the International Labour Conference constituted the Committee on Contract Labour. The Committee was originally composed of 214 members (92 Government members, 54 Employer members and 68 Worker members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member entitled to vote was allotted 459 votes, each Employer member 748 votes and each Worker member 594 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified ten times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member adjusted accordingly.[1]

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairperson: Mr. L. Mishra (Government member, India) at its first sitting.

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. B. Noakes (Employer member, Australia); and Mr. J.-C. Parrot (Worker member, Canada) at its first sitting.

---

[1] The modifications were as follows:

(a) 4 June: 210 members (88 Government members with 459 votes each, 54 Employer members with 748 votes each and 68 Worker members with 594 votes each);

(b) 5 June: 204 members (92 Government members with 105 votes each, 42 Employer members with 230 votes each and 70 Worker members with 138 votes each);

(c) 6 June: 203 members (93 Government members with 44 votes each, 44 Employer members with 93 votes each and 66 Worker members with 62 votes each);

(d) 7 June: 197 members (94 Government members with 1,281 votes each, 42 Employer members with 2,867 votes each and 61 Worker members with 1,974 votes each);

(e) 9 June: 194 members (95 Government members with 42 votes each, 42 Employer members with 95 votes each and 57 Worker members with 70 votes each);

(f) 10 June: 195 members (96 Government members with 133 votes each, 42 Employer members with 304 votes each and 57 Worker members with 224 votes each);

(g) 11 June: 196 members (96 Government members with 2,419 votes each, 41 Employer members with 5,664 votes each and 59 Worker members with 3,936 votes each);

(h) 12 June: 181 members (96 Government members with 53 votes each, 32 Employer members with 159 votes each and 53 Worker members with 96 votes each);

(i) 13 June: 173 members (96 Government members with 29 votes each, 29 Employer members with 96 votes each and 48 Worker members with 58 votes each);

(j) 16 June: 165 members (96 Government members with 145 votes each, 29 Employer members with 480 votes each and 40 Worker members with 348 votes each).

Reporter: Mr. G.H. Johannes (Government member, South Africa) at its tenth sitting.

3. At its 11th sitting, the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Ms. L. Samuel (Government member, Cyprus), Mr. B. Noakes (Employer member, Australia), Mr. J.-C. Parrot (Worker member, Canada), and the Reporter of the Committee, Mr. G.H. Johannes (Government member, South Africa).

4. The Committee held 16 sittings.

5. The Committee had before it Reports VI(1) and VI(2), both entitled "Contract labour", that had been prepared by the Office.

Introduction

6. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference noted that in unanimously deciding to place the issue of contract labour on the agenda of the Conference as a possible subject for standard setting, the Governing Body had emphasized the importance of addressing the increasingly significant phenomenon of contract labour worldwide. Referring to the Office research on this topic, summarized in Report VI(1), he pointed out the increase in the use of contract labour in many countries with a wide range of definitions being employed. The panoply of approaches to protecting contract workers while avoiding unwarranted intervention in relationships that are essentially commercial in nature was also noted. A number of labour demand and supply factors fostering the trend towards the increasing recourse to contract labour were enumerated, as set out in Report VI(2). From the employers' perspective, these factors included the aim to cut labour costs through optimizing flexibility, the fluctuating demand for products and services, the emergence of new technologies and methods of work organization. The job creation potential of contract labour arrangements had also been raised by employers. On the supply side of the labour market, the flexibility offered by contract labour could be an attraction to a growing number of workers; high levels of unemployment might also act as an incentive for workers to accept contract labour arrangements since "standard" forms of employment are often not available. However, from the workers' perspective, contract labour also gives rise to the potential for abuses that call for protective measures, particularly where resort is had to contract labour to avoid obligations owed to workers under existing labour laws. Concern was also expressed that the nature of contract labour arrangements renders them less conducive to maintaining working conditions that adequately protect workers' safety and health. The representative of the Secretary-General then outlined the dominant issues before the Committee: first, defining the parameters of the contract labour relationship and identifying the areas in which regulation may be both necessary and appropriate in contemporary labour markets; and second, defining the respective responsibilities of the relevant parties. He recalled that the majority of governments replying to the Office questionnaire had favoured the adoption of a Convention or a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. Therefore, the Proposed Conclusions had been drafted accordingly. Finally, he pointed out the principles, identified in Report VI(2), that had guided the Office as the basis for possible new international instruments, which would of course have to be seen in the context of existing international labour standards applicable to contract workers.

7. Further details of the reports before the Committee, Reports VI(1) and VI(2), were then presented, including through the use of diagrams and slides, by a member of the secretariat, who stressed that the main issues arising relate to the contractual status of the workers concerned and the extent of labour law protection they enjoy. The variety of existing contractual arrangements was then set out. Arrangements generally giving rise to a contract of employment were examined, including where a worker works directly as an employee for a user enterprise or a subcontractor. Those not resulting in a contract of employment include where the worker is not an employee of the subcontractor or an intermediary, though his or her services are procured for the benefit of the user enterprise by the subcontractor or intermediary. An employment relationship may also not ensue in some situations where the worker provides his or her services directly to the user enterprise, for example in the case of a one-person subcontractor.

8. In examining the origins of labour law protection, the concept of the worker's subordination to and dependency on the employer was introduced. This concept was further explored in the particular context of contract labour: it was noted that a large body of jurisprudence has developed resulting in contract labourers being brought within the scope of labour law protection where they are found to be in a situation of dependency on or subordination to the user enterprise similar to that characterizing an employment relationship under national law and practice. This jurisprudence was the inspiration for the definition of "contract labour" set out in the Proposed Conclusions found in Report VI(2). With respect to the extent of the protection, it was foreseen that this would vary depending on the extent of the user enterprise's control over and responsibility for the worker's conditions of work.

General discussion

9. The Government member of Italy informed the Committee that her Government was in favour of the adoption of a Convention, contrary to the indications given in Report VI(2). She explained that the Office had mistaken the reply of CONFINDUSTRIA (the Italian employers' confederation), which had favoured a Recommendation only, for that of the Government. The latter was ready to discuss a Recommendation but, at this stage of the work, did not support the adoption of such an instrument.

10. In his opening statement, the Employer Vice-Chairperson stressed that the Employer members were implacably opposed to the adoption of new standards on contract labour, since in their view, due to the dearth of knowledge in this area, it would be impossible for the Committee to be able to formulate standards capable of providing a basis for action that would lead to concrete and acceptable outcomes. In reviewing the steps leading up to this first discussion on contract labour, he recalled that in the Governing Body meeting of April 1995, the Employers' group had unequivocally opposed the proposal put forward by the Workers' group to place contract labour on the agenda of the 1997 Conference. In the debate that followed, a large number of governments expressed reservations or only gave qualified support to the proposal, and it was evident that there was much conceptual confusion. Nevertheless, as a majority (though small) of governments were in favour of including contract labour on the agenda, the Employers' group had agreed to the inclusion of the item on the agenda. However, he emphasized that the Governing Body's decision could not be considered as unanimous. According to the Employer Vice-Chairperson, the report that was then prepared, Report VI(1), raised the conceptual, definitional and practical difficulties associated with this subject and evidenced the Office's own doubts about the viability of contract labour as a standard-setting item.

11. With reference to the Office's second report (VI(2)), the Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that it documented the employers' continued opposition to the standard-setting exercise and the persistent division among governments. He went on to highlight the linguistic and conceptual difficulties inherent in the topic under discussion. He said that there could be no clearer indication of the complexity of the issue than the extraordinary and unprecedented lengths to which the Office had gone to explain its approach. Drawing attention to the report entitled The ILO, standard setting and globalization, Report of the Director-General (International Labour Conference, 85th Session, 1997), he noted that a more selective and rational approach to the production of standards had been stressed, with the aim of ensuring their increased relevance and impact. In addition, he noted that the Director-General had suggested different ways of dealing with subjects which raise complex technical or political issues and about which the Office does not have enough information.

12. Contract labour, in the opinion of the Employer members, is a universal and irreversible phenomenon which arose in response to changes in the nature and organization of work and changes in social conditions, and is itself in the process of rapid evolution. Contract labour cannot and should not be eliminated, in their view, since in many instances it brings advantages to both workers and employers, providing a useful response to the rigidities of traditional employment relationships and constituting an important source of job creation. Contract labour takes many forms, the Employer Vice-Chairperson noted, and is incapable of precise definition. In attempting to rationalize the wide variety of approaches to the subject, the Office had introduced concepts foreign to the practice in many countries. Concern was raised that the almost universal government recourse to contracting out services would be considered subcontracting and, therefore, a form of contract labour that would be restricted pursuant to the proposed definition.

13. The Employer Vice-Chairperson emphasized that the Employers' group was not opposed to the provision of appropriate protection, in particular ensuring that persons who are found on the basis of objective tests to be employees are protected as such. They expressed their willingness to support an exercise to protect against sham arrangements, fraud or illegal practices adopted to avoid legal obligations and disadvantage workers. However, in their view, the proposed instruments would not further such a goal, but rather would create difficulties for governments because of conflicts with national law and practice, the consequences for taxation and social security systems, the restrictions on contracting out and the loss of job creation potential that would result.

14. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that, despite their reservations, the Employer members would participate fully in the discussion with a view to exploring whether it is possible to find some basis for an understanding about future action; however, such action could not be founded on the Proposed Conclusions in their view. The key issue was whether or not an employment relationship exists in relation to particular work and how that should be determined. If an "employment relationship" exists, the person should be treated as an employee with all the consequences flowing from that status. They thought that defining contract labour was an impossible task and that the idea of varying the degree of protection depending on the degree of dependency was unworkable. He concluded by saying that any consensus to propose the adoption of instruments on "contract labour" would be a weak consensus which would not include the Employers and many Governments.

15. The Worker Vice-Chairperson began by stressing the pressing need for an instrument, particularly a Convention, in the area of contract labour. The Workers' group welcomed the inclusion of the item on the agenda of the Conference, since it addresses the very real problem of workers who are denied protection due to contract labour. They were satisfied that the results of the Office's research in this area evidenced the existence of sufficient knowledge and clear conceptualization to provide a foundation for standard setting. He commented on the development of a new instrument in the context of the overall standard-setting mechanism of the ILO, referring in particular to the Working Party on Policy concerning the Revision of Standards of the Governing Body Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards. The Workers' group had agreed to be involved in the process of reviewing the existing Conventions, including the abrogation of obsolete Conventions, on the understanding that this process was not intended to lower the level of worker protection, but would proceed in tandem with the adoption of new standards, the promotion of existing standards and the strengthening of the supervisory system. He recalled that the ILO was established to develop standards that would provide protection to workers; the credibility and very existence of the Organization would be called into question if it failed to continue to fulfil that mission.

16. In the view of the Worker members, there were compelling reasons for adopting a Convention on contract labour. Most labour laws, the Worker Vice-Chairperson noted, treated the employment relationship as being subject to a special contract, the justification for which was the unequal power relationship between workers and employers, which could not be appropriately regulated through other kinds of contracts, including commercial contracts. Special treatment was also accorded to the employment relationship due to the recognition that human labour could not be treated as a commodity. The recognition of the employment relationship placed obligations on the employer to protect workers, thereby ensuring a measure of social justice that would protect society as a whole. He pointed out that the concept of the employment relationship was being challenged due to changes in the nature and organization of work, resulting in increasing numbers of workers being placed in co-employment or triangular employment relationships falling outside the ambit of labour legislation. However, despite these changes, the unequal power relationship endured, as did the need to protect workers.

17. The Worker Vice-Chairperson asserted that, given its mandate, it would be difficult for the Organization to avoid setting a minimum standard to address the key problems related to contract labour, in particular the disguised employment relationship and the triangular employment relationship. He encouraged governments to adapt to changes in the labour market in ways that would protect workers, and to recognize that the relationship between workers and employers is fundamentally different from commercial relationships. Given the serious implications for workers posed by disguised and triangular employment relationships, he characterized the expectations of the Workers' group in this standard-setting process as modest, even conservative. His group expected the adoption of a Convention that would recognize the problems, oblige governments to take measures to prevent the use of contract labour for the sole purpose of avoiding labour laws, and encourage governments to extend protection accorded to regular employees to contract workers performing similar work under similar conditions. The creation of a new category of workers was not foreseen, and he explained that requiring that workers who are in similar subordinate or dependent positions as employees be treated as employees would not be a radical change. In the view of the Worker members, though originally all workers in a position of subordination to or dependency on an employer were meant to be covered by ILO instruments, many workers were falling outside their scope, thus an additional instrument was needed to extend protection. The new instrument should, in the view of the Worker members, provide a general framework reflecting new realities, without ignoring the old reality that workers need protection due to the inequality of the power relationship.

18. The Workers' group rejected the view that the instrument would have a negative impact on job creation potential. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stressed that, at its worst, contract labour was a form of fraud to avoid employment obligations, and such abuses needed to be prevented. In concluding, though recognizing the complexity of the issue, he suggested that the extent of the complexity should not be exaggerated.

19. The Government member of Trinidad and Tobago expressed the concern of her Government and the Caribbean Community regarding the negative manifestations of contract labour in the region, particularly the disturbing developments in its growth, form and content. Due to its importance, the issue had been discussed by CARICOM Ministers of Labour in May 1997. While noting the potential benefits of contract labour, the Ministers held that urgent action was required to address the emerging problems in this area. She asserted that legislative protection was needed for all workers. While recognizing the existence of diverging views on the subject, she stressed the need to curb the abuses in this area in the pursuit of social justice.

20. The Government members of Australia and New Zealand declared that contract labour was not an appropriate subject for standard setting at this time. According to the Government member of Australia, his Government was concerned about the possibility that such an instrument could impede business and employment opportunities, economic progress and efficiencies. It would be difficult, in his Government's view, to devise an instrument that would deal with contract labour in a fair and balanced manner, taking into account the diversity of national law and practice, and that would have reasonable ratification prospects. The Government member of New Zealand outlined the prevailing legal situation in his country, whereby contracts of service and contracts for services are treated distinctly, protections based on the employment relationship being considered inappropriate in the latter case. He underlined the importance of looking to the intention of the relationship, and applying a range of tests where necessary to determine the true nature of the relationship. He suggested that an assessment of the considerable investment required to introduce and produce new instruments should be made.

21. The Government member of Cyprus noted that though contract labour was not a phenomenon in her country, since there was little in the way of atypical employment, her Government had come with an open mind to discuss the issue. Speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union which were members of the Committee (Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Sweden and the United Kingdom, hereafter referred to as "the Member States of the European Union"), the Government member of the Netherlands stressed the importance of the subject before the Committee and the need to protect workers within the grey area where they are neither truly self-employed nor covered by a traditional contract of employment. The Member States of the European Union were prepared to participate in an in-depth discussion based on the Proposed Conclusions; however, he noted that they had varying views regarding what they hoped would be the outcome of the debate.

22. The Government member of the United States enumerated his Government's objectives regarding the work of the Committee. First, his Government wanted to ensure that any instrument would attract a wide tripartite consensus to enhance the possibility of ratification, which would require that a flexible approach be taken. Second, they would work toward supporting an instrument to the extent that it was consistent with their federal and state law and practice. Third, the instrument should promote rather than decrease job opportunities. Finally, the instrument should not unduly restrict the right of parties to reach voluntary agreements on matters that had, in accordance with national law and practice, been subject to collective agreements. He expressed the need for caution in dealing separately with this economic sector to ensure that discriminatory treatment did not result. The usefulness and necessity of addressing the problems arising from contract labour were underlined by the Government member of Venezuela. The establishment of regulations in this area should not be seen as impeding employment, in the view of her Government.

23. The Government members of Sweden and Norway also noted the importance of the subject, as well as the urgent need to regulate contract labour. The Government member of Sweden supported the idea of adopting an instrument in this area. While recognizing the potential positive effects of contract labour, she pointed out that there was room for abuse, in particular agreements being constructed with the aim of circumventing labour law protection. The grey zone of workers whose status and protection was not clear was ever expanding. She explained that, due to the comprehensive definition of "employee" in the Nordic countries, many workers who might not be considered as employees in other countries are regarded as employees, and extensive case law exists interpreting and developing the concept of "employee". Consequently, those falling within the definition of contract labour in the Proposed Conclusions would likely be considered "employees" in Sweden and elsewhere. The Government members of Denmark and Hungary confirmed that this was also the situation in their respective countries. Similarly, the Government member of Norway asserted that persons performing work for others under actual conditions of subordination or dependency should be entitled to the same legal rights as other workers. The Government member of Sweden went on to point out that there was a weak group among the self-employed in her country, referred to as "equalled contractors" who have been provided with certain basic protections, in particular regarding collective bargaining and health and safety, but they are still considered to be self-employed. She stressed the need for any instrument to be flexible enough to be capable of operating in a variety of legal environments giving rise to a variety of legal concepts. This call for flexibility in any instrument adopted was reiterated by the Government members of Cyprus, Japan, Papua New Guinea and Mauritius.

24. The Government member of Japan suggested that it was useful to discuss contract labour at the ILO at a time when globalization was intensifying international competition. He explained that in his country, workers were protected by the national labour laws where they were found to be in a position of subordination to a user enterprise, even where the contract they entered into with the latter was not a contract of employment. His Government was in favour of the adoption of a Recommendation on this subject. The Government member of Canada also expressed his Government's support for the adoption of a Recommendation on this important topic. While raising certain reservations with respect to the form and scope of the document under consideration, the Government member of Canada noted that if the definitional problems could be overcome, in particular the use of the word "sous-traitance" in French which could be considered as synonymous with "contracting out", his Government could consider supporting a Convention. The difficulties raised by the French translation of the term "contract labour" were also noted by the Government member of Switzerland, who stated that in francophone countries, the term "travail en sous-traitance" does not have the same meaning as that proposed in the Conclusions.

25. While noting the difficulty in foreseeing how the phenomenon of contract labour would develop in the future in different national contexts, the Government member of Switzerland expressed her Government's willingness to study all the proposals aimed at providing protection to the largest number of workers. In her view, however, the definition provided in the Proposed Conclusions was so flexible as to be open to numerous interpretations; a common denominator needed to be found. She raised concern regarding the link between the discussion on contract labour and the concurrent discussion on fee-charging employment agencies (the fourth item on the Conference agenda).

26. The Government member of Chile stressed the need to strike a balance between the demand for labour flexibility and the provision of adequate worker protection. The Government member of Mauritius recalled that in the response to the Office questionnaire, his Government had favoured the adoption of a Convention on this subject; however, in the light of the discussion, which revealed the lack of conceptual clarity, his Government wanted more information on this subject, in particular regarding the meaning of the terms "dependency" and "subordination" found in the Proposed Conclusions. The Government member of Zimbabwe reaffirmed his Government's support for the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on contract labour, in the belief that exploitation of labour for any reason should be considered a violation of basic human rights. He noted that, in Zimbabwe, contract labour was being used to cut costs, often by denying workers social security benefits and health and safety protection.

27. A number of Government members, including Canada, Chile, Cyprus, Hungary, Mauritius, the Netherlands (speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union), Switzerland and the United States, raised concerns regarding the need for definitional and conceptual clarity, particularly in the proposed definition of contract labour, and called for a thorough discussion of these concerns. The Government member of South Africa responded to this call for clarity by suggesting that the definition of contract labour would be more precise if the meaning of "contract worker" were determined. She proposed that the following alternative definition be given consideration when the Committee reached this issue:

(i) A contract worker means a person who —

(a) performs work or provides services to a user enterprise;

(b) is in a condition of substantial economic and/or organizational dependency on the user enterprise; and

(c) is not formally an employee of the user enterprise.

(ii) a contract worker may perform work or provide services —

(a) either directly to the user enterprise as an individual subcontractor;

(b) as an employee of a subcontractor; or

(c) through an intermediary.

Her Government was in favour of a Convention to ensure the extension of protection to workers without a clearly defined employment relationship.

28. The Government member of Germany called for definitions that would clearly define which groups are to be covered and who are the partners to the contract of employment. He submitted that "legal" self-employed workers could be covered by an instrument, where they are economically, though not personally, dependent on the user enterprise. He noted that pursuant to the definition in Point 5, only those having a contract of employment with the user enterprise are outside the scope of the definition; however, where a worker has a contract of employment with a contractor or subcontractor, he or she is also protected as an employee, and need not be within the scope of the instrument. The Government member of Hungary suggested that the criteria enumerated in paragraph (4) of Point 16 of the Proposed Conclusions be used to assist member States in determining whether a relationship is commercial in nature or an employment relationship. He asserted that substance should prevail over form in making such determination. The Government member of the United States also pointed to the factors set out in Point 16(4), noting that several of them had been held by the United States Supreme Court to be relevant in distinguishing between employees and independent contractors; however, no single factor was conclusive.

29. The Government member of France recalled that contract labour subsumed a very small part of subcontracting; therefore, the title, definition and scope of the proposed instruments were misleading. He noted that cases in which there was a well-defined subcontracting relationship between two enterprises were not within the scope of the proposed Convention, but the definitions in the proposed Recommendation suggested that this difference in approach was troublesome. He recalled that private employment agencies were specifically excluded from the scope of the proposed instruments, as they would be addressed by the Committee discussing fee-charging employment agencies. The Government member of Venezuela was of the view that it was necessary to establish clearly that the instruments applied to work being performed by a natural person, who is dependent upon an employer, whether that be a user enterprise or an intermediary. She noted the need to distinguish between natural persons and legal persons, the latter possibly involving a relationship between two enterprises that provide work.

30. A number of Government members, including Chile, Denmark, France, Hungary, Japan, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, the Syrian Arab Republic and Venezuela, supported the view that any instrument on contract labour should not create a new category of workers with reduced protection. The crux of the issue, in their view, was to define clearly the scope of employment and commercial relationships, in view of the substance of the relationship rather than the form. However, there was some disagreement as to whether Point 5 of the Proposed Conclusions in fact attempted to create a third category. The Government member of France was not convinced that the Proposed Conclusions did not create a third category of worker. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed the view of his group that the Office text clearly created such a category, while the Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed this view. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that his group had proposed an amendment to the Preamble that would make it clear that no new category was being created through the instrument. The secretariat was requested by the Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, to clarify this point. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the definition of "contract labour" found in Point 5 of the Proposed Conclusions was not intended to create a new category of workers; rather, it was based on the Office's analysis of the existing situation and existing practices. He noted that the definition was intended to facilitate discussion in the Committee with a view to the adoption of standards on this topic.

31. The Government member of the United Kingdom suggested that the purpose of the definition in Point 5 of the Proposed Conclusions was to identify what was meant by "contract worker". While not taking a position on this issue, he noted that the Employers' group and some Governments were concerned that the definition could encompass contracts for services which are commercial in nature. In the view of his Government, the group that should be covered was the group that did not have the independence of truly self-employed workers. He asked whether this was what was intended by referring to "dependency" and "subordination" in the Proposed Conclusions. The Government member of France queried whether "subordination" was intended to cover economic or legal subordination. If economic subordination were included, in his view, the scope would be so broad as to include independent contractors. Similarly, the Government member of Belgium cautioned that it should be made clear that we are speaking of legal relationships and not economic ones. In the opinion of the Government member of Chile, there was some confusion arising out of the discussion regarding effective dependency and legal dependency. According to the Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic, economic dependency would also involve legal dependency: if economic dependency was being referred to, then that worker would also be legally dependent on the user enterprise. He pointed out that Point 5 referred to actual dependency or subordination.

32. In response to the concerns raised regarding the meaning of "dependency" and "subordination", the representative of the Secretary-General explained that the definition in Point 5 of the Proposed Conclusions did not cover independent self-employed persons. A member of the secretariat addressed the question of economic dependency, stating that dependency of the worker on the user enterprise (as mentioned in Point 5) differs from the economic dependency which exists between the subcontractor and the user enterprise. The Proposed Conclusions refer to dependency, which is recognized by national law and practice as a characteristic of an employment relationship. He stressed that the Office had not introduced the word "economic" in the text.

33. The Employer Vice-Chairperson and the Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed their thanks to the Government members for their contribution to the discussion. In the opinion of the Employer Vice-Chairperson, the comments of the Governments did not alleviate the concerns of the Employers' group, but in many cases reinforced them. He enumerated the various issues that had been mentioned that were of particular interest to his group, and concluded by mentioning that they disagreed with the Office's assertion that a third category was not being created. He said that the first category was the truly independent worker; the second category was the worker with a recognized employment relationship; and the third category was the worker who did not have the legal status of an employee, but to whom it was proposed that the benefits of employee status should be extended. He added that the meaning of "dependency" and "subordination" continued to give rise to concern. The Worker Vice-Chairperson summed up by submitting that no third category had been created, and noted that this point could be clarified in the Preamble. Regarding subordination and dependency, he stated that, pursuant to the Proposed Conclusions, these terms had been strictly limited in two ways: first, to those types of subordination or dependency similar to employment relationships; and second, as defined under national law and practice.

Consideration of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report VI(2)

A. Form of the instruments

34. The Employer members submitted an amendment to delete Point 1, which stated that "The International Labour Conference should adopt standards on contract labour." In introducing this proposed amendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the Committee was faced with the decision of whether or not to adopt standards on contract labour. He reiterated that his group was implacably opposed to the adoption of any standards on this subject and summarized the reasons given in his opening statement in support of this view, including in particular the weak consensus on which the decision to place the item on the agenda was based, the Office's own doubts as reflected in the reports before the Committee, the enormous diversity of national law and practice, and the lack of definitional and conceptual clarity. He stressed that there was no one national model, but that different countries had attempted to address the issue in different ways, some adopting very complex tests designed to meet their particular national situation and to mesh with their existing legal system. The difficulties faced at the national level in addressing contract labour, in their view, would only be compounded if an attempt was made to regulate the matter at the international level. Since the treatment of contract labour arrangements had evolved differently in different countries, it was preferable for such arrangements to be determined at the national level.

35. The Employer Vice-Chairperson cautioned that international regulation would interfere with commercial arrangements and discourage the use of contract labour, thus denying workers and employers the benefits that flow from it. It would also increase costs to employers and cause confusion in collective bargaining arrangements. Contract labour comprised a myriad of possible situations, including instances where workers enjoy greater benefits than the permanent staff of the user enterprise. In the opinion of the Employer members, standard setting in this area was premature, inappropriate and would be impossible to implement at the national level. The key issue in their view remained the determination of whether a worker was an employee; if the person is found to be an employee, he or she should be protected accordingly. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stressed that his group did not endorse illegal, fraudulent or sham employment practices. Though not opposed to standard setting in principle, any standard needed to be relevant and capable of being ratified and implemented. They did oppose the creation of a third category of worker through standard setting.

36. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the proposed amendment, rejecting the view that the subject was too complex to address. In the view of his group, the objectives of the Proposed Conclusions were not complex, and were supported by a broad knowledge base on this topic, grounded in research and practical experience. The Workers' group expressed their support for a minimum framework Convention, supplemented by a Recommendation, which would allow governments to address the issue in a variety of ways and which realistically could be ratified by many countries. The essential problem that the standards addressed was the existence of disguised and triangular employment relationships, the use of which had dramatically increased, threatening to undermine the very basis of labour legislation. He noted that many workers were losing existing protection, such as social security coverage, which in many cases had been provided due to the adoption of other international labour standards. If the ILO could not address in a framework Convention the problems of disguised and triangular arrangements, it would call into question the ability of the Organization to adapt to the changing world of work. He disagreed with the view that there was a lack of conceptual clarity, and asserted that the Office had captured the essence of the problem in the Proposed Conclusions. The Worker members were conscious of the concerns expressed by some members of the Committee regarding the risk of creating a third category of worker and some of the other definitional issues, and would be seeking alternatives in an effort to address these concerns and further the debate.

37. The Government members of Canada, Cyprus, India, Mauritius, the Netherlands (speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union), Peru, the United States and Venezuela opposed the proposed amendment. The Government member of India noted that many workers have only minimal, if any, protection. His Government strongly supported providing legal protection to those workers, and would support an international instrument, though he noted that in the federal system of India ratification would prove difficult. A number of Government members, including from Mauritius, the Netherlands (on behalf of the Member States of the European Union) and the United States, endorsed adopting an instrument on contract labour, though what form that instrument would take would depend on the outcome of the discussions. Put to a vote, the Employers' proposed amendment to delete Point 1 of the Proposed Conclusions was not adopted, as there were 4,092 votes cast in favour, 7,260 against and 44 abstentions (the quorum was 4,910).

38. The Government member of Malaysia introduced an amendment to replace the word "standards" by "instrument" in Point 1, explaining that this would result in more flexibility, making government compliance more feasible. As the proposed amendment was not seconded, it was not accepted. The Committee then adopted Point 1 without change.

39. In the light of the decision taken by the Committee regarding the amendment that the Employer members had proposed to Point 1, they withdrew their amendment to delete Point 2, and expressed their support for the amendment submitted by the Government member of Malaysia to replace "these standards" by "the instrument" and delete "a Convention supplemented by". The Government member of Malaysia introduced the amendment, which was seconded by the Government member of Venezuela. He stated that his Government opposed the adoption of a Convention, but felt that a Recommendation could provide useful guidelines. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that though his group was opposed to the adoption of standards on this subject, given the decision of the Committee on Point 1, they would support the amendment.

40. The Worker Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment, since his group was of the view that a Convention was necessary to ensure that contract labour is not used to deny workers their rights. By placing the item on the Conference agenda, the Governing Body had acknowledged the existence of problems in this area and the need to address them. He urged the Governments to support a Convention in principle at this stage of the deliberations, without necessarily making any final commitment regarding its adoption, in order to determine what the Committee was capable of achieving in this area. He suggested that, in the process of discussing and developing the Convention, issues would be further clarified and any difficulties could be overcome. The Workers' group was of the view that the process of elaborating a Convention in this important area was consistent with the goal of making the Organization more effective and credible. Credibility, he argued, could not be measured simply by the number of ratifications received, since many factors affect that process; however, credibility would be called into question if the Organization failed to adopt a standard to protect millions of workers. The Worker members were confident that the Committee could develop a Convention that would be acceptable to governments and capable of being ratified and implemented.

41. The Government members of Cyprus as well as the Netherlands (speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union) expressed their opposition to the proposed amendment. The Government member of Papua New Guinea spoke in support of the proposed amendment, given the complexity and grey areas of the subject. The Government member of Venezuela also favoured the proposed amendment. In response to the statement of the Workers' group, the Employer Vice-Chairperson stressed that the credibility of the ILO would not be measured by the number of Conventions it adopted, but rather by the relevance and utility of the standards. A Recommendation in this area would provide guidance to member States in a more flexible manner than a Convention. He recalled the Report of the Director-General calling for an upgrading of the status of Recommendations to allow them to stand on their own.

42. At the request of the Employer members, the proposed amendment was put to a record vote. The results of the vote were as follows: 4,840 votes in favour, 5,500 votes against and 528 abstentions (the quorum was 4,910).[2] The proposed amendment was, therefore, not adopted.

43. The Government member of Japan noted that the amendment submitted by his country was similar to the amendment of the Government member of Malaysia that had been defeated in the record vote. Given that the discussion on the amendment submitted by the Government member of Malaysia was also relevant to the amendment he was proposing, he withdrew the amendment, on the understanding that it could be considered to have been dealt with by the Committee in connection with the earlier proposed amendment. As no more amendments had been proposed to Point 2, the Committee adopted Point 2 without change.

B. Conclusions proposed with the view to a Convention

I. Preamble

Point 3

44. The Employer members withdrew their proposed amendment to delete Point 3. The Committee then considered an amendment submitted by the Government member of Malaysia to replace the words "new standards" by "a new instrument" and replace "ensuring that contract workers enjoy adequate protection" by "providing guidelines for the protection of contract workers". In the light of the Committee's decision to proceed with a Convention, the Government member of Malaysia proposed a subamendment to his amendment, the effect of which was to leave before the Committee only the second half of the proposed amendment regarding providing guidelines. The Government member of Malaysia explained that in his country a distinction was made between contracts of service, which give rise to an employment relationship, and contracts for services, which are entered into by self-employed workers. In order to take into account the variety of national laws and practices in this area and the differing needs, his Government was of the view that the proposed instrument should provide flexible guidelines. The Employer members seconded the subamendment, stating that they supported the rationale behind the subamendment, in particular, the importance of providing flexibility and avoiding prescriptive references in the Preamble.

[2] The Employer members requested that the details of the record vote with respect to the Government members be included in the report. The results of the vote were as follows:

For: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Cameroon, Indonesia, Japan, Kuwait, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Mexico, Morocco, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, Russian Federation, Saudi Arabia, Thailand, United Arab Emirates.

Against: Austria, Belize, Canada, Chile, China, Cyprus, Denmark, Finland, Greece, India, Korea (Republic of), Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malta, Namibia, Netherlands, Norway, Panama, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Slovakia, South Africa, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Syrian Arab Republic, Trinidad and Tobago, United Kingdom, United States, Venezuela, Zimbabwe.

Abstentions: Botswana, Côte d'Ivoire, Czech Republic, Germany, Hungary, Ireland, Lesotho, Mauritius, Pakistan, Switzerland, Tunisia. Uganda.

Absent: Algeria, Argentina, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Benin, Bolivia, Colombia, Egypt, El Salvador, France, Gabon, Gambia, Guinea, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Israel, Italy, Jamaica, Kenya, Lebanon, Malawi, Mali, Mongolia, Nigeria, Oman, Philippines, Qatar, Romania, Seychelles, Sudan, Tanzania (United Republic of), Turkey, Uruguay.

45. As the Committee had agreed to proceed on the basis of the adoption of a Convention, the Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed the view that it would be inappropriate to speak in terms of "guidelines" in the Preamble. The Worker members therefore opposed the amendment. The Government members of the Netherlands (speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union) and Switzerland opposed the subamendment for the reasons given by the Worker Vice-Chairperson. The Government members of Mauritius, Papua New Guinea and Venezuela also opposed the subamendment. The Government member of Malaysia withdrew his proposed amendment, as subamended.

46. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced a proposed amendment to replace the words following "standards" by "which in accordance with national law and practice enable the determination of the employment status of those performing contract labour." He explained that this proposal should be considered in the light of his group's proposed amendment to Point 5. He recalled his earlier remarks that the key issue was not the definition of contract labour, but the availability of procedures for determining whether or not a worker is an employee, and the existence of remedies to ensure that those who are employees, regardless of the title they are given, are protected as such. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed his group's opposition to the proposed amendment on the ground that it did not recognize the existence of a problem, and did not address the issues of disguised and triangular relationships. Although the Government member of Mauritius supported the amendment in the interests of enhanced flexibility, a number of other Government members spoke out against the amendment. The Government member of Algeria opposed the amendment since, in the opinion of his Government, those working as contract labour should be protected, regardless of the nature of the contractual relationship involved. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, viewed the proposed amendment as a confirmation of the status quo, and therefore these Government members were opposed to it. The Government members of Canada, South Africa and Switzerland spoke against the amendment on the ground that the words sought to be incorporated were not appropriate for a Preamble to a Convention. The proposed amendment was also opposed by the Government member of Poland.

47. The Employer Vice-Chairperson proposed a subamendment to retain the original Office text and to add at the end of the sentence the words "and which in accordance with national law and practice enable the determination of the employment status of those performing contract labour." The Worker members maintained their opposition. Following comments from the Government member of Venezuela that the new text would complicate the issue, and from the Government member of Hungary who stated that determination of employment status was a means to the essential end of providing adequate protection for contract workers and not an objective in itself, the Employer members withdrew their amendment, as subamended.

48. The next amendment considered was presented by the Worker members, and proposed the deletion of the word "enjoy adequate protection" to be replaced by "are protected". While acknowledging that the word "adequate" is sometimes appropriate, in the context of the Preamble, qualifying the protection in this way was in their view inappropriate. The Employer members opposed the proposed amendment since the wording of the Office text of the Preamble was consistent with the wording in the body of the text. They also considered the concept of "adequacy" to be important, since it required protection to be sufficient in varying circumstances, and "protection" on its own was a vague and meaningless term. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of his own Government and the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Luxembourg, Portugal, Spain and Sweden, opposed the proposed amendment, as did the Government members of Papua New Guinea and the United States. The Worker members withdrew their proposed amendment.

49. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced an amendment to insert the phrase "and its contribution to employment growth and economic performance" after the words "contract labour". Two points had clearly emerged from Report VI(1): (i) that contract labour was increasing; and, (ii) that contract labour played a role in labour market flexibility, employment creation and economic performance. In the view of the Employer members, only the first of these points was reflected in the Preamble, and their amendment sought to give recognition to the second as well.

50. The Worker Vice-Chairperson considered that the proposed amendment would result in the objective of the Convention appearing to be to promote contract labour. Because the existing text had given them cause for concern in this regard, the Worker members had submitted other amendments to clarify that the aim of the Convention was to protect workers. He also maintained that the amendment under consideration was factually inaccurate, since contract labour often adversely affects economic growth, for example by reducing the purchasing power of workers. The Government members of Cyprus, Hungary, India, the Netherlands (speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union), Poland and South Africa expressed their opposition to the proposed amendment. The Government member of Cyprus stated that the Preamble should be kept as simple as possible. The Government members of India, Poland and South Africa were of the view that the amendment would lead to misunderstandings, since the objective of the instrument should be to protect workers. The opposition of the Government member of Hungary was based on the view that workers should be protected adequately irrespective of the impact of a particular form of employment on employment growth and economic performance.

51. The Employer Vice-Chairperson withdrew his group's proposed amendment given the lack of support from Government members. However, he expressed disappointment with the arguments, noting that the amendment did not involve the removal of protection. Contract labour, in the view of the Employers' group, could not undermine economic growth, and should be recognized as an essential part of labour market flexibility.

52. An amendment proposed by the Worker members was then placed before the Committee to add the following sentence to the Preamble: "The Preamble should note that many protections afforded workers are founded upon a recognized employment relationship and that an increasing amount of work is being performed outside of regular employment relationships where protections either do not apply or are not applied in practice." The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that the purpose of the proposed amendment was to protect workers on the basis of the employment relationship and to prevent the erosion of that relationship. The Employer members opposed the amendment on the basis that it sought to introduce substantive issues and it was argumentative; therefore, it would be inappropriate to include it in the Preamble. The Government member of Hungary agreed that the amendment was seeking to introduce substantive issues; he also opposed the amendment, as did the Government member of the United States, since it could give rise to confusion. Expressing the desire to keep the Preamble simple, the Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, also opposed the amendment. The Worker members withdrew the proposed amendment.

53. The Worker Vice-Chairperson introduced another amendment, adding the following phrase to Point 3: "The Preamble should state that the proposed instrument does not seek to establish a new category of worker but to extend protection to workers performing contract labour regardless of their status." The Worker Vice-Chairperson confirmed that this amendment had been put forward to address the concern expressed by members of the Committee that a new category of workers was being created, and to make it clear that this was not the intention of the instrument. The Employer Vice-Chairperson opposed the amendment, stating that, if the Worker members were successful in achieving their objectives, a new category of worker would be established, and this amendment evidenced the uneasiness of the Worker members on this point. In addition, in the view of the Employer members, the amendment was not appropriate for inclusion in the Preamble since it sought to qualify what might be included in the text as a result of subsequent discussions. The Government member of Hungary joined the Employer members in opposing the amendment on the ground that it was not appropriate for a Preamble, and adding the phrase "regardless of their legal status" would give rise to considerable difficulties. The Government member of the United States endorsed the comments of the Government member of Hungary. The Worker members withdrew their proposed amendment.

54. In introducing an amendment to add the words "The Preamble should reaffirm the continuing relevance of the employment relationship to protecting workers", the Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that the aim was to reaffirm the relevance of the employment relationship for protecting workers, and to underline that the ILO needed to defend that relationship. The amendment was opposed by the Employer members on the grounds that it was not appropriate for inclusion in the Preamble and it sought to establish a platform for debate. Moreover, in their view, the amendment was inconsistent with the amendments of the Worker members proposed to subsequent points, which were not founded on the existence of an employment relationship. The proposed amendment was also opposed by the Government members of Cyprus, the Netherlands (on behalf of the Member States of the European Union), Poland and Switzerland. The Government member of Cyprus repeated his Government's position that the Preamble should be kept simple, and the Government member of the United States stated that the language of the Preamble as proposed by the Office was sufficient. The Government member of Switzerland opposed the amendment, stating that it was not appropriate to attempt to identify various employment categories in the Preamble; the essential aim was to ensure as many workers as possible would be protected. The Worker members withdrew their amendment. The Committee then adopted Point 3 without change.

II. Methods of application

55. An amendment proposing the deletion of Point 4 was withdrawn by its sponsor, the Employer members. The Government member of Malaysia also withdrew his proposed amendment involving the replacement of the word "Convention" with "Recommendation" and the replacement of the phrase beginning "laws or regulations" by "collective agreements or by any other means [that] Members consider appropriate after consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers." The Committee then moved on to consider an amendment submitted by the Member States of the European Union to replace each use of the word "or" in the second line of Point 4 with "and/or". The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, expressed the view that the amendment would give greater flexibility to use the various means available in applying the Convention. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that the proposed amendment did not appear to affect the text. He requested the Office to advise the Committee as to the effect of the proposed amendment. The deputy representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that the Office text of Point 4 used standard language for proposed Conventions, and that its purpose was to allow maximum flexibility in the means of application. In the light of this clarification, the Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the proposers of the amendment, withdrew the amendment.

56. The final amendment proposed to Point 4 was introduced by the Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union. He explained that they sought to substitute the word "implemented" for "applied" since in their view "implemented" was a more active term. The Employer Vice-Chairperson again expressed the view that his group did not see the need for the change. Following confirmation from the deputy representative of the Secretary-General that the term "applied" as used in the Office text was standard terminology, the Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that his group could not support the amendment. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, withdrew the proposed amendment. The Committee then adopted Point 4 without change.

III. Definitions

Point 5

57. Having heard the advice of the Legal Adviser regarding possible ways of approaching the examination of those amendments to Point 5 that would most substantially alter the Office text, the Committee decided to invite the authors to introduce those amendments; the Committee would then proceed to an indicative vote to determine which amendment would be considered first.

58. The Government member of Venezuela submitted an amendment to delete the Office text and replace it with the following:

> For the purposes of the proposed Convention, the term "contract labour" should mean all work performed by a natural person, in conditions of dependency on or subordination to an "intermediary enterprise" which provides services to a "user enterprise", which services include the work of such natural person, under a contract of employment in accordance with national law and practice.

She explained that the intention of the proposal was to delineate clearly between commercial and employment relationships, and to ensure that a natural person providing work in conditions of dependency or subordination, regardless of for whom the services are provided, would be covered by the Convention. By way of example, she described the labour legislation in her country which obliges a user enterprise to ensure that an intermediary or subcontractor respects the rights of workers. In the interest of simplifying the discussion, the Government member of Venezuela withdrew her amendment, requesting that her concerns be kept in mind in the subsequent discussion.

59. An amendment was then introduced by the Government member of the United States to delete the Office text of Point 5 and replace it with the following: "For the purposes of the proposed Convention the term 'contract labour' should be defined as work carried out by a contract worker (as defined by the national law and practice in individual member States) for a natural or legal person." In the opinion of his Government, "contract worker" should be defined so as to clearly distinguish employees from bona fide independent contractors. He recalled that in the United States several factors are significant in making this determination, no single one being a controlling factor; in general, the test is whether, as a matter of economic reality, the individual is economically dependent on the business to which he or she renders service, or is, in fact, in business for himself or herself. He stressed that his Government believed that the determination of who is a contract worker should be set forth in national law, regulation and court decisions. The Government member of Switzerland seconded the proposed amendment on the grounds that it provided reasonable latitude for governments to establish criteria to determine who is an employee and an independent contractor, and avoided creating a third category. The Government member of Japan also expressed his support for the amendment for the reasons put forward by the Government member of Switzerland.

60. The next amendment was introduced by the Government member of Finland, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union. Their amendment sought to delete Point 5 and replace it with the following text:

For the purposes of the proposed Convention the term "contract labour" should mean work performed for a natural or legal person (referred to as a "user enterprise") by a person (referred to as a "contract worker") under the following circumstances:

(a) the contractual arrangement, if there is one between the worker and the user enterprise, requires the work to be performed by the worker personally;

(b) the work is done under actual conditions of the worker's dependency on or subordination to the user enterprise, where these conditions are similar to those that characterize an employment relationship under national law and practice; and

(c) the worker may be provided for the user enterprise by a subcontractor or an intermediary.

61. This proposal, explained the Government member of Finland, was largely based on an acceptance of the rationale behind the Office text, recognizing that protection should be provided in many bilateral and triangular employment relationships falling outside the scope of traditional labour law. However, in their view, the Office text was perhaps too concise to express with adequate precision all the situations that the instrument intended to cover. He noted that in drafting this amendment, the Member States of the European Union tried to take into consideration various concerns expressed in the Committee: first, the definition was formulated in the amendment so that it would not be necessary for a member State to introduce a third "in-between" category of workers, unless an individual State chose to do so in transposing the conditions of dependency set out in the proposed Recommendation. Second, the amendment emphasized that it is the worker's and not, for instance, the subcontractor's dependency that is decisive for the application of the Convention, as dependency between commercial partners is irrelevant for the purposes of the Convention. Third, he stated that it seemed appropriate to require a contract worker to perform work personally since, otherwise, the worker would not be in a clearly dependent or subordinate position. Finally, clause (c) of the proposed amendment attempted to clarify that the Convention was applicable to triangular relationships. These clarifications were necessary, in the view of the authors of the amendment, for a proper understanding of the subsequent provisions of the proposed instruments.

62. The Employer Vice-Chairperson requested clarification on the amendment proposed by the Member States of the European Union, in particular the applicability of clause (a) where no contractual arrangement existed between the worker and the user enterprise, and whether the three conditions enumerated in the amendment were cumulative or alternative. On behalf of the Member States of the European Union, the Government member of Finland clarified that it was not necessary for all three conditions to be present simultaneously: clauses (a) and (b) needed to be present to define a bilateral relationship, and (c) would be significant only in the context of a triangular relationship.

63. The Employer members put forward their amendment to delete Point 5 and replace it with —

In accordance with national law and practice, procedures should be established which will allow the determination as to whether an employment relationship exists. Such procedures should be accessible and based on objective criteria which enable the clear differentiation between commercial and employment relationships. Where an employment relationship is found to exist, the procedures should enable the identity of the employer to be determined so as to ensure the assumption by the employers of their obligations.

The Employer Vice-Chairperson characterized the amendment as complementary to, but going a step further than, the amendment under Point 5 proposed by the Government member of the United States. He recalled the position of the Employers' group that the critical issue that needed to be addressed was to determine if an employment relationship existed, and, if so, to ensure that the worker is provided with all the privileges and benefits normally accruing to an employee. He contended that it was incorrect to begin by attempting to define a contract worker and a user enterprise, and then grappling with all the inherent complexities. Their amendment, he stated, sought to mandate that in every country that ratifies the Convention (i) there should be accessible and clear procedures to enable a clear distinction to be made between employment and commercial relationships; (ii) if an employment relationship is found to exist, all the attendant responsibilities should be assumed by the employer; and (iii) the procedures should ensure that the identity of the employer could be determined. The amendment would also, in their view, avoid the confusion of determining who was the user enterprise and avoid creating a third category of worker. Many of the proposals before the Committee, he maintained, would perpetuate such a third category.

64. A further amendment submitted by the Employer members, to change the title of Point 5 from "Definitions" to "Procedures", was presented by the Employer Vice-Chairperson. He explained that the amendment was a corollary to the previous amendment, to establish the proper textual base for that amendment and essentially raised a drafting question rather than a substantive one. He then withdrew another amendment of the Employer members which had sought to delete Point 5.

65. On the basis of an indicative vote on the question of which of the amendments introduced on Point 5 the Committee should proceed with first, the amendment presented by the Member States of the European Union to replace the text was given priority and the discussion was opened on that amendment. The Employer members expressed the view that the amendment suffered from the deficiency of creating a third category and providing uncertainty regarding what is to be considered the user enterprise; however, it did have the advantage of introducing the notion that work had to be performed personally by the worker. The Employer members did not support the definition proposed in this amendment.

66. The Worker members submitted a subamendment to the amendment proposed by the Member States of the European Union so that it would read as follows:

> For the purposes of the proposed Convention the term "contract labour" should mean work performed for a natural or legal person (referred to as a "user enterprise") by a person (referred to as a "contract worker") under the following circumstances:
> (a) the work is done under actual conditions of the worker's dependency on or subordination to the user enterprise, where these conditions are similar to those that characterize an employment relationship under national law and practice; and either
> (b) pursuant to a direct contractual relationship between the worker and the user enterprise, the work is performed by the worker personally; or
> (c) the worker is provided for the user enterprise by a subcontractor or an intermediary.

67. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that the purpose of the subamendment was to clarify that all three conditions did not have to be present simultaneously, and would distinguish between those required in the case of a bilateral relationship (including the need for the work to be done personally by the worker) and a triangular one. The Government member of Finland, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, commented that the subamendment included the elements of importance to the countries of the European Union, while also improving upon their proposed amendment. They, therefore, supported the subamendment, and the Government members of Italy, Norway, South Africa and Switzerland also spoke in favour of it. The Government member of Spain, supported by the Government member of South Africa, suggested that the Drafting Committee might want to reconsider the appropriate presentation of the clauses, since they did not all have the same value.

68. In response to the Worker members' subamendment, the Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that the Committee should contemplate the effect of the proposal, since a number of possible combinations were being proposed, cutting across situations where there is a clear employment relationship between the worker and the subcontractor or intermediary, and it would thus interfere with commercial relationships. He also expressed his group's continuing concern regarding the difficulties in translating the word "subcontractor". In an attempt to address these concerns, the Employer members proposed an amendment to the Worker members' subamendment, to add at the end of clause (c) the words "and there is no employment relationship between the worker and the subcontractor or intermediary." The Employer Vice-Chairperson emphasized that his group was adamant that normal, everyday commercial relationships should not be covered by the instrument, and that the Committee must avoid the creation of nebulous relationships that would inevitably result from the establishment of an "in-between" category.

69. The Worker members were not in agreement with this amendment to their subamendment, recalling their view that two distinct problems needed to be addressed: disguised relationships and triangular relationships. The addition proposed by the Employer members would, in the view of the Workers' group, take into account only the former, leaving no protection in the case of triangular relationships. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that employees of subcontractors often need protection with respect to the user enterprise, for example, regarding health and safety matters or hours of work beyond the statutory limits. Also, provision was needed ensuring joint and several liability for unpaid wages. The Government members of Italy and the Netherlands (on behalf of the Member States of the European Union) stated that they could not support the Employer members' amendment to the Worker members' subamendment.

70. In response to a request for clarification from the Government member of Cyprus, the representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that Point 5 of the Office text acknowledges the existence of a category of workers, whom it defines as "contract workers", who work for an enterprise (the "user enterprise") without a contract of employment with the latter. Thus, workers in this grey zone, who do not enjoy the protection afforded by labour law, do already exist in the labour market. He went on to suggest that the question to be asked was not whether or not the Proposed Conclusions would lead to the creation of a new category of workers, but rather whether they would eliminate this grey zone of workers or maintain them by affording workers in this category more limited protection than that normally provided to those working under a contract of employment. Whether the category was maintained or eliminated depended, in the view of the Office, on the relative scope of protection to be afforded to contract workers under Part V of the proposed Convention: if protection is provided to contract workers that is substantially the same as that provided by labour law to workers under a contract of employment, it could be said to be aimed at the elimination of a third category of workers; otherwise, the Proposed Conclusions would lead to the recognition of the existence of a third category.

71. The Employer Vice-Chairperson reiterated that their amendment to the Worker members' subamendment aimed to eliminate the third category of worker. The Office explanation did not, in the view of the Government member of Italy, clarify the original amendment proposed by the Member States of the European Union. While understanding the reasoning behind the further amendment proposed by the Employer members, her Government could not support it. Similarly, the Government member of Switzerland expressed her understanding of the rationale for the Employer members' amendment to the Worker members' subamendment, but could not support it, as it would reduce the scope of the instrument to merely bilateral arrangements. She stated that in the opinion of her Government, no intention to create a new category of worker was being proposed, since this category already exists. The task of the Committee, she advanced, was to define this category and to find appropriate solutions that would keep pace with future developments and would take into account transborder differences. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, supported the view that their amendment as subamended by the Worker members did not introduce a new third category, but proposed a definition based on an existing factual situation. He suggested that any exclusions from this definition be enumerated in Point 6 of the Proposed Conclusions.

72. Further support for the subamendment proposed by the Worker members, excluding the further amendment of the Employer members, was expressed by the Government members of Guinea and Trinidad and Tobago, though the latter qualified her Government's support by suggesting that the words in the Office text, "other than a contract of employment" could usefully be included in clause (b) of the subamendment. The Government member of Guinea viewed the subamendment as being consistent with the realities of developing countries. The Government member of Peru described the types of contracts, particularly bilateral arrangements, common in South American countries, and urged the Committee to keep in mind the possible future directions that contractual arrangements might follow. The Employer Vice-Chairperson conceded that his group accepted the concerns expressed regarding disguised employment relations, but that they did not view the triangular relationship as a problem area, except to the extent that a determination needed to be made of who was the actual employer. Regarding health and safety laws, he noted that these would be applicable regardless of the existence of an employment relationship because of rules applicable to owner/occupiers. On a vote, the amendment proposed by the Employer members to the Worker members' subamendment was defeated. With a quorum of 4,788, 4,032 votes were cast in favour, 5,628 against, with 630 abstentions.

73. A further amendment to the Worker members' subamendment was then submitted by the Government member of Japan, and seconded by the Government member of Australia, to change the words "similar to" to "substantially the same as" in clause (a). The concern addressed in this amendment to the subamendment, according to the Government member of Japan, was to avoid the creation of a third category of worker. The Employer members supported the reservations expressed by the Government member of Japan, but suggested that the intentions could be more clearly expressed by deleting the word "substantially", which they put forward as a further amendment. The Government member of Japan, supported by the Government member of South Africa, opposed this further amendment on the ground that the provision would thereby be rendered devoid of meaning, since it would exclude from the scope of protection those outside the traditional employment relationship. A number of other Government representatives, including from Hungary, Namibia, the Netherlands (on behalf of the Member States of the European Union) and Switzerland, also expressed their opposition to this further amendment proposed by the Employer members. The Employer members withdrew their further amendment. As little support for the amendment proposed by the Japanese Government to the Worker members' subamendment was expressed in an indicative vote, the Government member of Japan withdrew this amendment.

74. A further amendment was submitted to the subamendment of the Worker members. The Government member of Uruguay proposed adding to clause (b) the qualifying language "other than a contract of employment", found in the original Office text, in order to more clearly distinguish between bilateral and triangular relationships. This proposal was seconded by the Government member of Hungary and supported by the Government members of Panama and Papua New Guinea. However, opposition to the proposal was expressed by the Government members of Austria, Italy (on behalf of the Member States of the European Union), Spain and the United States, as well as the Worker and Employer members. The Government member of Uruguay withdrew his amendment to the Worker members' subamendment.

75. The Committee was then invited to vote on the subamendment proposed by the Worker members to the amendment of the Member States of the European Union. The Legal Adviser informed the Committee that as the subamendment sought to replace the text of Point 5, as a consequence all other amendments to Point 5 would fall, with the exception of those seeking to add a new point after Point 5. The subamendment of the Worker members to Point 5 was carried by a vote of 5,418 in favour, 4,116 against, with 672 abstentions. The quorum was 4,788. The Chairperson noted that since the subamendment had been endorsed by the authors of the original amendment, the Member States of the European Union, that amendment would not be considered further. The Committee adopted Point 5 as amended.

New points proposed

76. The next amendment considered by the Committee was submitted by the Worker members and proposed the addition of a new point to follow Point 5: "The term "subcontractor" should mean a natural or legal person who performs work or provides services for a user enterprise under a contractual arrangement other than a contract of employment." The Worker Vice-Chairperson recalled that the definition of "contract labour", as adopted by the Committee, now included the term "subcontractor" and therefore it would be logical to include a definition of that term as well. He also noted that a definition of "subcontractor" could be found in the proposed Recommendation. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed his group's opposition to the amendment, and reiterated their objection to any use of the term "subcontractor" in the text. He also drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that the amendment proposed by the Worker members adopted a different definition of "subcontractor" to that found in the proposed Recommendation. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, supported the inclusion of a definition of "subcontractor" in the proposed amendment for the reasons put forward by the Worker members, but preferred the wording in the Office text of the proposed Recommendation (Point 16(2)). The Government member of Austria then proposed the following subamendment with a view to ensuring consistency between the definitions in the proposed Convention and Recommendation: "the term "subcontractor" should mean a natural or legal person who performs work for a user enterprise under a contractual arrangement with it, other than a contract of employment". The subamendment was seconded by the Government member of Denmark, and supported by the Government members of France, Switzerland and the United States. The Government member of France stressed the importance of ensuring consistency in definitions, and characterized the role of a Recommendation as providing guidance with respect to the means of implementing a Convention and not to clarify definitions. The Employer members disagreed with this view, and contended that the definition could appropriately be placed in the Recommendation only. In the light of the government support that had been evidenced, the Worker members indicated that they would vote in favour of the subamendment. Put to a vote, the subamendment proposed by the Government member of Austria to the amendment of the Worker members was adopted. The results of the vote were as follows: 5,586 votes in favour, 4,032 against, with 294 abstentions. The quorum was 4,788. The additional point proposed by the amendment, as subamended, was adopted by the Committee.

77. A further addition to Point 5 was proposed by the Worker members in an amendment to add the following definition of "labour subcontractor": "The term 'labour subcontractor' should mean a natural or legal person who supplies workers for a user enterprise under a contractual arrangement other than a contract of employment." However, before presenting this amendment, the Worker Vice-Chairperson requested that it be discussed in the context of Point 16, since the need for the definition would be clearer at that time, and consistency could be assured with any definition of this term adopted in the proposed Recommendation. The Employer members opposed any postponement of the discussion on the basis that amendments related to Point 5 were before the Committee and should be dealt with, otherwise the Committee would be hindered in dealing with the remaining provisions of the text. The Government member of South Africa opposed the amendment and the deferral of its consideration, on the ground that the definition proposed was not necessary for the Convention. The Worker members withdrew their amendment.

78. Another point to follow Point 5 was proposed by the Worker members:

> The term "intermediary" should mean any person (whether established, legitimate, solvent or not) who engages workers with no employment relationship formally established to have work performed or services provided for the benefit of, or on behalf of, or under the supervision or control of or with the resources provided (in main or in part) by, a user enterprise.

In his introduction to the amendment, the Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that there is value in distinguishing between subcontracting and labour-only subcontracting, as well as distinguishing between legitimate, solvent businesses and fly-by-night operators. A primary objective of establishing such distinctions, he explained, was to provide guidance in determining the obligations of the employer, since, for example, it would be inappropriate to assign obligations to illegitimate or insolvent businesses. In response, the Employer Vice-Chairperson asserted the opposition of his group to the inclusion of a definition of "intermediary" in either the proposed Convention or Recommendation. They did not accept the argument as to the need for such a definition in the context of designating responsibilities, since the proposed instruments did not assign obligations to intermediaries. The Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that the proposed amendment sought to define "intermediary" in a complex manner, substantially diverging from the definition found in paragraph (3) of Point 16. The amendment introduced a number of concepts, the need for which was not evident to the Employer members.

79. The Government member of South Africa spoke in favour of the amendment to the extent that she supported the idea of having a definition of "intermediary" set out in the Convention. However, she suggested that the definition in Point 16(3) of the Office text might be more appropriate for inclusion in the proposed Convention, leaving issues such as the solvency of the enterprise to the Recommendation. She thus proposed a subamendment to the Worker members' amendment to read as follows: "The term "intermediary" should mean a natural or legal person who makes contract workers available to a user enterprise without becoming formally the employer of these workers." The subamendment was seconded by the Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union. Further support for the subamendment was expressed by the Worker members and the Government members of Switzerland and the United States. Opposition was voiced by the Employer members and the Government member of China, the latter on the basis that there is very little recourse to contract labour through intermediaries in China. The Worker members' amendment, as subamended by the Government member of South Africa, was adopted pursuant to a vote. With a quorum of 15,321, 16,359 votes were cast in favour, 11,989 against, and there were 931 abstentions. The new point following Point 5 was thus declared to have been adopted as subamended.

80. Having concluded the discussions regarding important definitional points, the Employer members sought to make clear their position at this stage of the Committee's deliberations. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled that from the beginning his group had been opposed to the adoption of instruments on contract labour, and he regretted that they had not been successful in convincing the Committee of their reasoning. He then reviewed the motivation for some of the amendments that his group had proposed, in particular the need to acknowledge the importance of contract labour to employment and economic growth, to distinguish between commercial and employment relationships, and to ensure that an instrument was not adopted that would jeopardize the use of contract labour. The Employers' group expressed concern that the Committee was moving toward restricting the use of contract labour which, in their view, would be fundamentally opposed to national economic interests, and thus they would continue to oppose such an approach. Regarding the definition of "contract labour" adopted by the Committee, the inclusion of the words "subcontractor" and "intermediary", which were not in the original Office text of the proposed Convention, not only perpetuated the problems of the Office text but added to the confusion. The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that the text adopted by the Committee ignored the distinction between employment and commercial relationships, and as a result would have a negative impact on employment. He appealed to Government members to consider the implications that the adoption of such an instrument would have on economic activity, and not to support a proposed instrument that they had no intention of ratifying. He also stressed that it was not in the best interests of workers, employers, governments or the ILO to have unsuitable instruments which obtain very few ratifications.

81. In response to the statement of the Employer members, the Worker Vice-Chairperson agreed that a distinction needed to be made between commercial and employment relationships. He stressed that the primary aim of the proposed Convention and Recommendation was to protect workers, and thus economic arguments were not appropriate. The Government member of Italy called on all the Committee members to continue with an open and flexible discussion. She underlined the possible benefits of a Convention on contract labour for employers, as it would provide an international framework for dealing with these types of arrangements.

IV. Scope

82. The Employer members withdrew their amendment proposing to delete Point 6 and went on to introduce an amendment to delete the words "and to all contract workers" in Point 6. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that the intention of the amendment was to simplify the text, since, once reference was made to "all branches of activity", it did not seem necessary to then refer to "all contract workers". The Worker Vice-Chairperson replied that his group could not support the amendment since the purpose of the proposed instrument was to protect contract workers and the Office text of Point 6 made this objective clear. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, opposed the amendment on the ground that the scope of the Convention should first be expressed in broad terms, with exceptions being more appropriately dealt with later in the text, for instance under Point 7. The Government member of the United States also favoured the Office text over the amended version. On an indicative vote of Government members, the amendment of the Employer members was not supported.

83. The Employer members then introduced an amendment to insert after the first sentence of Point 6 the words "It should not apply to workers who in accordance with national law and practice have a recognized employment relationship." The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated that the amendment sought to clarify that the Convention would not apply where there was a recognized, legal, formally established employment relationship, and avoid any confusion that might lead to the absurdity of formal employment relationships being overridden, resulting in a worker being assigned intermediate status.

84. The Worker Vice-Chairperson voiced his group's opposition to the amendment, stating that it would exclude those workers who are under the control of persons other than the employer. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of his own country, suggested that the words "recognized contract of employment" be used instead of "recognized employment relationship". The Government member of South Africa also suggested that different wording might be considered, in particular using "formal or" before "recognized" and adding "with the user enterprise" to the end of the sentence. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that the term "employment relationship" had been proposed for the sake of consistency, but that the intention was to refer to a contract of employment; his group agreed to subamend their amendment to use the words "recognized contract of employment". The suggestion of the Government member of South Africa to add the words "with the user enterprise" was not acceptable to the Employer members since it would undermine the intentions of their amendment.

85. In the discussion that followed on the Employer members' amendment as subamended by them, the Government members of Canada, Denmark, Germany and the United States expressed their support on the ground that it was appropriate to exclude from the scope of the Convention those who are already protected through the existence of an employment relationship. The Government member of Canada advocated that since a distinction between workers with regular employment contracts and those without had not been made under Point 5, it needed to be clearly stated in Point 6. He went on to note that the rationale for excluding those employed by private employment agencies had to be that they were already employees; therefore, logically, the exclusion should be extended to all those with a real contract of employment. The Government members of Greece and Venezuela voiced their opposition to the subamendment, while the Government member of Italy stated that her Government favoured the original amendment over the subamended version. The Government member of Venezuela considered that the original amendment and the proposed subamendment distorted the substantive legal purpose of the text. The Government member of Greece was of the view that the effect of the subamendment could be to exclude contract workers from the scope of the Convention.

86. Taking up the suggestion of the Government member of South Africa, the Worker members proposed a further subamendment to the Employer members' amendment so that it would read "It should not apply to workers who in accordance with national law and practice have a recognized contract of employment with the user enterprise". This subamendment was proposed because the Workers' group was of the view that the amendment of the Employer members removed workers in a triangular relationship from the scope of the protection. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that in a triangular relationship there would often be a nominal employer who was unable to fulfil the obligations of an employer. Even where there was an employment relationship with a subcontractor, the worker was not always adequately protected. He noted that although many European countries had regulated such relationships, many other countries had not. The Employer Vice-Chairperson expressed his group's total opposition to the Worker members' proposal since they considered that it destroyed the intention of the Employer members' amendment. He reiterated that his group did not condone illegal or fraudulent arrangements seeking to deny workers their rights; however, where a contract of employment exists, the protection emanates from that relationship. Confusion would ensue, he stated, were the exception restricted to contracts of employment with the user enterprise.

87. A further subamendment to the Employer members' amendment to Point 6 was moved by the Government member of Switzerland, and endorsed by the Employer members. She explained that her Government shared the Employer members' concerns, but considered they could be addressed more clearly as follows: "It should not apply to workers who are employed on the basis of a contract of employment recognized by national law and practice and concluded either with the subcontractor or the user enterprise." She advocated that this formulation was more specific and gave recognition to national law and practice so that, in the case of cross-border employment, States in which the work was carried out could take appropriate action if adequate protection was not provided. The Government member of South Africa supported the Worker members' proposal, noting that often the worst abuses occur between subcontractors and workers. The Government member of Finland stated that his Government could support neither the original amendment nor any of the subamendments thereto. A similar view was expressed by the Government members of Austria, Chile, Italy, Portugal and Venezuela. The Government member of Chile stressed that the main objective of the instrument was to protect all workers in the field of contract labour, and thus should not exclude a person merely because he or she has a contract of employment with a subcontractor.

88. Further support for the amendment as subamended by the Employer members, in the light of the introduction of the further subamendment of the Worker members, was expressed by the Government members of France, Germany and the United States. The Government member of France stressed the need for clarity regarding the scope of the instrument, so that it would be understood that the objective of the instrument was to protect those in irregular employment situations and not those already benefiting from the protection of a contract of employment. He stated that to include workers covered by contracts of employment would create a third category. Though not taking a position on the various proposals before the Committee, the Government member of Cyprus suggested that providing overlapping protection for workers was preferable to risking excluding certain workers in need of protection.

89. The subamendment proposed by the Government member of Switzerland and that proposed by the Worker members were voted in opposition to each other before a formal vote was taken, since the two proposals were mutually exclusive. As a result of the affirmative vote on which of the two was preferred as a basis for a decision, the Worker members' amendment to the Employer members' subamendment was put forward for a formal vote. On the formal vote, the Worker members' proposal received 14,364 votes in favour, 13,965 against, and 2,394 abstentions (the quorum was 15,321). At the request of the Employer members, pursuant to Article 65 (7) and (8) of the Standing Orders, a record vote on the same proposal was held, the results of which were as follows: 14,630 votes in favour, 14,231 against, with 3,458 abstentions (the quorum was 15,321).[3] As a result, the amendment of the Worker members to the Employer members' subamendment was adopted.

90. Following the results of the vote, the Employer members expressed their regret that such a fundamental principle should have been decided on the slimmest possible majority, in particular with such weak support from Government members and with so many Government members absent. The Employer members recalled that when the Committee had commenced its work, they had opposed the adoption of instruments on contract labour, having foreseen various difficulties. However, they had agreed to explore the possibility of arriving at a shared understanding for future action, though they felt that it was becoming increasingly unlikely that such an understanding could be reached. The Employer members noted that the International Labour Organization functions because of the belief of its constituents in tripartism, and tripartism needed to be applied throughout the Organization, including in the functioning of Conference committees. However, the Employers' group felt that they had not witnessed genuine tripartism in this Committee, noting that repeatedly about 50 per cent of Governments that had sought representation in the Committee failed to take a position in the voting on key points by being absent and about 50 per cent of the remainder abstaining. The points were therefore being determined by a small number of Governments and by small majorities. Instruments based on such a process could not be considered consensus-based and would have limited prospects for ratification and effective implementation. Instead of tripartism, the Employers' group felt that the process had become one of bipartism, to the exclusion of the Employer members whose proposals were consistently being voted down. They expressed disappointment that, since governments were also employers and were increasingly contracting out for the provision of services, the Governments had not recognized the significance of the points the Employer members were putting forward. The Employers' members concluded by underlining that their group's position was becoming increasingly difficult.

91. The discussion on Point 6 then recommenced with the introduction of an amendment by the Worker members to delete the second sentence of Point 6 excluding employees of private employment agencies from the scope of the Convention. The Worker members quoted from Report VI(1) to illustrate that temporary work agencies should be considered as a specific type of contract labour requiring protection and regulation. While agreeing with the Office report that it was necessary to prevent as far as possible any contradiction between the revision of Convention No. 96 and a possible instrument on contract labour, the Worker members saw this as part of the normal process of avoiding contradictions between any ILO instruments. Overlapping coverage of instruments was not a concern, since often groups of workers are covered by a number of Conventions. They stressed that the purpose of the revision of Convention No. 96 was to deal with the organization of the labour market and the division of labour between public and private employment agencies, whereas the proposed instruments on contract labour had as their objective the protection of individual workers. If a country did not ratify both the Convention revising Convention No. 96 and an eventual contract labour Convention, a situation could result, should the Worker members' amendment not be adopted, where a member State would have to provide protection to all contract workers, except those employed by private employment agencies. They concluded by stating that, when dealing with private employment agencies, a triangular relationship was at issue in which the worker needed protection vis-à-vis not only the legal employer but also the user enterprise.

[3] The Employer members requested that the details of the record vote with respect to the Government members be included in the report. The results of the vote were as follows:

For: Austria, Belgium, Belize, Finland, Greece, India, Italy, Malaysia, Malta, Portugal, South Africa, Syrian Arab Republic, Trinidad and Tobago, Zimbabwe.

Against: Australia, Botswana, France, Gabon, Germany, Ireland, Japan, Kuwait, New Zealand, Qatar, United Kingdom.

Abstentions: Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Ecuador, Indonesia, Korea (Republic of), Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Morocco, Namibia, Netherlands, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Poland, Russian Federation, Saudi Arabia, Seychelles, Slovakia, Sweden, Switzerland, United States.

Absent: Algeria, Argentina, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Benin, Bolivia, Cameroon, Côte d'Ivoire, Egypt, El Salvador, Gambia, Guinea, Hungary, Iran (Islamic Republic of), Israel, Jamaica, Kenya, Lebanon, Lesotho, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malawi, Mali, Mauritius, Mexico, Mongolia, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Romania, Spain, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Tanzania (United Republic of), Thailand, Tunisia, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, Uruguay, Venezuela.

92. The Employer members strongly opposed the amendment, emphasizing that the Office text referred to employees of private employment agencies, and noted that their group's comments on the previous amendment were also relevant in this regard. Their group considered it inappropriate to suggest that employees of private employment agencies should be treated as quasi-employees of the user enterprise, and objected to the interference this would entail with commercial and employment relationships. They drew attention to the proposed text of the revision of Convention No. 96 which provides protection for workers, including with respect to personal data, freedom of association, collective bargaining and training. The workers covered under Convention No. 96 would enjoy the contractual protection of their employment status and statutory protection, apart from any special protection afforded due to the Convention; therefore, it would be counterproductive and inappropriate, according to the Employer members, to include them within the scope of an instrument on contract labour. A number of Government members, including the Government members of Australia, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Germany, Japan, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Spain, Switzerland and the United States, also opposed the Worker members' amendment.

93. Support for the Worker members' amendment was manifested by the Government member of Italy who cautioned that since the final text of the revision to Convention No. 96 was not yet known, private employment agencies should not be dealt with in the context of the Committee on Contract Labour. She expressed a further concern that the Office text seemed to create a third category which needed to be avoided. The Government member of Austria also spoke in favour of the amendment on the ground that the two proposed Conventions at issue had different objectives: the revision to Convention No. 96 concerned licensing, while contract labour focused on protection. An indicative vote was held on the Worker members' amendment to Point 6, as a result of which the Worker members withdrew their amendment.

94. The final amendment to Point 6 was presented by the Government member of Japan, to add the words "homeworkers or" after the words "should not apply to". He explained that pursuant to the definition of "contract labour" adopted by the Committee in Point 5, homeworkers would be included. Given that the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177), and Recommendation, 1996 (No. 184), specifically address the problems of these workers, his Government believed it was appropriate to exclude them from the scope of the proposed Convention on contract labour. The amendment was seconded by the Government member of Austria, speaking on behalf of the Government members of France, Germany and Ireland, and subamended to read: "homeworkers, as defined in the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177) or". The Government member of Japan supported the subamendment as did the Government member of Hungary. Although the Employer members had some difficulties with the definition in Convention No. 177, they were prepared to support the amendment as subamended. The Worker members, however, were not in favour of the amendment as subamended since it could deny protection to a large number of homeworkers due to disguised and triangular relationships. The Worker members drew attention to Point 7(a) of the Proposed Conclusions, allowing workers to be excluded from the application of the Convention where they otherwise enjoy adequate protection, which could be relied upon to ensure the two Conventions were not applied in a contradictory manner. The Government members of Cyprus, Italy and Papua New Guinea also voiced their opposition to the amendment as subamended.

95. An indicative vote of the Government members was taken on the amendment of the Government member of Japan as subamended by the Government members of Austria, France, Germany and Ireland, evidencing that a majority of Government members opposed the proposal. At the request of the Employer members, this was followed by a formal vote, the results of which were as follows: 14,326 votes in favour, 15,428 against, with 1,463 abstentions (the quorum was 15,321). The amendment to Point 6 of the Government member of Japan, as subamended by the Government members of Austria, France, Germany and Ireland, was therefore not adopted. As no further amendments to Point 6 had been proposed, Point 6 was adopted as amended earlier.

96. After withdrawing their amendment proposing the deletion of Point 7, the Employer members introduced an amendment to delete the words in clause (a) "who otherwise enjoy adequate protection". The Employer members stated that the intent of Point 7 was to allow the competent authorities to exclude particular categories of contract workers, but the Office text strictly circumscribed this authority. The amendment sought to expand that authority, since there may be many valid reasons for wanting such exclusions, and it also avoided the problem of determining what constitutes "adequate protection". The Employer members noted that there was no reference to these words in the analysis to the questionnaires contained in Report VI(2). The Worker members opposed the amendment, asserting that it would permit a State to ratify the Convention and then evade implementation. They also contended that the original Office text was couched in standard language that should continue to be applied.

97. The Government member of Germany requested clarification from the secretariat of the Committee as to whether the exclusion would extend to contract workers who were economically dependent on the user enterprise, though not personally dependent. The representative of the Secretary-General replied that the Proposed Conclusions did not use the words "economically dependent", but referred to dependency in general. If "economically dependent" workers were covered as contract workers, it would be for national law and practice to determine whether they enjoyed adequate protection.

98. A number of Government members spoke against the proposed amendment, including the Government members of South Africa, Spain, Switzerland and Venezuela. In the opinion of the Government member of South Africa, the amendment left a void regarding what type of workers could be excluded and similarly the Government member of Spain argued that limitations on the exclusions were necessary. In the light of the indicative vote of Government members on the Employer members' amendment, the amendment was withdrawn.

99. An amendment to delete clause (b) of Point 7 was then proposed by the Worker members. The Worker members presented the amendment since they objected to member States being able to ratify the Convention and then exclude workers without considering the actual situation of those workers. They contended that the formulation in Point 7(b) could only be found in a few Conventions, and it was not appropriate to include it in a Convention seeking to protect workers who are so often excluded. The Employer members opposed the amendment since they viewed it as an unprecedented restriction. They considered that the formulation was common to Conventions and was particularly appropriate in the context of the proposed Convention. The Government members of Australia, Cyprus, South Africa, Sweden and the United States supported the flexibility inherent in the Office text, and therefore could not support the amendment. The Worker members withdrew their amendment.

100. Moving on to the final amendment submitted to Point 7, the Worker members proposed the addition of the words "only if the workers concerned otherwise enjoy adequate protection" to the end of clause (b), stating that the criteria in clause (a) was also appropriate for (b). The Employer members strongly opposed the amendment on the grounds that it deviated from standard terminology appearing in a number of Conventions and it would restrict considerably the discretion of member States. Finally, the logic of the amendment was queried by the Employer members, since ratifying States would in any event be required under Point 8 to specify the reasons for any exclusions, which would be scrutinized by the ILO's supervisory bodies. The Government member of Cyprus opposed the amendment, for the reasons presented by the Employer members. Following an indicative vote of the Government members on the amendment proposed by the Worker members to Point 7, the Worker members withdrew their amendment. As a result, Point 7 was adopted by the Committee without change.

101. The Employer members withdrew their amendment proposing to delete Point 8. The Worker members then introduced their amendment to delete the word "therefor" and replace it with "why this exclusion was or is still judged necessary". The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that the amendment was intended to impose more clearly an obligation to justify exclusions. He noted that the amendment adopted the wording found in the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175). The Employer members opposed the amendment, stating that it varied from the standard terminology used in ILO Conventions, with no purpose being served by this deviation. The Government member of Switzerland indicated that her Government was not in favour of the amendment since it raised problems of logic and its usefulness was not apparent. The Government members of Australia, Norway, Poland and the United States opposed the amendment for the reasons expressed by the Government member of Switzerland. The Government member of Chile spoke in favour of the amendment since his Government viewed it as expressing with greater clarity something that was implicit in the Office text. In the opinion of the Government member of South Africa, supported by the Government member of Italy, the amendment raised a question of drafting that was perhaps best left to the Drafting Committee. In view of the lack of support of Government members evidenced through an indicative vote, the Worker members withdrew their amendment.

102. The Worker members introduced a further amendment to Point 8 to add at the end of the sentence the words "and specify the way in which adequate protection is otherwise provided as is meant under Point 7", explaining that the addition was necessary since the meaning of the term "adequate protection" was not defined in the proposed instruments. The inclusion of such a requirement would also, in their view, facilitate discussions of the social partners at the national level regarding the exclusions that would be appropriate in the national context. This amendment was opposed by the Employer members because the addition was undesirable and unnecessary, since the proposed instrument would already obligate a ratifying State to give reasons for any exclusion. In response to a query raised by the Government member of Italy, a member of the Committee secretariat explained that, since Point 7 had already been adopted, exclusions would only be permitted after consultation with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations. The member State ratifying the Convention would have an obligation to report, and the issue of whether "adequate protection" had otherwise been provided would be examined by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations in the course of the reporting procedure. The Government member of South Africa, while agreeing with the sentiments motivating the Worker members' amendment, said that her Government could not support it, since the ILO supervisory machinery was sufficient to meet the concerns addressed in the amendment. Similar reasoning in opposition to the amendment was given by the Government members of Cyprus, Italy, Switzerland and the United States. In the light of the explanations given, the Worker members withdrew their amendment. Point 8 was, therefore, adopted without change.

V. Content of the proposed Convention

103. The first amendment to Point 9 proposed the rearrangement of the first line as follows: "The Member should ensure that: (1)...", which the Worker members stated was intended to clarify the text, particularly in the light of amendments they would be proposing to the subsequent paragraphs of the Point. The Worker and Employer members agreed that this was a drafting point that could be dealt with by the Drafting Committee in the light of the adoption of any subsequent amendments. The amendment was, therefore, withdrawn on this understanding.

104. The Employer members then presented an amendment to Point 9(1) to delete the words following "the health of contract workers" and replace them with "workers arising out of their work", explaining that it was intended to broaden the scope of application of the provision, while also simplifying the text. The Worker members characterized the amendment as an attempt to limit the scope of Point 9(1), and therefore were opposed to its adoption. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union with the exception of Spain, stated that with respect to the first part of the amendment, as the proposed instrument concerned contract workers, it would be preferable to retain the reference to them in paragraph (1) of Point 9. Regarding the deletion of the reference to "linked with or occurring in the course of", the Governments he represented believed that the Office text was more precise and thus should be retained. The Government members of China, Cyprus and the United States were also of the view that the reference to "contract workers" was more appropriate given the subject and objectives of the proposed Convention. The Government member of Cyprus asked the secretariat to advise the Committee as to whether the phrase "arising out of, linked with or occurring in the course of", as found in the Office version of Point 9(1), was standard terminology in ILO Conventions. A member of the secretariat informed the Committee that the same wording could be found in Article 4(2) of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). As Convention No. 155 could be considered a key Convention on health and safety, the Government member of Cyprus was of the view that it would be appropriate to adopt the same wording in Point 9. Given the lack of support for their amendment, the Employer members withdrew it.

105. In order to assist the Committee in the discussion of the numerous remaining amendments that had been proposed to Point 9, the Worker members asked the secretariat whether there was any jurisprudence concerning the interpretation of the word "adequate". They also requested clarification regarding the effects of the different formulations used in the three paragraphs of Point 9 ("should ensure", "should be taken to provide" and "should be taken to ensure"). On the first question, a member of the secretariat stated that one could not generalize regarding the meaning of the word "adequate" in a text without considering the specific objective being sought in the substantive provisions of the instrument. In ILO Conventions, she explained, the terms "adequate" and "appropriate" are often used interchangeably. Responding to the second question, the deputy-representative of the Secretary-General acknowledged that there were important differences between the phrases used in the three paragraphs, with paragraphs (2) and (3) referring to the need for measures to be taken but without specifying by whom, while paragraph (1) clearly places the direct responsibility for action on the Member. These paragraphs should be read together with Point 4 on means of application, she noted. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled that a reference to "adequate" was found in the text of Point 3 as adopted by the Committee, and repeated his earlier remark that the varying degree of dependency arising out of the use of "adequate", to which the Office referred in Report VI(2), was undesirable and would be impossible to implement.

106. Returning to the consideration of the amendments before it, the Committee called on the Government member of Canada to introduce his amendment to add the words "in so far as is reasonably practicable" after the word "ensure" in Point 9(1), at which point he immediately withdrew the amendment. Discussion of the Employer members' amendment to insert the words "in accordance with national law and practice" after "measures" then commenced. The Employer members informed the Committee that this amendment reflected their group's desire to ensure proper account would be taken of national law and practice, as had been done in paragraphs (2) and (3) of the Office text. The Worker members were opposed to the amendment, being of the view that it would weaken the obligations imposed by the Office text by implying acceptance of existing law and practice rather than requiring the adoption and adaption of laws where necessary.

107. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, offered support for the Employer members' amendment due to the flexibility that it would incorporate into the provision. The Government members of Hungary and Italy also spoke in favour of the amendment. Although the Government member of Cyprus agreed with the objective of the amendment, she queried whether this objective had already been achieved through the adoption of Point 4. The deputy-representative of the Secretary-General advised that it was for the Committee to decide whether, in the light of the adoption of Point 4, it was still necessary to make reference to national law and practice in the subsequent provisions of the text. The Government member of Papua New Guinea rejected the amendment on the ground that the word "adequate" in Point 9(1) already provided sufficient flexibility. The Government member of Senegal also spoke against the amendment, on the ground that domestic law was often inadequate. The Government member of Switzerland considered that, as a result of the amendment, the text would apply to situations where appropriate legislation existed but was not being adequately applied. Put to an indicative vote of Government members, support for the amendment was evidenced. As the Worker members continued to express their strong opposition to the amendment, a formal vote was taken, the results of which were as follows: 328,984 votes in favour, 263,671 against, with 4,838 abstentions (the quorum was 278,668). The amendment of the Employer members to Point 9(1) was, therefore, adopted.

108. An amendment to Point 9(1) was proposed by the Worker members to include the words "inform and train contract workers on health and safety hazards and" after the phrase "adequate measures are taken to". In presenting the amendment, the Worker members observed that contract workers were more likely to be involved in workplace accidents, often as a result of the user enterprise neglecting to provide them with the necessary information and training. They pointed out that while there were many health and safety issues that could be addressed, information and training were fundamental in the context of the specific problems facing contract workers. The Employer members opposed the amendment, pointing out that the reference to "adequate protection" already found in the text would encompass information and training where necessary. To mandate information and training in all instances, as they understood the amendment, would not be appropriate since such measures would not always be necessary. They disputed the claim of the Worker members that contract workers are particularly vulnerable to workplace accidents, asserting that there was no clear evidence to support this assertion. They suggested that in any event such detail as proposed in the amendment would be more appropriately placed in a Recommendation than a Convention. This latter suggestion was endorsed by the Government members of Gabon and Switzerland.

109. A number of Government members, including from Canada, Gabon, Hungary, Italy and South Africa, opposed the Worker members' amendment since it did not seem appropriate to select information and training from the extensive list of protections that could be provided, and that were already dealt with in detail in other international labour standards. The Government member of the Netherlands remarked that, while there was some sympathy among the Member States of the European Union for the amendment in so far as it mandated providing information, they had reservations regarding the practicality of including the obligation to train contract workers, since often contract workers worked for very short periods with one enterprise. The Government member of Austria expanded upon this point, emphasizing that appropriate instruction could be provided but difficulties would often arise in attempting to provide training. The Government member of Italy suggested that the word "instruction" might be more appropriate than "training". The issue of training was also raised by the Government member of Venezuela, in the context of the Spanish translation of the term. She noted that both the term "capacitación" and "formación" had been used in translating the amendment, the latter in her view indicating a lengthy, in-depth training process, whereas "capacitación" referred to training for a particular task. A member of the secretariat explained that, in the ILO, the two terms tended to be used interchangeably.

110. In response to some of the concerns raised regarding their proposed amendment, the Worker members tabled a subamendment, which would result in Point 9(1) reading as follows: "The Member should ensure that adequate measures, including information and training where necessary, in accordance with national law and practice, are taken to prevent accidents and injury to the health of contract workers arising out of, linked with or occurring in the course of contract labour." The Worker members emphasized that even workers working for only a few days needed to be trained if placed in a potentially dangerous situation. On the question of training, they noted that the type of training required, whether lengthy training or specific instruction, would depend on the circumstances. The Employer members rejected the subamendment, as in their view the primary obligation should be to provide a safe workplace; it was not constructive to imply that the workplace could be unsafe as long as information and training were provided. The Government member of Senegal registered her Government's support for the subamendment. The amendment of the Worker members, as subamended by them, was defeated on a vote, the results of which were as follows: with a quorum of 278,668, 258,833 votes were cast in favour, 307,213 against, and there were 16,933 abstentions. As there were no more amendments proposed, paragraph 1 of Point 9 was adopted, as earlier amended.

111. The Committee then considered the amendments proposed to paragraphs (2) and then (3) of Point 9. The Employer members withdrew three amendments: (i) to delete the word "contract" in Point 9(2)(a); (ii) to delete the word "such" in Point 9(2)(b); and (iii) to delete the word "contract" in the second line of Point

9(3) and replace "contract labour" by "their work" in the third line. As a result, Points 9(2) and 9(3) were adopted by the Committee without change.

112. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Spain and Sweden proposed an amendment to add a new paragraph to Point 9, providing as follows: (4) Measures should be taken in accordance with national law and practice to ensure that the user enterprise or, as the case may be, the subcontractor or the intermediary, is made responsible for fulfilling the financial obligations envisaged in Point 9(2)." On behalf of the authors of the amendment, the Government member of Austria explained that the amendment was aimed at ensuring that responsibility for financial obligations was clearly allocated, particularly in the case of triangular relationships. The Employer members vigorously opposed the amendment, contending that it would cut across employment relationships and contractual arrangements, thus creating confusion and discouraging the use of contract labour. They reminded the Committee that it had already adopted Point 9(2), which, in the view of the Employer members, rendered the amendment redundant. The Worker members expressed their group's support for the amendment on the basis that it addressed triangular relationships; this reasoning was supported by the Government member of Algeria.

113. While understanding the concern motivating the amendment, the Government member of Hungary stated that it was too specific, thus he proposed the following subamendment: "Measures should be taken to ensure that responsibilities for fulfilling the financial obligations envisaged in Point 9(2) are clearly determined in accordance with national law and practice." The Government member of Denmark seconded the subamendment and the Government members of Austria (on behalf of the authors of the original amendment), China, the Netherlands and the United States supported the subamendment. The Employer members indicated that although the subamendment seemed to set out obligations already contained in Point 9(2), they would support it if the Committee was in favour of its adoption. The Government members of Cyprus and Switzerland believed that the amendment as subamended was not necessary, since Point 9(2) was sufficient; they would, therefore, not support the subamendment. Put to a vote, the amendment of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Finland, France, Spain and Sweden, as subamended by the Government member of Hungary, was adopted. The results of the vote were as follows: 333,822 votes cast in favour, 2,419 against and 250,059 abstentions (the quorum was 278,668). Point 9 as a whole was adopted with four paragraphs, as amended.

New point proposed

114. The Worker members put before the Committee two amendments to add a new point after Point 9. They withdrew the first, which would have added "Member States should take adequate measures to ensure that contract workers are accorded equal rights under law with workers with a recognized employment relationship," in favour of their subsequent proposal. They then presented their amendment to add a new point following Point 9 that would read as follows: "Member States should promote equality of treatment between contract workers and workers with a recognized employment relationship, taking into account the conditions applicable to other workers performing work which is essentially similar, under similar conditions." The Worker Vice-Chairperson raised his group's concern that the Office text in introducing the concept of "adequate protection" did not provide sufficient guidance as to the level of protection to be afforded. He emphasized that the Worker members had withdrawn their previous amendment in favour of the more general formulation found in this amendment, requiring only that a goal be set and giving the member States considerable flexibility in implementing an equality policy. He drew the Committee's attention to the fact that references to protection against discrimination and promoting equality of treatment could be found in the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175), and the Home Work Convention, 1996 (No. 177).

115. The Employer members contested the logic of the amendment and the intention behind it. They were of the view that it would be impossible to implement as it cut across all contractual and employment relationships, allowing virtually any contract worker anywhere to claim comparable treatment with virtually anyone else. Regarding the reference to the Part-Time Work Convention, 1994 (No. 175), the Employer Vice-Chairperson emphasized that it was not an appropriate example since two groups of workers both having a clear employment relationship were being compared pursuant to that Convention. He noted that, although his group did not agree with the Office text, they acknowledged that the language in Points 9 and 10 had been carefully selected. The Government member of Hungary could not support the amendment, agreeing that it was too broad and stating that such flexibility was not appropriate in a Convention of this nature. The Government member of Finland's opposition was based on the view that since the instrument was addressing complicated triangular relationships, it was essential that the rights of workers and obligations of employers be stated in clear terms. His views were supported by the Government members of Germany and Sweden. The Government member of the Netherlands noted that, while some Member States of the European Union had sympathy with the Worker members' amendment, they had some concern regarding with whom contract workers would be compared for the purposes of equality of treatment. Similar sentiments were expressed by the Government member of Cyprus. The Government member of Canada contended that it was unclear what the obligations on a State would be under the terms of the amendment, therefore, his Government could not support it. The Government member of Austria indicated her Government's support for the amendment since the use of the word "promote" offered member States considerable flexibility in implementing the provision.

116. In the light of the various comments, the Worker members proposed the following subamendment to their amendment: "Member States should promote equality of treatment between contract workers and employees of the user enterprise or, as the case may be, with employees of the subcontractor or the intermediary, for performing work which is essentially similar, under similar conditions and requiring similar qualifications." The Worker Vice-Chairperson pointed out that much of the text was taken from Point 18 of the proposed Recommendation. The Employer members strongly opposed the amendment as subamended, asserting that it was too broad and would undermine the protections provided in Point 10.

117. The Government member of South Africa commented that the term "promote" was not sufficiently strong for a Convention of this nature, and she suggested that the Committee might want to consider the term "ensure" instead, as found in Point 18. While viewing "ensure" as too strong to be acceptable, the Government member of Hungary agreed that the word "promote" was not appropriate for this type of Convention, as compliance would be difficult to assess. This view was supported by the Government member of Switzerland. The Government members of Cyprus, Italy and the United States expressed their preference for having the matter dealt with in the Recommendation. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, Portugal and the United Kingdom, expressed support for the original amendment as opposed to the subamendment. In the view of the Government member of South Africa, the whole of Point 18 should have been transferred to the Convention, as it would have avoided the creation of a third category of workers.

118. In response to questions raised by the Worker members, the deputy-representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that because the Committee was involved in a first discussion on the proposed instruments, the term "should" was used in the text; however, once Conclusions are adopted by the Committee, the term "should" will become "shall" for the purposes of the discussion next year. Responding to a further question from the Worker members, a member of the Committee secretariat noted that a reference to "promote" is found in Article 2 of the Discrimination (Occupation and Employment) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). The Employer Vice-Chairperson stressed that the Committee was not dealing with a promotional Convention. He also asserted that a third category of worker could not be eliminated by saying they should be treated the same as employees.

119. Having heard the views of the Committee regarding their subamendment, the Worker members withdrew it in favour of the original amendment and a vote on that amendment was held. The results of the vote were as follows: 292,699 in favour, 48,380 against, 7,257 abstentions, with a quorum of 278,668. The Employer members had not taken part in the vote. Immediately following the announcement of the results of the vote, the Employer members called for a record vote on the Worker members' amendment. Before the results of the record vote were announced, but after voting had concluded, the Government member of Colombia requested that he be permitted to vote. The Chairperson ruled that this would not be possible as the voting had concluded. The Government member of Colombia asked that his objection to this decision be noted. The Worker members' amendment was adopted on the basis of the record vote. The results of the record vote were as follows: 302,375 votes cast in favour, 53,218 against, with 19,352 abstentions. The quorum was 278,668.[4] As a result,

[4] The Employer members requested that the details of the record vote with respect to the Government members be included in the report. The results of the vote were as follows:

For: Algeria, Austria, Belgium, Belize, Botswana, Côte d'Ivoire, Denmark, India, Ireland, Italy, Lesotho, Luxembourg, Mali, Malta, Mauritius, Namibia, Netherlands, Philippines, Portugal, Romania, Slovakia, South Africa, Spain, Suriname, Syrian Arab Republic, Trinidad and Tobago, Uganda, United Kingdom, Venezuela.

Against: Australia, Brazil, Canada, Finland, Germany, Hungary, Japan, Korea (Republic of), Kuwait, Mexico, New Zealand, Norway, Papua New Guinea, Poland, Russian Federation, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Switzerland, United States, Uruguay, Zimbabwe.

Abstentions: China, Ecuador, France, Greece, Malaysia, Morocco, Sri Lanka, Thailand.

Absent: Argentina, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Benin, Bolivia, Cameroon, Chile, Colombia, Czech Republic, Egypt, El Salvador, Gabon, Gambia, Guinea, Indonesia, Iran (Islamic Republic of), the new point following Point 9 was adopted, as amended. The Employer members had not taken part in the vote.

120. The Employer members wanted it to be on record that they had not voted because they refused to take part in a vote on, what they characterized as, "a proposition of such monumental foolishness." The Worker members acknowledged that the divided vote indicated that perhaps a sufficient formulation had not yet been reached, though there was some consensus for the inclusion of equality of treatment, suggesting this matter be revisited during the second discussion. The Government member of Hungary, on behalf of the Government members of Australia, India, Norway, South Africa and Switzerland, expressed disappointment at the fact that confrontation seemed to have taken precedence over consensus, the result of which would be to diminish the ratification prospects of any eventual Convention, which would be the basis upon which the Committee's work would be judged; therefore, they urged the Committee members to work together to find acceptable solutions. The Chairperson also appealed to the Committee members to conduct the meetings in the spirit of tripartism based on mutual trust and understanding. The Employer members agreed that the success of the Committee's work would be measured by the number of ratifications any eventual Convention would receive, and considered that the Committee was working toward an unratifiable instrument. They urged the Committee members to take into account economic and employment considerations. The Worker members agreed to try to seek consensus wherever possible.

121. The amendments proposed to Point 10 were then addressed. The Worker members began by withdrawing a number of amendments to this Point. The first amendment had sought to replace the introductory phrase with "Measures should be taken to ensure that contract workers receive the same level of protection as employees of the user enterprise or, as the case may be, as employees of the subcontractor with regard to:", and then to add three new clauses as follows: "(f) occupational health and safety; (g) remuneration; and (h) statutory social security". A further proposal had been made to delete the words "as appropriate" from the first sentence. A series of amendments to Point 10 seeking to add new clauses after clause (e), consisting of "occupational health and safety", "remuneration", "statutory social security", "termination of employment", "professional and vocational training" and "annual leave, sick leave and parental leave", were also withdrawn by the Worker members. A further amendment was withdrawn by the Worker members which would have added a new point after Point 10 as follows: "Member States should, in accordance with national law and practice, allocate responsibility between the subcontractor (or the intermediary as the case may be) and the user enterprise for fulfilling obligations toward contract workers". Another amendment to add a new point after Point 10 was also withdrawn, providing that "Member States should ensure that contract workers are not made available to a user enterprise to replace workers of that enterprise who are exercising their right to strike". The Government member of South Africa also withdrew her amendment to add a new clause (f) as follows: "security of employment".

122. The Worker Vice-Chairperson then introduced their remaining amendment to reword Point 10 as follows:

(1) Measures should be taken to ensure that contract workers receive the same protection as employees of the user enterprise or, as the case may be, as employees of the subcontractor with regard to:

(a) the right to organize and the right to bargain collectively;
(b) freedom from discrimination in employment and occupation on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin;
(c) minimum age.

(2) Measures should be taken to ensure that contract workers enjoy adequate protection as regards:

(a) working time and other working conditions;
(b) maternity protection;
(c) occupational health and safety;
(d) remuneration;
(e) statutory social security.

123. The Worker Vice-Chairperson explained that the aim of the amendment was to distinguish fundamental rights embodied in core standards from other issues. He emphasized that when dealing with fundamental rights, the qualifying phrase "as appropriate" was not suitable, since these rights are always appropriate; also where these rights were at issue "adequate protection" was not sufficient, as the same protection should be provided to all workers. The Employer members sympathized with the desire to differentiate between these specific rights and other protections. However, they had a difficulty with the amendment in its reference to employees of user enterprises and subcontractors since, where fundamental rights are at issue, they should be extended fully to all categories of workers, and not measured against that provided to other categories of workers. There was also in their view a problem of repetition caused by the amendment, in particular regarding health and safety and social security which were dealt with in other provisions of the instrument. The use of the word "remuneration" also caused them concern, noting that a different term was used in paragraph (2) of Point 9, namely "the payment of amounts due". They were also concerned about the vagueness of the formulation "working time and other working conditions", since "other working conditions" could apply to almost anything. While acknowledging that working time was a special category that should apply to all workers, this in their view could not be said of other conditions.

124. On behalf of the Member States of the European Union, with the exception of the United Kingdom, the Government member of the Netherlands expressed support for the intention motivating the Worker members' amendment, but found the wording problematic. To address their concerns, they proposed a subamendment to make two alterations to the Worker members' amendment: first, to replace the words after "same protection" in paragraph (1) of the amendment to "workers with a recognized employment relationship with regard to ...". This part of the subamendment was proposed in the light of the fact that where fundamental rights are concerned, there is no need to speak in terms of comparability, as the Employer members had stated. Second, they proposed inserting the words "as appropriate" after the phrase "Measures should be taken" in the second paragraph. The Government member of the United Kingdom informed the Committee that although the amendment and the subamendment had much to recommend them as they represented helpful contributions to the debate on this issue, he would abstain from any vote on this matter. He explained that his Government was committed to providing a fair balance between the rights and responsibilities of employers and workers in the workplace, and intended to undertake consultations later in the year on a range of proposals with regard to fairness at work. Pending the outcome of that consultation process, his Government was unable to take a position on the issues raised in the amendment and the subamendment.

125. Support for the subamendment was voiced by the Worker members and the Government member of Norway. The Employer members also gave their support to the subamendment, though they continued to have reservations regarding the use of the term "other working conditions" in Point 10(2)(a) of the text as subamended. The Government member of Cyprus raised a concern similar to that raised by the Employer members regarding the lack of complementarity between Points 9 and 10, and recommended that the interrelation of the two provisions be carefully examined in the second discussion on contract labour. The Employer members agreed that the reservations they had raised would need to be re-examined in the context of the overall text adopted. The amendment of the Worker members, as subamended by the Member States of the European Union, with the exception of the United Kingdom, was declared adopted by consensus.

126. In the light of the consensus reached regarding the subamendment to the Worker members' amendment, a number of Committee members withdrew all further amendments to Point 10. The Employer members' initial proposal to delete the words "and other working conditions" in paragraph (d) was withdrawn, along with their amendment to replace the introductory phrase in Point 10 with "The Member should also ensure that measures are taken, where appropriate, to provide adequate protection in accordance with national law and practice as regards:". In addition, the Government member of Canada withdrew two amendments, the first to add the words "or other grounds of discrimination addressed in national law and practice" after the words "social origin", and the second to add a new clause (f): "notice of termination". The Government member of the United States withdrew his proposal to add at the end of clause (b) the words "age, or physical or mental disability.", but indicated that he would seriously consider reintroducing it during the second discussion. The amendments submitted by the Government members of Germany and Denmark to replace clause 10(d) with "working time and working conditions, or give the possibility to conclude collective agreements on these matters, provided by national law.", and to replace clause 10(e) with "(e) maternity protection or give the possibility to conclude collective agreements on this matter, provided by national law.", were similarly withdrawn but again on the basis that they could be revisited in the next discussion. As there were no outstanding amendments to Point 10, it was adopted as amended.

127. The Worker members withdrew all their amendments to Point 11, including to add the words "or with the effect of" after "for the purpose of"; to add "or collective agreements and collective bargaining arrangements" at the end of the sentence; to add a new point after Point 11 to read "Member States shall prohibit contract labour where it is not possible to otherwise provide adequate protection to workers"; and to add another new point to read "Members should take measures to ensure that contract labour is not used to replace regular employees". The Government member of Canada also withdrew his amendment to replace the words "to ensure that contract labour is not used" by "to discourage the use of contract labour". As a result of these withdrawals, only one proposed amendment to Point 11 remained for consideration, and it was duly introduced by the Government member of Australia. His amendment sought to replace the phrase following "to ensure that" by "rights or obligations under labour or social security laws and regulations are not avoided." He explained that the intention was to express Point 11 in a positive manner, in keeping with Points 9 and 10, and not to alter the substance. This amendment was seconded by the Government member of the United States and supported by the Employer members. Although the Worker members expressed a preference for the Office text, they offered to accept the amendment if the phrase "through use of contract labour" could be added at the end. The Government member of Australia agreed to this subamendment.

128. The Employer members raised a concern regarding the open-ended nature of the Office text of Point 11 since, if contract labour were used, certain obligations would accrue that would not necessarily accrue to an employee of the enterprise, and a contract worker might be compensated in alternative ways for the absence of statutory protection. As a result of the Office text, simply because contract workers did not receive statutory protection could be interpreted to mean that contract labour was being used for that purpose. They were not certain that the subamendment addressed that concern; therefore, they proposed a further subamendment to add at the end of the amendment as originally proposed the phrase "when contract labour is used". The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed some reservations regarding the reformulation proposed by the Employer members, as it could preclude resolution of the problems being targeted in Point 11; however, with the aim of achieving consensus, they agreed with the Employer members' subamendment, on the understanding that they would consider revisiting the issue in the course of the second discussion on contract labour. The Government member of Australia accepted the Employer members' subamendment to his amendment. This subamendment was also supported by the Government member of the United States and the Member States of the European Union. The Government member of Cyprus suggested that, in the context of rights and obligations, it was more appropriate to say that they should not be "denied or avoided". The Chairperson noted that this matter would be examined by the Drafting Committee. The Committee then adopted the amendment of the Government member of Australia, as subamended by the Employer members. Point 11 was then adopted as amended.

129. The Government member of Canada withdrew his amendment to add after the words "public authorities", "in accordance with national law and practice", and after the word "including", "where applicable". The Committee then went on to examine an amendment proposed by the Government members of Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, Sweden and the United Kingdom. Pursuant to the proposed amendment, Point 12 would be deleted and replaced by the following: "Effective measures appropriate to the manner in which effect is given to the provisions of this Convention shall be taken to ensure the proper administration and enforcement of regulations or provisions concerning contract labour by means of adequate inspection or otherwise." The Government member of Germany, in introducing this amendment on behalf of its authors, stated that it was designed to address their concern that Point 12 was too restrictive in limiting the supervisory function to "the competent public authorities", which he understood as meaning administrative authorities. Their text, particularly the inclusion of the words "or otherwise", was intended to expand the possibilities for ensuring protection, for example through the court system. He pointed out that the text of their amendment was in keeping with that found in Article 14 of the Holidays with Pay (Revised) Convention, 1970 (No. 132), for example. While fully supporting the comments of the Government member of Germany, the Government member of Italy wished to point out that in her country "adequate inspection" would refer to labour inspection. The Government members of Switzerland and the United States indicated their support for the amendment.

130. The Government member of Spain explained that her Government had not associated itself with the amendment, being of the view that the original Office text was clearer and more precise, and the reference to "public authorities" was broad enough to encompass all authorities competent to apply the provisions of the Convention, including courts with jurisdiction over labour matters. In addition, the Office text had the advantage of referring to labour inspection, which was a term associated with the guarantees provided in the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129). The Government members of Brazil and Uruguay also supported the original Office text, for the reasons expressed by the Government member of Spain. The Employer Vice-Chairperson queried whether labour courts should be considered part of the machinery to administer and enforce the provisions concerning contract labour. He suggested that the role of the courts was to provide a remedy when measures taken to give effect to the provisions were not observed. However, since Point 12 implicated governments, the Employer members would respect their wishes by supporting the amendment and withdrawing their own amendment to delete the words "public" and "including the labour inspectorate." from Point 12. The Worker members supported the amendment in the interests of flexibility and improving the ratification prospects of an eventual Convention. The Government member of Canada also added his voice in support of the amendment on the ground that it contained sufficient elements of control while also providing enough flexibility to take into account diverse national conditions. Given the extent of the consensus that prevailed regarding the amendment, the Government members of Spain and Uruguay agreed that they could also support it. The amendment proposed by the Member States of the European Union (with the exception of Spain) was, therefore, declared adopted by consensus. As a result, Point 12, as amended, was adopted.

131. As no amendments were proposed, Point 13 was adopted without change.

Point 14

132. Similarly, Point 14 was also adopted without change. As a result, the Conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention (Points 1 to 14, plus the three additional Points introduced by the Committee) were adopted as amended.

133. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, addressed some remarks to the Office for consideration in preparing the text of the Convention to be examined during the second discussion. He suggested that the text could benefit from some restructuring in the light of the amendments adopted. In particular, consideration should be given to placing the provision on equal treatment before Point 10, and Point 9 after Point 10. The Government member of Italy recalled that in other Conference committees redrafting to improve the text without altering the underlying philosophy or substance had taken place between the first and second discussions. The Employer members concurred with the view that Part V of the proposed Convention (Points 9 to 14) was in need of review, though they did not necessarily support the suggestion regarding the rearrangement of the provisions. They recalled that the proposed text prepared by the Office after this session of the Conference would be sent to the constituents for comment. The Government member of Senegal lamented that such important issues had been dealt with so quickly, allowing insufficient time to reflect on the implications. She emphasized the importance of contract labour to African workers because of its extensive use.

C. Conclusions proposed with a view to a Recommendation

I. General provision

Point 15

134. As no amendments were put forward regarding Point 15, it was adopted without change.

II. Definitions

135. At the commencement of the consideration of Point 16, a number of amendments were immediately withdrawn. First, the Government member of Austria withdrew an amendment to add a new clause (j) in paragraph (4), which read as follows: "whether the contract worker is subjected to non-competition clauses or similar restrictions on his or her professional activities". This was followed by the withdrawal of a proposed amendment to paragraph (3) by the Government member of Canada to add the words "Subject to the provisions of Point 6" to the beginning of the paragraph. The Worker members had submitted three further amendments to Point 16, all of which were withdrawn: an amendment to add a new paragraph after paragraph (2), stating: "The term 'labour subcontractor' should mean a natural or legal person who supplies workers for a user enterprise under a contractual arrangement other than a contract of employment" ; the deletion of paragraph (3) and replacement with: "the term 'intermediary' should mean any person (whether established, legitimate, solvent or not) who engages workers with no employment relationship formally established to have work performed or services provided for the benefit of, or on behalf of, or under the supervision or control of, or with the resources provided (in main or in part) by, a user enterprise;"; and replacement of the words "a single user enterprise" in paragraph (4)(g) by "a single or a few user enterprise(s);". The Employer members then proposed the deletion of Point 16 and its subsequent replacement by the following text:

> In accordance with national law and practice, procedures should be established which will allow the determination as to whether an employment relationship exists. Such procedures should be accessible and based upon objective criteria which enable the clear differentiation between commercial and employment relationships. Where an employment relationship is found to exist, the procedures should enable the identity of the employer to be determined so as to ensure the assumption by the employers of their obligations.

The Employer members withdrew this amendment, having regard to what had previously been adopted by the Committee, but informed it that they would come back to the matter in the course of the second discussion, since in their view their amendment on this Point, which also related to their concerns regarding Point 5, adopted the correct approach.

136. The Government member of the United States then introduced an amendment to replace paragraph (1) of Point 16 with the following text:

> The term "contract labour" should mean work performed for a natural or legal person (referred to as a "user enterprise") by a person (referred to as a "contract worker") under the following circumstances:
> (a) the work is done under actual conditions of the worker's dependency on or subordination to the user enterprise, where these conditions are similar to those that characterize an employment relationship under national law and practice; and either
> (b) pursuant to a direct contractual relationship between the worker and the user enterprise, the work is performed by the worker personally; or
> (c) the worker is provided for the user enterprise by a subcontractor or an intermediary.

137. The Government member of the United States explained that the purpose of the amendment was to ensure consistency between the definitions in Point 5 and in Point 16. The amendment was seconded by the Government member of Cyprus and supported by the Government members of Italy, the Netherlands (on behalf of the Member States of the European Union) and Switzerland. The Government member of Canada interjected at this stage to reiterate his Government's reservations regarding the language used in the definitions of the instruments, in particular the use in French of "sous-traitance" to describe the phenomenon under discussion. He called on the Office and the Drafting Committee to ensure that the agreed objectives of the instruments could be accurately reflected in all languages, this being of particular concern in a country such as Canada with more than one official language. The Government members of Italy and Switzerland endorsed these sentiments, stressing the need for clear definitions as a basis for future discussion. The Government member of Spain also supported the statement of the Government member of Canada, noting that the same problems arose in relation to the Spanish version of the term "subcontratación". The Employer members asserted that even in English the terms "contract labour", "subcontractor" and "subcontracting" were not appropriate but, these being questions of substance, this was not a matter for the Drafting Committee. Both the Employer members and the Worker members expressed their support for the amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States; the Committee, therefore, adopted it by consensus.

138. In view of the adoption of the previous amendment, the Employer members withdrew their amendments to delete paragraphs (2) and (3) of Point 16. The Government member of the United States also withdrew an amendment to replace the text of Point 16(3) by the text of the amendment that the Worker members had proposed under Point 5 to add a definition of "intermediary", since the Committee had already adopted a definition of this term as proposed in the Office text of Point 16(3). He then introduced an amendment to Point 16(4) to replace the introductory text of this paragraph by the following:

> in determining whether or not an employment relationship exists between a worker (including a contract worker) and an employer (user enterprise), member States should utilize the following and any additional similar criteria established by individual member States to facilitate the determination as to whether a worker is an employee and as a result covered by the protections of the Convention as well as any national laws and practice of the individual member State:

He explained that the amendment was intended to clarify that the enumerated list following the phrase was not exhaustive. The Government member of Denmark seconded the amendment. Although they expressed support for the intention of the amendment, the Employer members found it to be a complicated formulation, and suggested that it be withdrawn in favour of the amendment they were proposing. In view of the fact that the intention of his amendment was the same as the Employers' amendment, the Government member of the United States withdrew it in favour of theirs.

139. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then introduced his group's amendment to the introductory phrase of Point 16(4) to delete the words "one or more of the following criteria" and replace them with "one or more criteria, including but not limited to, the following". He acknowledged that this amendment was premised on the Committee's decision to adopt Point 5; however, it in no way indicated their acceptance of that provision. The aim of the amendment was to provide a greater degree of flexibility in considering criteria of dependency and subordination by making it clear that the list is not exhaustive, thus permitting recourse to criteria particular to the national context. The Worker members gave their support to the amendment, as did the Member States of the European Union (with the exception of Italy), and the Government members of Poland and Switzerland. The Government member of Uruguay suggested as a drafting point that the term "inter alia" could be used to indicate that the list was not exhaustive. The Government member of South Africa cautioned that criteria should not be permitted that could undermine the intention of the Convention. The amendment of the Employer members was adopted by the Committee by consensus.

140. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then introduced an amendment to delete Point 16(4)(i), which set out as a criterion of dependency or subordination "whether the user enterprise provides training to the contract workers". While recognizing the importance of training, the Employer members sought the deletion of this reference because they felt its inclusion could discourage employers from providing training since it could lead to a finding of dependency; the reference to training was also too broad in their view in that it did not distinguish between the various types and degrees of possible training. The Worker members opposed the amendment. While acknowledging that they did not wish to discourage employers from providing training, they felt that the reference to it was important and should be retained at this stage of the discussions.

141. The Government member of Gabon indicated that training related to skill development was important in determining subordination or dependency, but that did not necessarily apply to other types of training; however, this distinction was not made in the Office text. Similarly, the Government member of Papua New Guinea would have preferred a reference to training that was more tailored to the contract labour context. Since the list was indicative and not exhaustive pursuant to the previously adopted amendment, the Government member of Cyprus did not object to including a reference to training; however, her Government preferred the formulation in the subsequent Employer members' amendment suggesting that the Office text be limited to "substantial job-specific" training. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, and the Government member of South Africa endorsed the views expressed by the Government member of Cyprus. In the light of the observations of the Government members, the Employer members withdrew their amendment for deletion in favour of their amendment to add after "provides" in Point 16(4)(i) the words "substantial job-specific" since this amendment would make it clear that training that was minor in nature was not to be considered relevant in determining dependency or subordination. Further support for this amendment was voiced by the Government members of Gabon, Italy and Switzerland. The Worker members offered to support the amendment in the light of the views expressed by Government members; however, they indicated that they would consider raising the point again in the second discussion. The Employer members' amendment to Point 16(4)(i) was adopted by consensus.

142. An amendment sponsored by the Government member of the United States, seconded by the Government member of Canada, was then introduced to add three new clauses to Point 16(4):

(j) whether the worker has the ability to exercise initiative, judgement, or foresight in competition with others engaged in similar activities in order to succeed in a claimed independent activity;

(k) whether the worker is listed on the employer (user enterprise) payroll as salary or labour costs or contract fees;

(l) whether the user enterprise keeps the books and payroll for the worker.

He explained that the amendment did not intend to make the list exhaustive, but would add three criteria that had been found to be highly relevant in the United States in determining whether a worker is an employee or an independent contractor. The Government member of Senegal was of the view that, while the proposed new clauses (k) and (l) might prove useful in determining dependency or subordination, (j) did not appear to relate to dependency. The Government members of Switzerland and Cyprus shared the concern expressed by the Government member of Senegal. The Government member of the United States proposed a subamendment to his amendment, which was seconded by the Government member of Canada, to delete the phrase proposed in clause (j). The Employer members found the formulation of the amendment as subamended in need of redrafting. In their view clause (k) was superfluous in the light of Point 5 of the Conclusions adopted by the Committee; the reference to "contract fees" was not necessary since the key issue was whether the worker was on the payroll; and (l) was redundant in the light of the suggested changes in (k).

143. The Worker members also expressed concern regarding the formulation of clauses (k) and (l) in the amendment since in their view the adoption of such criteria could be used to justify disguised employment relationships. Given the amendment adopted to the introductory paragraph in Point 16(4), the range of factors relied upon in different countries did not need to be included in the text, according to the Worker members. The subamendment was also opposed by the Government members of Papua New Guinea and South Africa, in the case of the latter because the proposal did not add criteria that were useful for determining dependency. The Government member of Papua New Guinea felt that the subamendment was seeking to incorporate criteria that were too complex to be applied in many countries. The amendment, as subamended, was withdrawn by the Government member of the United States.

144. The Employer members presented an amendment to add a new clause to the list of criteria for determining dependency or subordination under Point 16(4): "(j) the intention of the parties". The Employer Vice-Chairperson stated his group's view that, though criteria vary substantially from country to country, the amendment proposed to add a criterion that could be found in many common law countries, and it was important to include in the list the major criteria used in so many countries. The Worker Vice-Chairperson, in opposing the amendment, stated that it could encourage the practice of employers requiring contract workers, who are often in a vulnerable position, to sign contracts to attest their intention to be independent, thus perpetuating disguised relationships. He went on to assert that in the context of determining dependency or subordination, objective criteria should be adopted, and not a subjective factor as proposed by the Employer members. Acknowledging that this criterion was used in common law countries, he stated that it had not been an effective criterion and had led to the very abuse that the Worker members sought to avoid.

145. Opposition to the amendment proposed by the Employer members was also voiced by the Government members of Austria, Papua New Guinea, Senegal, Spain and Switzerland. The Government member of Senegal indicated that it would be difficult to determine the intentions of the parties, while the Government member of Papua New Guinea was concerned with the extent of the responsibility that such a criterion would impose. The Government member of Italy asked the Employer members whether they meant the common intention of the parties or each party's intention. According to the Government member of Spain, and endorsed by the Government member of Switzerland, referring to the intention of the parties was a supplementary criterion in civil law applicable to contracts whose terms were themselves not sufficiently clear, but was inappropriate in the very different context of determining dependency for contract workers where one had to look at substance over form. The Government member of Austria expressed concern that contract workers could be put under pressure to sign a document stating that they were not employees, so she opposed the amendment. The reference to "intention" could be interpreted, in the view of the Government member of South Africa, to include the intention to evade labour laws; taking into account such an intention could be useful and on this ground she supported the amendment. The Employer Vice-Chairperson responded that intention to evade labour laws was not what was being referred to, rather it was the intention of the parties regarding the nature of their relationship. The Government member of Canada, in support of the amendment, expressed his understanding of the amendment to refer to the true intentions of the parties as evidenced from all the relevant facts (and not merely as stated in writing). The Employer members agreed that establishing the true intentions was a question of fact to be determined on the basis of all the evidence, documentary and otherwise. They noted that, in common law countries, threats, force or duress would void a contract. Put to a vote, the Employer members' amendment was defeated with 5,459 votes cast in favour, 6,360 against and 7,095 abstentions. The quorum was 6,105. Point 16 was then adopted as previously amended.

III. Content of the Recommendation

146. Before the amendments to Point 17 were introduced, the Government member of Germany withdrew an amendment that would have proposed deletion of the word "Appropriate" and add "as appropriate" after the words "should be taken". The Worker members' proposed amendment to add "and in the languages spoken by them" after "manner" was also withdrawn, as was the amendment of the Government member of South Africa to replace the words after "manner" by "about their remuneration (including how it will be determined), their conditions of work and other rights that may be available to them including relevant protective legislation and social security entitlements." The only remaining amendment to Point 17 was then introduced by the Employer members. This amendment sought to replace the words "their pay" by the words "amounts due to them" and replace "it" by "they". The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the phraseology that had been adopted in Point 9(2)(a) was "amounts due", and the amendment aimed to ensure consistency with the earlier text. In addition, the term "pay" was only appropriate with respect to a person with the status of an employee and to use the term in this provision could prejudge that determination. Support for the amendment was expressed by the Worker members as well as a number of Government members including Denmark, India, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States. The Employer members' amendment was, therefore, adopted by consensus. As a result, Point 17 was adopted as amended.

147. The Employer Vice-Chairperson introduced his group's amendment to delete Point 18, stating that, in the light of the new paragraph regarding equal treatment adopted by the Committee to be included in the proposed Convention, Point 18 was superfluous and, also in their view, undesirable. He noted that the text of the provision added to the Convention and the wording of Point 18 were not identical. He recalled that the purpose of a Recommendation associated with a Convention is to provide guidelines for the interpretation and application of the Convention, so having two slightly different definitions would only make interpretation more difficult and hinder ratification of the Convention. The Worker members opposed the amendment, as did the Government members of Cyprus, India and Spain. Those Government members opposing the amendment also expressed a preference for the use of the word "promote" as found in the proposed Convention over the word "ensure" as used in Point 18. The Worker Vice-Chairperson remarked that there was no contradiction between using "promote" in the Convention and "ensure" in the Recommendation. The amendment of the Employer members to delete Point 18 was put to a vote, the results of which were as follows: 5,088 votes in favour, 6,095 against, 1,325 abstentions, with a quorum of 6,105. Therefore, the amendment was not adopted. The Worker members then withdrew two amendments they had proposed to Point 18: (i) to delete the words "as appropriate"; and (ii) to delete the words "and requiring similar qualifications". Point 18 was then adopted without change.

148. The Committee turned its attention to an amendment proposed by the Employer members to delete Point 19. In the first instance, the Employer Vice-Chairperson asked the Committee secretariat for an interpretation of the word "assimilated" as used in Point 19. The Chairperson noted that the dictionary definition of the word was "to absorb" or "to cause to resemble". The representative of the Secretary-General responded that the term had been used in the text to mean "treated as", and should be read in the specific context of "for the purpose of denying rights or avoiding obligations" as appeared in the text. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that, in the view of his group, the term "assimilate" was inappropriate, as it ran counter to the concept of "adequate protection" adopted in the text, and contradicted Point 18 and the new Point the Committee had added after Point 9. The appropriate remedy for the violation of labour laws and regulations, he advocated, was not "assimilation", but rather the proper application of laws and the provision of remedies and penalties in the event they are breached.

149. The Worker members opposed the amendment on the basis that the approach reflected in Point 19 was not uncommon, and was an important means of protecting contract workers. The Government member of Canada, whose views were endorsed by the Government member of Switzerland, also preferred to retain the Office text since it established a presumption to discourage unfair practices. The Government member of India also supported the Office text, recalling that the case law in his country on this issue was well established. The Employer members, however, did not think it appropriate to include reference to a practice that was not followed in most countries. The Employer members' amendment was defeated on a vote, the results of which were as follows: 5,300 votes in favour, 6,466 against with 583 abstentions (the quorum was 6,105). The Worker members then withdrew an amendment to add the words "or with the effect" after "purpose" in the second line. The Committee adopted Point 19 without change.

150. The Employer Vice-Chairperson put forward a number of reasons in support of the Employer members' amendment to delete paragraph (1) of Point 20. Firstly, for his group the most compelling argument was that, pursuant to the Preamble adopted by the Committee, the objective of the proposed Convention is to ensure that contract workers enjoy adequate protection, and considerable protection was now provided for in the instrument. However, paragraph (1) of Point 20 in their view was incompatible with this basic objective, as it did not provide protection to contract workers; rather it sought to protect workers, other than contract workers, who were on strike. Secondly, he asserted that there was no right to strike in so far as ILO instruments are concerned. Thirdly, the enormous variation in national laws on strikes counselled against the inclusion of such a provision in the text under consideration, providing as examples the variety of provisions regarding limitations or restrictions on strike action in essential services, and on strike replacements. Finally, he stated that there were many cases in which enterprises would be justified in keeping their operations functioning in the event of a strike, for example where safety or the continued economic viability of the enterprise was jeopardized or where the strike was unjustifiable.

151. The Worker members opposed the amendment, stressing that the protection provided in Point 20(1) was essential to safeguard the right of workers in the user enterprise to freedom of association and to bargain collectively. He recalled that extensive jurisprudence recognizing and defining the right to strike had been developed, particularly by the ILO Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association. However, Point 20(1) was not only relevant with respect to protecting workers of the user enterprise, it also sought to protect contract workers since, given their vulnerable situation, they could be pressured to replace striking workers. The Worker Vice-Chairperson also reminded the Committee that this provision was found in the context of the Recommendation; therefore, it would not impose any binding obligations.

152. Further opposition to the amendment was voiced by the Government members of Belgium, Canada, Chile, France, India, Italy, Japan, Malaysia, Papua New Guinea, Peru, Poland, South Africa, Switzerland and the United Kingdom. The Government member of South Africa stated that the use of strike replacements should be avoided, otherwise a situation of high tension is created. In a similar vein, the Government member of Canada noted that the Province of Quebec had had legislation preventing the use of strikebreakers for 30 years without leading to any problems; he stated that it in fact helped to civilize labour disputes. The Government member of South Africa also noted that restrictions on strikes in essential services were embodied in the concept of the right to strike. The Government member of Belgium favoured the Office text since it was limited to situations where workers are made available by a third enterprise and does not relate to direct contracting situations. For the Government member of Poland, the basic objective of the instruments was not undermined by providing some restrictions on the use of contract labour as well as protections. The Government member of France agreed that the scope of Point 20(1) was particularly wide; however, as it was proposed in the context of a Recommendation, his Government would support the text at this stage of the discussions. He underlined the need to revisit the definitions and provisions on scope in the proposed instruments.

153. Though there was considerable opposition expressed to the complete deletion of Point 20(1), a number of Government members indicated their dissatisfaction with the wording of the Office text, including the Government members of Canada, Chile, Germany, Italy, Japan, Papua New Guinea, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States. The Government member of Japan expressed concern for the need for harmony between workers' rights and the user enterprise's right to manage. Also seeing a need for a more flexible text was the Government member of Germany. The Government member of Switzerland, while understanding the Employer members' point of view and agreeing that in some instances it was necessary to replace striking workers, also sympathized with the comments of the Government member of Canada, and suggested that a compromise could be reached in line with the text adopted by the Committee on the Revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96). In response to a question raised by the Government member of Cyprus, the representative of the Secretary-General, declared that, to his knowledge, similar provisions were not found in other ILO Conventions already in force. The Government member of Cyprus, although supporting the substance of Point 20(1), queried whether it was appropriate to include it in the proposed instrument.

154. In the light of the concerns expressed regarding their amendment and the original Office text, the Employer members put forward an alternative text for consideration in an attempt to find a consensus; however, they underlined that deletion of the provision remained their preference. The text proposed was as follows: "In accordance with national law and practice, contract workers should not be made available to a user enterprise to replace workers of that enterprise who are on strike." The Worker members expressed concern regarding the introduction of the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice", in particular since this did not appear in the text adopted by the Committee dealing with the revision of Convention No. 96 (while the rest of the relevant provisions of the proposed text were identical). They were of the view that difficulties could result by having two different texts. They requested an interpretation from the secretariat regarding the effect of including the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice". A member of the secretariat informed the Committee that the phrase does not in any way restrict the need to comply with the substantive provisions of the text, but provides considerable flexibility in the means of implementation. The Employer members agreed with the interpretation given by the secretariat. The Employer Vice-Chairperson considered that the argument that the text of the Recommendation on contract labour and the one on private employment agencies on this issue needed to be identical was not convincing, particularly since the issue being dealt with by this Committee was much wider, thus different considerations applied. In the light of the interpretation given by the secretariat, the Worker members gave their support to the reformulated text. It was also supported by the Member States of the European Union. The Government member of Germany emphasized the need to take into consideration national law and practice given the diversity of legal provisions regarding strikes. Point 20(1) as reformulated by the Employer members was then adopted by consensus.

155. The Employer members proposed an amendment to delete paragraph (2) of Point 20, which they said was the first and only reference to a prohibition of contract labour in the proposed instruments. They strongly opposed both the general thrust of such a provision as well as the specific kinds of prohibition set forth in the three clauses. The instruments dealt with the provision of protection to contract workers, which did not mean that they should not be made available by intermediaries as proposed in clause (a). Many types of work were indeed hazardous, but there were some kinds of work which were better performed by contract workers than by direct employees, because of the need for specialist skills and experience. It was the purpose of the proposed instruments to provide all the necessary protection as was humanly possible, but it would be wrong and inappropriate to call for a prohibition of contract labour in the circumstances set forth in clause (b). As to the provision in clause (c), the Employer members viewed this as a specious proposition, since such concerns were not limited to contract labour and, furthermore, governments would themselves take the necessary measures to protect national security without having to be told to do so. In opposing the amendment, the Worker Vice-Chairperson emphasized that there were many fly-by-night intermediaries unable to assume the obligations incumbent on employers. Although hazardous work was not limited to the case of contract workers, such workers were in many cases not given proper protection. He also pointed out that the provision would appear in a proposed Recommendation and that similar prohibitions could be found in other texts.

156. The Government member of Canada, endorsing the earlier remarks by the Government member of France concerning the confusion arising from a lack of precision in the provisions on scope and definitions in the Points already adopted, noted that it was often contract labour which was used in particularly dangerous work, for instance in extinguishing fires in oil wells, where there was a need for specialist skills and experience. The Government member of France, although expressing his understanding of the thrust of the amendment in that some contract labour operations required specialist skills, said that the deletion of the entire paragraph would open the door to abuses of the kind noted by the Worker members. The Government member of Cyprus also expressed reservations about the need to include at least clause (a) in the proposed Recommendation. The Government member of Australia supported the proposed amendment, believing that prohibition should be a matter to be decided by member States. The Government member of South Africa expressed support for the introductory part of paragraph (2) of Point 20, but noted that it might be useful to amend it with respect to the circumstances described in the respective clauses in the light of the debate. In reply to the remarks made by the Worker Vice-Chairperson, the Employer members regarded it as misleading and wrong to suggest that all intermediaries were fly-by-night operators and emphasized that the Committee had been adopting provisions to give protection to contract workers, including safety and health protection. As regards the deletion of the paragraph leaving the door open to possible abuses, they pointed out that the Committee was dealing with a proposed Recommendation and that the amendment would not limit a government's discretion in this respect. Following further opposition from the Worker members, the amendment was put to a vote and adopted by 5,141 votes in favour and 4,880 votes against, with 944 abstentions. The quorum was 6,105. Point 20 was adopted, as amended.

157. The Committee then moved on to consider an amendment proposed by the Employer members to add "and imminent" after "serious" in Point 21. The Employer members endorsed the intention of Point 21 to provide workers, regardless of their status, with the right to refuse to perform work posing a danger to safety and health. The amendment sought conformity with the terminology used in Article 13 of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), being the principal Convention concerning health and safety. The Worker Vice-Chairperson expressed his group's reservations regarding the proposed amendment. His group felt that a worker should be able to refuse to perform work even if the danger was not imminent, for example, in the case of exposure to radiation or asbestos; while there is a serious danger involved, harm to health is not imminent. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, opposed the amendment for the reasons put forth by the Worker members. The Government member of South Africa considered the term "serious" to be broad enough to encompass "imminent". The Government members of the United States and Uruguay favoured the Office text over the proposed amended version. The Government member of Gabon supported the amendment. The Government member of Cyprus suggested that whether "serious and imminent" or only "serious" was used would perhaps depend upon the kind of work being done by contract workers and whether general or specific terms were needed in such circumstances.

158. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the phrase "serious and imminent" was found in Article 18(1) of the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170), and in Paragraph 25(1) of the accompanying Recommendation; Article 19 of the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (No. 174) also uses the term "imminent". The deputy representative of the Secretary-General confirmed the references to "imminent" cited by the Employer Vice-Chairperson, and added that a reference to "serious danger" was found in the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176). She went on to note that "imminent" has a connotation of time, whereas "serious" relates to the nature of the risk or hazard involved. The Employer Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the use of "serious" in Convention No. 176 was specific to the nature of the particular hazards being addressed in the mining sector and since the phrase "serious and imminent" was standard terminology as used in the principal ILO Convention on safety and health (No. 155), it should be used in Point 21. The Government member of Finland commented that "imminent" refers to time with reference to two instances: (i) the exposure to the risk; and (ii) when the damage from the risk is realized. If only the latter of these was what was meant by the term as proposed by the Employer members he was not prepared to support its inclusion in the text; however, if both were encompassed, he would support it. The Employer Vice-Chairperson remarked that, though his group believed there were compelling reasons for having the text conform with the major Conventions, they would withdraw the amendment on the understanding that they would revisit the issue during the next discussion. Point 21 was then adopted without change.

159. Two proposals to add a new point following Point 21 were immediately withdrawn. The first was an amendment submitted by the Government member of South Africa, to add "National law and practice should provide that the legal obligations and responsibilities for occupational health and safety should fall upon those parties who are effectively able to safeguard the health and safety of contract workers." The second proposed amendment had been submitted by the Worker members and would have added "Member States should ensure that the competent authorities, including the labour inspectorate, should be given the necessary powers and resources to enable them to properly implement and enforce provision concerning contract workers."

160. The Employer members asked that their objections to the time at which the Drafting Committee meeting had been scheduled be noted. In their view it was unreasonable to start the work of the Drafting Committee at 4 p.m. on a Saturday, and indicated that the Office should have made available sufficient resources so that this would not have been necessary. The Worker members agreed that for next year the problem of insufficient resources should be addressed.

161. The Employer members introduced an amendment to delete paragraph (1) of Point 22, as they reiterated their objection to the notion of apportionment of responsibility or apportionment based on the degree of dependency. The idea of apportioning responsibility on some form of percentage basis was in their view unacceptable and unworkable. The Worker members opposed the amendment, since Point 22 reflected the laws of many countries and it was an important means of addressing problems arising in triangular relationships. The Worker Vice-Chairperson noted that the same notion of apportionment/allocation of responsibility could be found in the text of Article 9 of the proposed Convention on the Revision of Convention No. 96. His group did not consider the concept of apportionment as used in the text to refer to a determination on a percentage basis, but rather the allocation of responsibilities for different matters. The Government members of the European Union, with the exception of Portugal, opposed the amendment. The Government member of Cyprus recalled that the Committee had already adopted a new paragraph (4) to Point 9, which refers to clearly determining responsibilities for financial obligations. She requested clarification from the Committee secretariat regarding the difference in meaning between Point 22(1) and the new paragraph to Point 9. Furthermore, whilst reserving her position on Point 22 pending this clarification, she expressed doubt about the need to specify the criterion of dependency for the purposes of apportioning responsibility.

162. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that the wording under paragraph 4 of Point 9 requires a determination as to which of the employers should be responsible for fulfilling the financial obligations, while Point 22(1) provides for the distribution of responsibilities among the employers according to the issue/condition concerned, and did not refer to allocating a percentage of responsibility. The Employer Vice-Chairperson maintained that the provisions of Point 9(4) and Point 22(1) were not comparable, since the first is limited to financial responsibilities and does not raise the question of apportionment, whereas the second refers to all responsibilities and specifically mentions apportionment, making Point 9(4) more flexible. The Government member of Cyprus expressed her Government's willingness to accept Point 22(1) with the deletion of the words after "contract workers". She also suggested that the word "should" be changed to "might". The Government member of Germany supported the latter suggestion in the interest of flexibility. On the basis of an indicative vote on the Employer members' amendment to delete Point 22(1), the amendment was withdrawn.

163. A further amendment to Point 22(1) was then introduced by the Government member of Finland, speaking also on behalf of the Government member of Norway. Pursuant to their amendment the words "the workers' dependency on or subordination to them" would be replaced by "the control of the subcontractor (or the intermediary, as the case may be) and the user enterprise over the conditions of work." He explained that in their view control was more relevant in the context of Point 22(1) than dependency, for example control over health and safety matters would normally lie with the user enterprise, but by measuring responsibility based on dependency, a different apportionment could result. The Employer members found the argument put forward regarding the amendment fairly convincing, but stressed that what was important was national law and practice, since in some circumstances control might be the critical criterion, whereas in others dependency could be more appropriate. The Employer Vice-Chairperson suggested that deleting the last phrase of the Office text would address his group's concerns. The Worker members considered subordination and control to be two sides of the same coin, though in their view it was preferable to repeat the words used in the definition section to ensure consistency of wording and intentions. They would, however, agree to adding a reference to control in Point 22(1) to complement the reference to subordination and dependency.

164. In the light of the discussion, the authors of the amendment agreed to withdraw it in favour of that proposed by the Government member of Canada to add the following new sentence to Point 22(1): "Where applicable, such apportionment could take account of the control of the subcontractor (or the intermediary, as the case may be) and the user enterprise over all the circumstances in which the work is carried out." The Government member of Canada stated that the intention of the amendment was to ensure that the apportionment of responsibility could take account of the means of intervention specifically available to the subcontractor or intermediary, as the case may be, and the user enterprise, regarding the various conditions which might affect the health and safety of contract workers. The Government member of the Netherlands seconded the amendment. The Government member of France indicated that while he understood the concern underlying the amendment, he questioned the usefulness of reopening the debate on the criteria for determining dependency and subordination which had already been pursued with respect to Point 16; each State could use the criteria it found useful. Similar sentiments were echoed by the Government member of Poland who opposed the amendment. The Government member of Cyprus spoke in support of the amendment, since she found it useful to include the idea of control. The Employer Vice-Chairperson declared that, while his group would not oppose the amendment, they questioned the need for it since Point 16(4)(c) had already introduced the concept of control as a criteria for determining subordination or dependency. The Government member of Canada withdrew his amendment.

165. The Government member of Germany submitted an amendment to change the word "should" in Point 22(1) to "could", explaining that it would provide greater flexibility to take into consideration the range of approaches to this issue. The amendment was seconded by the Government members of Denmark and the Netherlands. The Employer members and Worker members also expressed their support for the amendment. The amendment of the Government member of Germany was, therefore, adopted by consensus, and paragraph (1) of Point 22 was adopted as amended.

166. The Employer members' amendment to delete paragraph (2) of Point 22 was then put before the Committee. The Employer Vice-Chairperson explained that his group objected to Point 22(2) for the same reasons as Point 22(1), as stated above. The Employer members objected to the principle of apportionment as it interfered with commercial arrangements and with the responsibilities of the direct parties to the relationship. They looked very seriously upon the proposal contained in Point 22(2) to impose obligations on a party who did not have the legal responsibility to meet them. In their view, the appropriate response was to ensure that the person with the legal responsibility discharged that obligation. The Worker members opposed the amendment as did the Government members of Gabon, India, the Netherlands (on behalf of the Member States of the European Union), Poland and Venezuela. The Government members of India and Venezuela based their support for the Office text on the ground that, in their countries, the legal situation on this matter was very clear and was in line with the terms of Point 22(2). The Government member of Gabon supported the Office text since it appeared in the context of a Recommendation and the provision was sufficiently flexible.

167. The Government member of Peru supported the amendment for reasons similar to those expressed by the Employer members. He believed that it was not acceptable to transfer obligations to a party who had no legal obligation to meet them. The Government member of Germany suggested that the fear that liability would be transferred to the user enterprise was not well founded in the light of the inclusion of the words "where appropriate" in the Office text, which already provided sufficient flexibility. The Government member of Australia expressed some sympathy for the view that a person not be obliged to discharge the obligations arising pursuant to an agreement to which he or she was not a party. In response to requests for clarification from the Government members of Australia and Germany, the representative of the Secretary-General recalled that the text of a Recommendation is by its nature not mandatory and that the term "as appropriate" provided further flexibility. Another member of the Committee secretariat listed countries in which the approach taken in Point 22(2) was followed. The Worker members viewed the provisions of Point 22(2) as giving guidance regarding one of many ways of addressing the triangular relationship. The Employer Vice-Chairperson observed that the purpose of the Recommendation was to give guidance regarding the application and implementation of the Convention and set out guidelines on good practice rather than perpetuating systems that might prevail in some countries. Since most countries did not have a legal system in conformity with Point 22(2), in their view there was no good reason to include such a provision. The amendment was voted upon with the following outcome: 3,045 votes in favour, 3,509 against with 232 abstentions (the quorum was 3,340). The Employer members' amendment was, therefore, not adopted and paragraph (2) of Point 22 was adopted without change. The whole of Point 22 was adopted, as amended.

168. The Worker members withdrew the two amendments they had proposed to Point 23, the first calling for the deletion of the words "to the extent provided for by national law" and the replacement of "might" by "should", and the second renumbering paragraph (2) as a new Point 24. The Employer members also withdrew an amendment proposing the deletion of Point 23(1) in the view of the previous decisions of the Committee. However, they considered that Point 23(1) touched upon an important question of principle and their amendment to delete it reflected their profound concern regarding the notion of shared responsibility. They indicated that they would take up the issue again during the second discussion of this agenda item. The Employer Vice-Chairperson then introduced his group's amendment to delete paragraph (2) of Point 23. He contended that it was inappropriate to deal with the question of insolvency in the manner proposed in Point 23(2), and in any event the provisions went further than the protection afforded in the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173). The Worker members found the provisions in Point 23(2) to be entirely consistent with Convention No. 173, and they believed it to be appropriate to include them in the context of the proposed Recommendation. The Government members of Austria, Belgium, France, Italy, Luxembourg, Namibia, the Netherlands, Spain, Switzerland, the United States and Venezuela expressed their preference for retaining the Office text. The Employer members withdrew the amendment. Paragraph (2) of Point 23 was adopted without change, and thus the whole of Point 23 was adopted without change.

169. The Employer members introduced amendments to delete both paragraphs of Point 24. Though addressing first the deletion of Point 24(1), the Employer Vice-Chairperson noted that the same arguments were relevant regarding Point 24(2). The notion of registration or licensing to permit the use of contract labour was described as being anathema to the Employer members. Such an obligation, they believed, would hinder the capacity to use contract labour by introducing unnecessary obstacles. The Worker Vice-Chairperson stated that they would oppose the deletion of the two paragraphs as they addressed important issues, and pointed out that the provisions appeared in the context of a Recommendation that was providing guidelines for possible ways to protect contract workers. The Government members of Australia, Cyprus, Japan and New Zealand voiced their support for the amendment to delete Point 24(1). The Government member of Cyprus, whose views were endorsed by the Government members of Australia, Japan and New Zealand, considered that, while registration could prevent some abuses, it would impose a regulatory burden that would be particularly onerous for small businesses.The Government members of France, Italy, Norway, South Africa, Spain, Switzerland, the United States and Venezuela were in favour of retaining the Office text since it provided sufficient flexibility. The Government member of Spain was of the view that registration would be one logical means of ensuring observance of legislation. However, he took the opportunity to reiterate his Government's concerns regarding the use of the term "subcontracting" in Spanish ("subcontratación") which in Spain meant something entirely different from the way it was being used in the proposed texts. If registration of commercial subcontracting arrangements was being envisaged, this would be totally untenable. The Government members of Canada and Switzerland supported the comments made by the Government member of Spain as they reflected the same problem that arose in the French text. The Government members of Gabon, India and Namibia emphasized the importance of the system of registration in their countries as a means of avoiding abuses, particularly in the informal sector. The Employer members recalled the purpose of a Recommendation, noting that the fact that similar provisions existed in the legislation of certain countries was not a reason to advocate their inclusion in the present text. The crux of the issue according to the Employer members was whether or not it was desirable to have a provision like Point 24(1) that would hinder the freedom of businesses and discourage job creation. The amendment was put to a vote, the results of which were as follows: 2,929 votes cast in favour, 3,799 against and 145 abstentions, with a quorum of 3,340. The Employer members' amendment was, therefore, not adopted.

170. The Government member of the United States presented an amendment to paragraph (l) of Point 24 to delete the word "and" after "national laws" and to add after "regulations" the following: "and practice, including the laws of individual units of member States". Following clarification from the representative of the Secretary-General that the Office text did not use the word "federal" and that the reference was to laws of a country at any level, the Government member of the United States withdrew his amendment.

171. The Employer members pointed out that the Office text of paragraph (2) seemed to be encouraging "job cremation" rather than "job creation", but that, in the light of the decision adopted on paragraph (1), they withdrew their proposed amendment to delete paragraph (2), although they wanted their concerns and reservations to be noted, along with their clear intention to revisit the matter during the second discussion. In the light of the Committee's discussions, the Worker members withdrew an amendment that would have sought to add a new paragraph as follows: "(3) Registration and licences might be denied to subcontractors and intermediaries who have violated legal standards to protect contract workers." Point 24 was therefore adopted without change.

Proposed new point

172. An amendment was presented by the Worker members to add a new point after Point 24 as follows: "Measures should be taken to encourage collective bargaining as a means of determining and improving the terms and conditions of contract workers." They were concerned that contract workers were sometimes not able to bargain collectively with user enterprises, since they were not considered to be employees, and that the proposed new point would help secure the rights of such workers. A provision to this effect already appeared in Paragraph 11 of the Home Work Recommendation, 1996 (No. 184). The Employer members opposed the amendment on two grounds: first, it was redundant, since the extension of the right of contract workers to organize and to bargaining collectively had already been addressed in Point 10; second, it was couched in terms which differed from the comprehensive wording used in the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), which took account of the great variety of conditions in member States. The Government member of the Netherlands, on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, with the exception of the United Kingdom, expressed support for the amendment, which he considered logical in the light of the provisions of Point 10. Support was also expressed by the Government members of Venezuela and Canada, while the Government member of Poland opposed it on the ground that the matter was sufficiently covered by Point 10. With a view to ensuring consistency with the wording of Article 4 of Convention No. 98, the Employer members proposed a subamendment to delete all the text after the word "measures" and to replace it with the provision set forth in Article 4 of Convention No. 98. Following the views expressed by several Government members that they preferred the text of the original amendment, the Employer members proposed a further subamendment which read as follows: "Measures appropriate to national conditions should be taken, where necessary, to encourage collective bargaining as a means of determining and improving the terms and conditions of work of contract workers", which they said would preserve the essential flexibility of Article 4 of Convention No. 98 and take account of the various systems of labour regulation in member States. In the light of the broad support for the proposal from the Government members, including Colombia, Ecuador (speaking on behalf of Brazil, Mexico and Uruguay), Norway, Switzerland and the United States, the Worker members accepted the subamendment. The amendment, as subamended by the Employer members, was adopted. The new point after Point 24 was adopted.

174. An amendment by the Employer members to delete Point 25 was withdrawn, as were two amendments by the Worker members to delete the words "where possible" and to add the following words to the end of Point 25: "and the conditions under which contract labour is performed." Point 25 was adopted without change.

175. The Employer members presented an amendment to delete Point 26, which they believed would be impossible to implement in its original form. The replies to the Office questionnaire as set forth in Report VI(2) had already noted the heavy burden which could result from the reference to "appropriate measures" and the complexity of applying domestic legislation in another jurisdiction. To provide greater flexibility, the Office had reworded the provision, but the difficulties mentioned in many of the replies still remained, in the view of the Employer members. The Worker members opposed the amendment, on the ground that the provision reflected the situation of many contract workers which needed to be addressed. In expressing her support for the substance of the Office text, the Government member of Cyprus asked for clarification of the meaning of the word "measures". The Government members of Portugal and the Philippines, in opposing the amendment, said that such measures could include repatriation and medical costs and the provision of legal assistance to migrant workers unable to pay for it themselves. The Government member of Austria pointed out that, in the European Union, a Directive had recently been adopted concerning the posting of workers in the framework of the provision of services, which provided for certain guarantees for workers in such situations. In response to the question raised by the Government member of Cyprus, a member of the secretariat said that the matter was dealt with in such instruments as the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), and the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143), the objective being to treat the matter from different angles (sending and host countries). The Government members of Australia and the United Kingdom said that the wording of Point 26 was ambiguous on this point, an observation which was further developed by the Government member of Canada who noted that in addition the words "their own" at the end of the English version of Point 26 could refer to either the "Members" or the "contract workers", whereas the French version of the text could refer only to "contract workers". In response to a question from the Government member of Japan as to whether the Office text referred to sending or host countries, the representative of the Secretary-General said that the provision did not specify which countries. The Government member of Switzerland said that it was the host country that should provide the respective protection. The Government member of Colombia said his Government had problems with the Point, for reasons similar to those given by the Employer Vice-Chairperson. In the light of the lengthy debate in which various possible formulations had been put forward informally to clarify the matter, the Employer members agreed to withdraw the amendment, on the understanding that the wording and the matter of which country could be settled by the Drafting Committee.

176. A compromise text on the substance of two amendments proposed by the Worker members to delete the words "as appropriate" from Point 26 and to add at the end of the same Point the words "not less favourable than that provided to national contract workers" was then accepted by the Committee. The new formulation of Point 26 read as follows: "Members should take measures, as appropriate, to provide protection to contract workers from other countries who perform work in the Member's country." Point 26, as amended, was adopted.

Proposed new point

177. The Worker members introduced an amendment to add a new point after Point 26 as follows: "Member States should require user enterprises to consult with the organizations of workers who might be affected by the use of contract labour prior to resorting to the use of contract labour." The Employer members opposed the proposal, saying that it introduced a totally new concept which had not arisen in the replies to the Office questionnaire or in the drafting of the proposed instruments. It was an extremely restrictive measure and rather than protecting contract workers it would actually extend protection to workers in general, which was totally unacceptable. Following opposition from several Government members, namely China, the Government members of the Member States of the European Union, Norway and Switzerland, the Worker members withdrew their amendment on the understanding that the matter be revisited in the next discussion.

178. The Committee therefore adopted the Proposed Conclusions with a view to a Recommendation (Points 15 to 26, as amended). It referred the Proposed Conclusions as adopted to its Drafting Committee.

Adoption of the report

179. At its 16th sitting, the Reporter submitted the report to the Committee for consideration. The Committee unanimously adopted the report, including the Proposed Conclusions, subject to minor amendments requested by a few members.

180. The Government members of Chile and Colombia queried whether the Spanish text of clauses (b), (f), (g) and (i) of Point 18(4) was consistent with the English version, since the English version read "whether" whereas the Spanish read "whether or not". As the text of the Proposed Conclusions had already been adopted by the Committee, this concern could not be immediately addressed; however, a member of the secretariat informed the Committee that these comments would be taken into consideration and the necessary adjustments made to the Spanish text in the course of preparing the next Office report on this agenda item.

181. The Employer Vice-Chairperson recalled his opening remarks, in particular the fact that the Employers' group had been implacably opposed to the adoption of new standards on contract labour. He regretted that nothing had happened in the course of the discussions to alter their view: they remained convinced that contract labour was not a suitable subject for standard setting for the reasons he had set out in his opening statement. He went on to enumerate their particular remaining difficulties regarding the proposed instruments: the definitions, the concept of dependency and subordination, the introduction of the notion of equality of treatment between contract workers and regular employees, the apportionment of responsibilities, licensing, and the non-replacement of striking workers. The Employer members were also concerned that many Government members had not participated actively in the voting regarding key points, since a large number were absent or abstained from voting; consequently, some of the key points had been decided against the Employer members' views by a very small majority, which in their view could not be characterized as true tripartism. He surmised that many of the Governments who had voted in favour of a Convention had no intention of ratifying it. He observed that many Government members had voted in favour of a Convention to provide an opportunity to see whether a satisfactory instrument could be developed. The Employer members were certain that many Government members would revise their position on this point. He assured the Committee that his group would remain firm during the next discussion of this agenda item.

182. The Worker Vice-Chairperson remarked that from the outset the Workers' group had indicated the problems it perceived with the Office text; while all these problems had not been resolved in the course of the Committee's deliberations, the Committee had identified the problem areas and positive efforts had been evidenced to reach a compromise on some important issues and to keep open the possibility of further discussion. The Worker members were of the view that through the continuation of this process of discussion and compromise during the second discussion of this item, a practical and ratifiable instrument would be developed. He expressed his group's satisfaction that the Employer members, despite their difficulties, had continued to participate actively in the work of the Committee in the spirit of tripartism.

183. The Government member of Peru expressed his Government's appreciation for the tripartite spirit in which the discussions had been held, resulting in the emergence of consensus from among a plurality of views. The Government member of the Netherlands, speaking on behalf of the Member States of the European Union, commented that the discussions had been fruitful, particularly in identifying the problems which an instrument on contract labour could present. The Governments he represented looked forward to another thorough and broad-ranging debate during the second discussion. Speaking on his own behalf, he endorsed the concerns of the Employer members regarding the low participation rate of the Government members, and expressed his hope that this problem would be surmounted next year.

184. The Government member of the United States noted that the Committee had had to deal with the very sensitive and difficult issue of ensuring labour and other protection for contract workers while maintaining an element of flexibility so as not to be too restrictive. He recalled the need for any instrument to be sufficiently flexible to take into account national law and practice in order to be capable of being ratified and implemented by governments. The Government member of India expressed his Government's satisfaction with the level of consensus reached on this important subject, and noted that any instrument adopted would have an impact on the working conditions of millions of workers, particularly in the informal and unorganized sector.

185. In closing, the Chairperson thanked the members of the Committee for addressing this contentious issue in an atmosphere of congeniality. He suggested that the remaining differences among the Committee members were superficial in nature, and that everyone agreed with the basic assumptions that it was important to protect workers while not losing sight of the importance of promoting efficiency and competitiveness; striking the right balance was the key.

186. The Committee submits its report, the Proposed Conclusions and the attached resolution to the Conference for consideration.

Geneva, 16 June 1997. (Signed) G.H. Johannes,
Reporter.

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS

A. Form of the instruments

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt standards on contract labour.

2. These standards should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

B. Conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention

I. PREAMBLE

3. The Preamble should recognize that, having regard to the growing recourse to contract labour, it would be appropriate to adopt new standards on the subject with a view to ensuring that contract workers enjoy adequate protection.

II. METHODS OF APPLICATION

4. The provisions of the proposed Convention should be applied by means of laws or regulations or by any other means consistent with national practice, such as court decisions, arbitration awards or collective agreements.

III. DEFINITIONS

5. For the purposes of the proposed Convention:

(1) The term "contract labour" should mean work performed for a natural or legal person (referred to as a "user enterprise") by a person (referred to as a "contract worker") where the work is performed by the worker personally under actual conditions of dependency on or subordination to the user enterprise and these conditions are similar to those that characterize an employment relationship under national law and practice and where either:
   (a) The work is performed pursuant to a direct contractual relationship between the worker and the user enterprise; or
   (b) the worker is provided for the user enterprise by a subcontractor or an intermediary.

(2) The term "subcontractor" should mean a natural or legal person who performs work for a user enterprise under a contractual arrangement with it, other than a contract of employment.

(3) The term "intermediary" should mean a natural or legal person who makes contract workers available to a user enterprise without becoming formally the employer of these workers.

IV. SCOPE

6. The proposed Convention should apply to all branches of economic activity and to all contract workers. It should not apply to workers who, in accordance with national law and practice, have a recognized contract of employment with the user enterprise. It should not apply to employees of private employment agencies who are made available to a user enterprise to perform contract labour.

7. The competent authority, after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, may exclude from the scope of the proposed Convention or from all or any provisions of its Part V:

(a) other particular categories of contract workers who otherwise enjoy adequate protection; or

(b) particular branches of economic activity when the application of the Convention in respect of them would raise special problems of a substantial nature.

8. A Member which ratifies the proposed Convention should specify, in its first report under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, any exclusion of which it avails itself under Point 7, and give the reasons therefor.

V. CONTENT OF THE PROPOSED CONVENTION

9. The Member should ensure that adequate measures, in accordance with national law and practice, are taken to prevent accidents and injury to the health of contract workers arising out of, linked with or occurring in the course of contract labour.

10. Measures should be taken, in accordance with national law and practice:

(a) to provide adequate protection in relation to the payment of:

  (i) amounts due to contract workers for the work performed; and

  (ii) any social insurance contributions payable on behalf of such workers in relation to this work;

(b) to ensure that the responsibilities for fulfilling the financial obligations envisaged in Clause (a) above are clearly determined; and

(c) to ensure that contract workers receive compensation in case of injury or disease resulting from the performance of contract labour.

11. The Member should promote equality of treatment between contract workers and workers with a recognized employment relationship, taking into account the conditions applicable to other workers performing work which is essentially similar, under similar conditions.

12. (1) Measures should be taken to ensure that contract workers receive the same protection as workers with a recognized employment relationship with regard to:

(a) the right to organize and the right to bargain collectively;

(b) freedom from discrimination in employment and occupation on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin;

(c) minimum age.

(2) Measures should be taken, as appropriate, to ensure that contract workers enjoy adequate protection as regards:

(a) working time and other working conditions;

(b) maternity protection;

(c) occupational safety and health;

(d) remuneration;

(e) statutory social security.

13. The Member should take measures to ensure that rights or obligations under labour or social security laws or regulations are not denied or avoided when contract labour is used.

14. Effective measures appropriate to the manner in which effect is given to the provisions of the proposed Convention should be taken to ensure the proper application and enforcement of regulations or provisions concerning contract labour by means of adequate inspection or otherwise.

15. Adequate remedies, including penalties where appropriate, should be provided for and effectively applied in case of violations of the regulations or provisions referred to in Point 14.

16. The provisions of the proposed Convention should not affect more favourable provisions under other international labour Conventions applicable to the workers concerned.

C. Conclusions proposed with a view to a Recommendation

I. General provision

17. The provisions of the proposed Recommendation should supplement those of the proposed Convention and should be applied in conjunction with them.

II. Definitions

18. For the purposes of the proposed Recommendation:

(1) The term "contract labour" should mean work performed for a natural or legal person (referred to as a "user enterprise") by a person (referred to as a "contract worker") where the work is performed by the worker personally under actual conditions of dependency on or subordination to the user enterprise and these conditions are similar to those that characterize an employment relationship under national law and practice and where either:

  (a) the work is performed pursuant to a direct contractual relationship between the worker and the user enterprise; or

  (b) the worker is provided for the user enterprise by a subcontractor or an intermediary;

(2) the term "subcontractor" should mean a natural or legal person who performs work for a user enterprise under a contractual arrangement with it, other than a contract of employment;

(3) the term "intermediary" should mean a natural or legal person who makes contract workers available to a user enterprise without becoming formally the employer of these workers;

(4) in determining whether the conditions of dependency or subordination referred to in paragraph (1) above are met, a Member could consider one or more criteria, including but not limited to, the following:
   (a) the extent to which the user enterprise determines when and how work should be performed, including working time and other conditions of work of the contract worker;
   (b) whether the user enterprise pays amounts due to the contract worker periodically and according to preestablished criteria;
   (c) the extent of supervisory authority and control of the user enterprise over the contract worker in respect to the work performed, including disciplinary authority;
   (d) the extent to which the user enterprise makes investments and provides tools, materials and machinery, among other things, to perform the work concerned;
   (e) whether the contract worker can make profits or run the risk of losses in performing the work;
   (f) whether the work is performed on a regular and continuous basis;
   (g) whether the contract worker works only for a single user enterprise;
   (h) the extent to which the work performed is integrated into the normal activities of the user enterprise;
   (i) whether the user enterprise provides substantial job-specific training to the contract worker.

III. CONTENT OF THE PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION

19. Appropriate measures should be taken to ensure that contract workers are informed, in an appropriate and easily understandable manner, about their conditions of work and amounts due to them, including how these amounts will be determined.

20. Measures should be taken, as appropriate, to ensure that contract workers are afforded equal treatment with employees of the user enterprise or, as the case may be, with employees of the subcontractor or of the intermediary, for performing work which is essentially similar, under similar conditions and requiring similar qualifications.

21. In specified circumstances (for example, where contract labour is used mainly or solely for the purpose of denying rights or avoiding obligations under labour or social security laws and regulations), contract workers should be assimilated to employees of the user enterprise or, as the case may be, to employees of the subcontractor or of the intermediary.

22. In accordance with national law and practice, contract workers should not be made available to a user enterprise to replace workers of that enterprise who are on strike.

23. Measures should be taken to ensure that contract workers may refuse to perform work which they have reasonable justification to believe poses a serious danger to their safety and health.

24. (1) National law and practice might apportion responsibility between the subcontractor (or the intermediary, as the case may be) and the user enterprise for fulfilling obligations toward contract workers, taking into account the extent of the workers' dependency on or subordination to them.

(2) When the party responsible for fulfilling the obligations referred to in subparagraph (1) does not meet them, the other party, where appropriate, should be made responsible for doing so.

25. To the extent provided for by national law, financial obligations toward a contract worker might be jointly and severally shared by the subcontractor or by the intermediary and the user enterprise, or among all of them, as the case may be.

26. In the event of insolvency of the user enterprise, the subcontractor or the intermediary, the outstanding claims of a contract worker should be given the same priorities as those established by national law and practice with regard to a worker's claims against his or her employer.

27. (1) Recourse to contract labour might, in accordance with national laws and regulations, be subject to an obligation incumbent on the subcontractor or the intermediary to register with or to obtain a licence from the competent authority.

(2) Registration or licensing might depend upon the subcontractor or the intermediary demonstrating its viability and capacity to meet its obligations toward contract workers, or posting a bond sufficient to cover its obligations to such workers.

28. (1) Measures appropriate to national conditions should be taken, where necessary, to encourage collective bargaining as a means of determining and improving the terms and conditions of work of contract workers.

(2) Any obstacles to the exercise of the right of contract workers to join organizations of their choice and to participate in the activities of such organizations should be identified and eliminated.

29. Members should, where possible, compile, keep up to date and make publicly available statistics and other information on contract labour.

30. The Member should take measures, as appropriate, to provide protection to contract workers from other countries who perform work in its territory.

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Contract labour"

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the sixth item on the agenda;

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of Governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning contract labour;

Decides that an item entitled "Contract labour" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion regarding the proposed adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning contract labour.

Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

PART ONE

GENERAL REPORT

A. Introduction

1. In accordance with article 7 of its Standing Orders, the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III on its agenda: "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The Committee was composed of 237 members (117 Government members, 32 Employer members and 88 Worker members). It also included 15 Government deputy members, 44 Employer deputy members and 102 Worker deputy members.[1] In addition, 44 international non-governmental organizations were represented by observers.

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chair: Mr. A. Callorda Salvo (Government member, Uruguay);

Vice-Chairs: Mr. A. Wisskirchen (Employer member, Germany); and Mr. W. Peirens (Worker member, Belgium);

Reporter: Ms. E.-C. Mihes (Government member, Romania).

3. The Committee held 19 sittings.

4. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the following: (i) information supplied under article 19 of the Constitution on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference; (ii) reports supplied under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution on the application of ratified Conventions; and (iii) reports requested by the Governing Body under article 19 of the Constitution on the Labour Administration Convention (No. 150) and Recommendation (No. 158), 1978.[2]

5. As usual, the Committee began its work with a discussion of general aspects of the application of Conventions (particularly ratified Conventions) and Recommendations and the discharge by member States of standards-related obligations under the ILO Constitution. It then discussed the General Survey made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on labour administration. Following that, the Committee considered various individual cases relating to the application of ratified Conventions or compliance with the obligations to supply reports and to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities.

6. The examination of those cases, which is the essential work of the Committee, was based principally on the observations contained in the report of the Committee of Experts and the oral and written explanations provided by governments concerned. The Committee also referred to its discussions in previous years, comments received from employers' or workers' organizations and, where appropriate, the reports of other supervisory bodies of the ILO and other international organizations. In view of the short time available, the Committee made a selection among the Committee of Experts' observations and thus discussed a limited number of cases. The Committee trusts that those governments will pay close attention to the requests of the Committee of Experts and will not fail to take the measures required to ensure fulfilment of the obligations they have undertaken. A summary of the information supplied by governments, the discussions in the present Committee and any conclusions it has drawn is set out in Part Two of this report.

7. The Worker members stated that they had approved the draft list of cases after much discussion. The choice of priority cases to be discussed was always a difficult exercise, in view of time constraints on the one hand and the great number of problems of application on the other. They had based their choice on a number of criteria, including the nature of the comments made by the Committee of Experts; the existence of footnotes in the report; the scope and quality of government replies reproduced in the report, or the absence of such reports; the discussion and conclusions of the Committee in previous years; the comments received from the workers' and employers' organizations; the reports of other supervisory bodies of the ILO or from other international organizations; recent developments; and the statements of the Worker members during the adoption of the list the previous year. A balance also had to be achieved between regions and Conventions, with the concern to discuss not only fundamental Conventions, but also the problems and trends in application of the so-called "technical" Conventions. In view of the great number of footnotes requesting that information be supplied to the Conference, it appeared impossible to discuss all the cases. In approving the draft list, the Worker members wished to make certain important remarks for the Committee of Experts, the ILO, the governments concerned and the present Committee. In the first place, there were cases that the Worker members would like to be raised again at the next session if no real progress was registered in the meantime. They urged the Committee of Experts to repeat its comments on the application of these Conventions in these cases: Afghanistan (Convention No. 111); Djibouti (Convention No. 87); Ecuador (Convention No. 87); Ethiopia (Convention No. 87). In another case, the Committee of Experts should monitor the implementation of compensatory measures, which should be taken by the Government preferably in consultation with organizations representing the victims (Japan, Convention No. 29). Finally, the Worker members noted that, as a representation procedure under article 24 of the Constitution was under way, the case could not be included on the list this year (Russian Federation, Convention No. 95).

8. The Employer members recalled that the Standing Orders set out the task of the Conference Committee, which was to examine reports by member States on measures taken to improve the application of ratified Conventions. However, in practice, it was impossible for the Committee to examine all such reports. A decision therefore had to be taken on which cases, due to lack of time, would not be examined by the Committee. This resulted in the establishment of a list of the cases that would be examined. Although the Employer members would have preferred to examine more cases, they were prepared to accept the proposed list. In response to the comments by the Worker members concerning the criteria for the choice of cases to be examined, the Employer members noted that these could not always be precise and it was understandable if not everyone was entirely pleased with the results of the selection procedure. There had been an especially large number of footnotes in the report of the Committee of Experts requesting reports from governments on ratified Conventions. The Conference Committee almost always took these footnotes into account when selecting the cases that it would examine. The Employer members noted in this respect that the Conference Committee, in exercise of its sovereign right, had clearly changed its practice for the selection of the cases to be examined this year.

B. General questions relating to international labour standards

Introduction: General aspects of the supervisory process

9. The Committee was pleased to welcome Sir William Douglas, who chairs the Committee of Experts. Sir William thanked the Committee, on behalf of the Committee of Experts, for renewing the invitation for him to attend as an observer. He would transmit the views expressed during the general discussion to his Committee, where they would assist in the formulation of observations on ratified Conventions. His Committee valued this arrangement, which helped ensure the smooth and effective functioning of the ILO's supervisory machinery and would continue to pursue a constructive dialogue with the Conference Committee. Topics of current concern included employment policy and the employment and social problems arising from globalization of markets and transition of some countries to a market economy; the need to preserve the stability and effectiveness of social security systems in a climate of reduced public funding; problems as to the payment of wages, involving contravention of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95); and the application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), where measures could be taken by States within their respective jurisdictions to prevent particular forms of exploitation of children. His Committee had systematically referred to the views expressed by employers' and workers' organizations. The General Survey on Labour Administration noted that Convention No. 150 was of a promotional nature but had only 39 ratifications, in comparison with the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), which had 119 ratifications and represented an important element in any system of labour administration. The Committee of Experts hoped by emphasizing the flexibility of the Convention to encourage countries with both highly developed and less well-developed systems of administration to ratify and introduce innovations to respond to the demands of complex and changing economic, technological, social and political environments. Sir William looked forward with interest to the present Committee's deliberations.

10. The Committee noted the indications of the representative of the Secretary-General concerning the respective functions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and other supervisory bodies, detailed in the widely translated and distributed Handbook of procedures relating to international labour Conventions and Recommendations. The Committee of Experts examined governments' reports from a technical and legal standpoint, the present Committee attempting to find solutions through dialogue from both a legal and a political perspective. The procedure for representations under article 24 of the Constitution made for a heavy workload recently; the Governing Body's tripartite Committee on Freedom of Association had handled a total of over 1,900 cases since 1951. The Office was pursuing its efforts to ensure the supply of reports under the procedures adopted by the Governing Body in 1993, especially through the assistance provided in the regions by the multidisciplinary advisory teams (MDTs) and in cooperation with national organizations of employers and workers. It would carry out a study of this problem and its solution. The Committee was informed in particular of progress in the ratification and application of Conventions; and of recent discussions in the Governing Body especially concerning possible strengthening of the supervisory procedures, standard-setting policy and the revision of standards.

11. The Government member of France, Chair of the Working Party on Policy regarding the Revision of Standards of the Governing Body Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards, said that, for the policy on the revision of standards to achieve the desired success, all governments and social partners should participate in the process. He was sure that the members of the Committee would contribute to implementing the decisions of the Governing Body concerning the revision of standards in their respective countries. The present session of the Conference would in particular discuss a possible amendment to the ILO Constitution to enable abrogation of Conventions which have lost their purpose or no longer make a useful contribution to attaining the objectives of the Organization.

12. The Employer members, after welcoming the presence of the Chair of the Committee of Experts, recalled that the role of the Conference Committee remained unchanged, in accordance with article 7 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference. However, the substance and main emphasis of its work had to change considerably in view of the major upheavals that were now occurring. Change at the current time was even greater than that experienced in 1989 and 1990. It involved innovations in the technological, economic and other fields, including social policy, which would have a greater influence on every individual than even the changes of 1989 and 1990. Although the ILO and the Conference Committee might give the impression of being only slightly affected by such far-reaching change, they could not stand still. It was encouraging that Members of the ILO were no longer willing to accept that things should always be as they always had been. It was sensible and useful to call for greater transparency and to measure activities by their results. This re-evaluation of values would have an important effect on the priorities of the Organization.

13. The Worker members thanked the Chair of the Committee of Experts for having once again accepted the invitation to observe the work of the present Committee. There were, both in the general part of the report of the Committee of Experts and in its examination of individual cases, numerous prominent references to discussions and conclusions of this Committee, and this highlighted the importance of the dialogue between the two bodies, which had become more intense in the last few years. The Workers were convinced that the complementarity between objective legal analysis on the one side and tripartite dialogue on the other explained the success of the supervisory system, and that it was on this basis that measures should be sought to strengthen it. They looked forward in the present Committee to constructive dialogue with the Employers and Governments: the report of the Committee of Experts was an excellent starting-point to ensure the quality and seriousness of the work, the value of which was measured by concrete impact on the conditions of life and work of workers throughout the world.

14. Several speakers referred to the question of credibility. The Government member of Cuba saw the Committee of Experts' principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality as the guarantee of credibility in the standard-setting and supervisory work of the ILO, and this credibility must be strengthened and broadened, especially in the light of the Director-General's new proposals. The Government member of Kenya and the Worker member of the Netherlands also emphasized the importance of these principles. Others saw the ILO's credibility tested in governments' denunciations of Conventions (the Worker member of New Zealand); in developments in export processing zones (the Government member of Sweden (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries)); and in strengthening of the observance of fundamental human rights instruments (the Government member of Portugal). The effectiveness of the supervisory system could be enhanced, for example, said the Government member of Canada, the Worker member of the Netherlands and the representative of Education International, by giving the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee greater publicity and transparency and improving their external communications value. The Worker member of Italy also noted that the Committee of Experts' report enabled legal and political pressure to be brought to bear.

15. The Government member of Saudi Arabia thought the present Committee, with its specific knowledge of standards, particularly well suited to reach positive and practical solutions in the context of the plenary discussion of the Director-General's Report on The ILO, standard setting and globalization. At the same time, the Worker member of Colombia said that globalization, deregulation and privatization made the task of the Committee of Experts harder than before. The Government member of Sweden (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries) considered that the supervisory process for all Conventions should be brought closer to the mainstream of the Organization's activities.

16. The Worker member of the Netherlands remarked how helpful it was to receive the report of the Committee of Experts so early, and thought the ILO supervisory system exemplary, when compared with that of other bodies of the UN system. Other specific recommendations for improvement were made. The Government member of Belgium suggested that the report of the present Committee should be constructed in a different fashion, supplemented by a shorter, more manageable and more political document which would refer to the report of the Committee of Experts, but also give the gist of the political message of this Committee concerning the application of standards. The Worker member of the United States said that, since the Director-General suggested in his Report that this Committee might have a future role to play in the strengthening of the ILO's supervisory machinery for the fundamental human rights Conventions, this might have a further impact on the number of individual cases reviewed here each year if this idea were implemented. The Worker member of Burkina Faso noted it would be useful to ensure greater representation of women at the Conference. The Government member of Saudi Arabia regretted the departure from the Committee of Experts of its only Arab, Muslim female member: he called for a similarly qualified replacement and considered that ILO staff working in this area should also represent a geographical and cultural balance, in order to ensure objectivity and neutrality.

17. The Government member of the United States noted that a significant portion of the Conference agenda was focused on standards activities: this Committee's work; the Report of the Director-General; the Standing Orders Committee (which was considering a constitutional amendment regarding standards); and the standard-setting activities in three technical committees. Given these activities, one very important priority for the ILO was to move toward a more regular sharing of information among all its bodies dealing with standards, and to provide a thorough analysis of the outcomes of the various processes. The purpose of such a comprehensive analysis would be to guide the Governing Body and this Committee in ascertaining the most effective means, not only of setting new standards, but also of reporting, supervision and technical assistance for reaching the goal of universal ratification and application of ILO standards. Paragraph 48 of the Committee of Experts' report referred to the Director-General's initiative with regard to ratification of fundamental labour standards. The Director-General had asked member States for increased reporting on barriers to their ratification of the fundamental standards, the article 19 process had been intensified for those Conventions, and reporting on ratified fundamental standards continued to be required on the most frequent basis. Each of those reports went its own way in separate processes, some to the Governing Body, some to the Committee of Experts. The Office should produce an analysis of the said reports with a view to finding common themes in the observations of non-compliance by the Committee of Experts, the barriers to ratification identified by member States, the comments made in general discussions on the report and the General Survey in this Committee and the conclusions reached here on core labour standards cases. Such an analysis could then be discussed in the Committee of Experts, this Committee and the Governing Body. The General Surveys could include more information on common barriers to ratification and implementation with regard to the core labour standards. He fully agreed with the Worker members that analysis of the reasons why member States were not reporting was more important than a mere listing of delinquent reports.

Fulfilment of reporting obligations, and ratification and denunciation of Conventions

18. The Employer members said the work of the Conference Committee was based on the reports received from governments evaluating the measures that they had taken to give effect to their obligations under the ILO Constitution and the Conventions that they had ratified. The Committee's work was also largely based on the report of the Committee of Experts which, although it had been shorter over recent years, seemed to have increased in length once again. This was partly linked to the increased number of member States and ratifications. However, the willingness of member States to fulfil their obligations to submit reports promptly and fully did not appear to have followed suit. Although the overall number of ratifications sounded impressive, it was not so significant in practice. This stagnation in the ratification of the Conventions adopted over the past ten to 15 years showed the increasing reluctance of member States with regard to these instruments. This created a need for careful examination by the Office, as noted in the Report of the Director-General to the Conference.

19. The Employer members noted that the ratification and denunciation of Conventions were matters for member States to decide upon. However, it was necessary to examine the reasons that led member States to decide to denounce Conventions that they had ratified. The long interval of ten years between the possibilities to exercise the right to denounce Conventions in practice tended to precipitate hasty decisions to denounce them. Therefore it would be more effective to make contact between ILO officials and governments concerned in order to discuss with member States the reasons for the intended denunciation. Such long intervals also encouraged a type of internal denunciation, which consisted of overt non-compliance with the provisions of ratified Conventions. In particular, the difficulty involved in denouncing Conventions made governments more wary of ratifying them.

20. With reference to the information provided in the report on compliance with reporting obligations, the Employer members noted in particular that only 63.3 per cent of the reports requested on ratified Conventions had been received. This was a very disappointing result, particularly in view of the fact that by decision of the Governing Body in 1993 the reporting obligations had been lightened through a lengthening of reporting periods. The intention had been to allow governments to fulfil their obligations more easily and more completely. The whole supervisory structure depended on their compliance with these obligations. However, this unsatisfactory outcome was not a reason to return to the old system. Indeed, the Committee of Experts should perhaps be more restrained in requesting additional reports. When requesting additional reports outside the normal reporting cycle, the Committee of Experts should take care not to increase the reporting burden on member States unduly, which would run counter to the Governing Body's decision of 1993. Where governments experienced difficulty in complying with their reporting obligations, they should request assistance from the MDTs.

21. The Worker members said that, as changes in the supervisory procedures were already in place, a first evaluation of the results could be made. The functioning of the supervisory system largely depended on reports being sent on time. In spite of the reform, the situation was not encouraging: the proportion of reports received at the end of the Committee of Experts' session decreased in comparison with previous years, continuing a negative trend; the great majority of reports arrived late, and the improvement registered in 1996 was not repeated. Reports were often incomplete, and an increasing number of the Committee of Experts' comments were left without reply: in many cases, as it appeared from the second part of its report, the Committee could not but repeat its previous observations. These failures by governments impeded the working of the whole of the supervisory system. This evaluation called for three remarks. First, the majority of the governments supplied reports, information and replies requested: this should be noted even if all governments had to respect their obligations in this respect. Secondly, the reform of 1993 was aimed at reducing the workload on national administrations by reducing the numbers of reports requested and concentrating supervision on specific problems of application; if, then, implementation of the reform did not enable concentration on the real problems, it made no contribution at all. Thirdly, the reform involved bringing forward the date of publication of the report of the Committee of Experts, in order to improve preparations for the Conference; but, if the Committee of Experts did not have the necessary information, preparation for the Conference became even more difficult. The Governing Body and the Committee of Experts should as soon as possible analyse the causes of this deterioration. The evaluation referred to by the representative of the Secretary-General, should take into account the impact that this may have on tripartite consultations at the national level during the preparation of reports. One could also inquire whether these malfunctions were to be explained by problems of timing or the workload on administrations; or whether they were also caused by structural reasons and linked to a lack of political commitment. As the Committee of Experts pointed out in its General Survey, labour administration had an essential role to play in ensuring observance of this obligation and therefore had to have at its disposal sufficient resources. The use of multidisciplinary teams suggested by the Committee of Experts in this connection should also be supported.

22. The Worker members noted the importance of the tripartite consultations on standards required by the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), and the ILO Constitution. The Committee of Experts observed that the number of ratifications of Convention No. 144 had doubled since the General Survey of 1982, and all countries ought to ratify it to implement the constitutional principle of tripartism. Similarly, the number of comments on governments' reports received from organizations of workers and, to a lesser extent, employers had been considerably increasing in recent years. In view of the lengthening of the reporting cycle, they now had a more important role because they could provoke a request for a report outside the normal cycle — something which was in fact happening more frequently.

23. In the Worker members' view, the attitude of certain governments which contemplate denouncing a Convention instead of constructively responding to the observations of the Committee of Experts, was a matter of concern. The denunciation by Brazil of Convention No. 158, which it ratified less than two years ago, was unacceptable and, as pointed out by the Committee of Experts, motivated in a contradictory manner. It pointed to the lack of due attention to social policy; and it was doubtless inspired by the fact that observations were transmitted to the Committee of Experts by the trade union organizations and that an article 24 representation was declared receivable by the Governing Body. None the less, observations and complaints were procedures foreseen by the Constitution of the ILO. Making use of these procedures was completely normal.

24. The Government member of Djibouti recalled the effect that economic crisis had on a developing country's ability not just to send reports but to participate as it would wish in ILO activities in general. The Government members of Sri Lanka and the United Republic of Tanzania both pointed to the delays experienced in obtaining information from different government agencies as causes of reporting failure. The latter reminded the Committee that several of the countries mentioned by the Committee of Experts in respect of obligations under articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution were plagued by internal strife: the Committee of Experts could in future consider referring to such problems, which go far beyond the mere financial, administrative and technical difficulties faced by other countries. The Worker member of the United Republic of Tanzania said that a tripartite approach along the lines of Convention No. 144 could help strengthen national labour ministries' capacity in regard to international labour standards. The Government member of Cuba remarked that the ILO's multidisciplinary teams could be especially effective in helping governments fulfil their reporting obligations, something which is so vital to the supervisory machinery.

25. The Government member of Kenya and the Worker member of Sweden endorsed the comments made in paragraph 94 of the Committee of Experts' report and called on all member States to ratify the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144).

26. The Worker members of the Netherlands and Sweden observed that, although the reporting burden on governments had been lightened, there seemed to be no improvement in performance: after the first detailed report, subsequent ones might only need to be quite brief, and the real burden involved in fulfilling these obligations was questioned. A Worker member of Germany stressed the importance of maintaining the power of the Committee of Experts to request reports outside the new five-year cycle applicable to most Conventions, although the Government member of Germany had reservations as to excessive use of that power. The Worker member of the Russian Federation said that governments' reports were often not copied to employers' and workers' organizations; and the Worker member of the United Kingdom called for governments' reports to be full and punctual, allowing the social partners time to consult and to make comments themselves.

27. Regarding ratification of the fundamental Conventions, the Government member of China thought that some promotional measures could be taken, but that the mere pursuit of numbers of ratifications gave rise to problems. Standards were of great significance to humanity and deserved universal acceptance by the international community, but cultural traditions, levels of economic development and the capacity for the observance of standards differed from country to country. The great majority of member States recognized the role of international labour standards in achieving international growth and social progress, but for developing countries the ratification and application of standards would be achieved step by step in the light of progress being made; it was not a good approach to exert pressure for uniformity, but instead to give practical assistance to developing countries in carrying out various standards-related activities, including promotional publicity, research, policy advice, formulating workplans for the ratification of Conventions, and assistance in the field of labour legislation. His Government had been making steady progress towards the ratification of standards, with assistance from the Office in recent years through lectures and seminars at both the provincial and national levels and training of officials and representatives of trade unions and employer groups. These efforts had produced notable effects as China had a greater understanding of international labour Conventions. Measures had been adopted for the revision of national laws and regulations so as to ensure the concrete implementation of ratified Conventions. Some problems remained: size and population presented serious constraints, the inspection machinery was hard to manage, and collecting statistical data was difficult. Yet broad prospects continued for cooperation between his Government and the ILO.

28. Several Worker members called for new ratifications. The Worker member of Thailand hoped his country would ratify the five unratified fundamental ILO Conventions. A Worker member of Brazil hoped the Republic of Korea would ratify the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Worker member of the Russian Federation hoped his country would ratify the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105). The Worker member of the Netherlands, with regard to the question of the ratification of international labour standards by the European Union, noted that decisions to ratify were taken by individual member States, and those who claimed that the countries in the European Union were facing similar problems with regard to the ratification of international instruments as federal States had misunderstood the situation.

29. As regards denunciations, the Worker member of New Zealand stated as to his own country's non-compliance with the Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42), that the Committee of Experts had been patiently urging the Government for the past 23 years to take the necessary steps to ensure full compliance. All that was needed was a minor legislative or policy step to introduce a presumptive schedule for certain occupational diseases. The Government had at times indicated that compliance was imminent, although it had not given effect to this commitment in practice. The situation was aggravated by the fact that the Government was now considering denunciation of the Convention. Protracted failure to comply with the provisions of ratified Conventions raised serious questions about the adequacy of the supervisory machinery. It had to be regarded as a very serious matter by the Conference Committee when any government which had ratified a Convention later decided to denounce it, despite its continued relevance in protecting workers. This was even more serious when denunciation was decided upon to avoid compliance and to avoid apparently unwelcome requests for action by the Committee of Experts. He therefore welcomed the suggestion by the Employer members that, where denunciation was being contemplated, contact should be made with the government concerned by ILO officials. Technical advice and assistance could well result in the avoidance of the unfortunate step of denunciation.

30. The Worker member of Brazil referred to paragraph 15 of the Committee of Experts' report and regretted that the Government of his country had denounced the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), claiming that this Convention encouraged collective disputes. The Government did not comply with the requirements of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), when it announced its decision to denounce by writing to the social partners after having taken the decision. The Government member of Brazil emphasized that the Government was dealing very seriously and correctly with the issues relating to observance of international labour standards: the denunciation of Convention No. 158 had been the result of legal and technical difficulties encountered in the course of its implementation and not because of the number of observations and criticisms formulated by workers' organizations, all of which had received an answer. He explained that prior to this denunciation, the principle of tripartite consultation had been respected, as had already been the case before the ratification of Convention No. 144.

31. The Government member of Germany said that both complaints and denunciations were perfectly legitimate. It would be preferable for States to modify legislation so as to comply with ratified Conventions; but governments would command more respect by resorting to denunciation than by aggressively contesting the findings of the supervisory bodies.

32. The Committee noted with interest information from Government members of the following countries regarding ratifications: Belgium (recent months had seen a move towards ratification of new Conventions, and ratification of the Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171), would be important for Belgium and the message it would send to the European Union); China (ratification of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), had been approved and the Government was actively promoting the ratification of Convention No. 138 and certain other Conventions); the Dominican Republic (although the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), had not yet been ratified, consultations were under way with the social partners and technical assistance had been requested of the ILO so as to proceed in the very near future with a study of the Convention and its eventual ratification; the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), and the Working Conditions (Hotels and Restaurants) Convention, 1991 (No. 172), had also been approved for ratification); Egypt (ratification of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), was envisaged for when the new Labour Act comes into force); the Gambia (was seriously considering ratifying certain key Conventions); Guinea-Bissau (his Government had already submitted to the competent national authorities for ratification the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and studies were currently being carried out to examine the possibility of ratifying the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138)); India (was engaged in the process of ratifying a number of other priority Conventions, including the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Maximum Weight Convention, 1967 (No. 127); and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), would be ratified in the near future); the Republic of Korea (his country was considering ratifying the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), and the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) in the near future; ratification of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), was envisaged soon, after further consultations with the Office); Lebanon (a committee established in 1996 in the Ministry of Labour with a view to examining unratified Conventions of the ILO and the Arab Labour Organization had contemplated the possible ratification of seven ILO Conventions which would soon be submitted to the competent authorities, most of which belonged to the category identified by the Governing Body as still being of importance); the Netherlands (a number of Conventions were currently being considered with a view to ratification, including the instruments adopted by the Maritime Conference); Portugal (the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), would be ratified shortly after the approval of Parliament, following a recent decision of the Council of Ministers; the ratifications of the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154), and the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), were envisaged); Syrian Arab Republic (the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), would be ratified when modifications of the legislation permitted).

International aspects of labour standards and human rights

33. The Employer members said that a traditional item in the report of the Committee of Experts was the contacts between the ILO and international and regional organizations concerning the implementation of human rights, and particularly on economic, social, cultural and political rights, the rights of children and minorities and protection against discrimination. This sharing of responsibility between the organizations of the United Nations system was to be welcomed. The ILO had to concentrate on its own instruments. The efforts of the Director-General to promote the ratification of the ILO's Conventions on basic human rights was also to be welcomed. These efforts had achieved some success.

34. The Worker members noted that, while standard setting in general and the application of standards in particular were at the heart of the debate at the Conference, they had also become the object of increased attention on the part of the Governing Body and other international organizations, including the World Trade Organization (WTO), with its Ministerial Conference in Singapore, and the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD). The work of the Governing Body on the revision of Conventions and the promotion of ratifications was characterized by the serenity and seriousness of the debate and the search for consensus, which the Worker members always considered to be of crucial importance. It was to be hoped that this work would be pursued in the same spirit of cooperation. The importance of the campaign for the promotion of the ratification of the Conventions concerning fundamental rights should also be stressed and the ILO commended for its efforts: 39 ratifications were registered following the letter of the Director-General and others were yet to come. This campaign should be pursued by means of sending out regular questionnaires to the member States asking to explain the reasons for not ratifying or postponing ratification, as well as by means of a specific technical assistance programme.

35. In the Worker members' view, despite positive developments, one had to note an incoherent attitude on the part of certain countries, enterprises and international organizations with respect to international labour standards and the objective of social justice. The Director-General, in his Report to the Conference, made a call on all the governments and international organizations to adopt a more coherent attitude. When the ministers of trade in Singapore highlighted the importance of ILO standards and objectives, ministers of finance should not approve actions and programmes in the International Monetary Fund (IMF) which contradicted those standards and objectives by increasing social exclusion and poverty and weakening systems for the administration of labour, health and education. It was the responsibility of the whole of the international community to ensure the coherence of social and economic options and to take tripartism seriously. It was disturbing to learn that certain countries tended to reject the Director-General's line of thought aimed at modernizing and strengthening standard-setting activities in conformity with the decision of the Copenhagen Summit for Social Development and with the Singapore Ministerial Declaration. On the contrary, governments should support efforts to strengthen the supervisory system and promote the fundamental Conventions. They also had to provide the ILO with the financial resources necessary for the accomplishment of its mandate in the present more complex world.

36. The Worker members considered that cooperation with other international organizations and other supervisory systems should be pursued and reinforced; it should be real and complementary and avoid any destructive competition. The ILO had the competence and the partners necessary to complete and reinforce the efforts of the international community in favour of human rights, as was demonstrated by the fact that the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child had recently recommended ratification of Convention No. 138.

37. The Government members of Belgium, India, the Netherlands, Portugal, Saudi Arabia and Sweden (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries) noted that the Singapore meeting had confirmed that the ILO was the appropriate body for setting and supervising labour standards. The Government member of Belgium said that, while it was important that other international institutions took an interest in labour standards, the ILO should maintain the upper hand in this debate since it enjoyed recognized expertise in the pertinent technical and political areas. The Government members of the Netherlands and India observed that protectionism had been clearly rejected at Singapore: the former stressed also the call for greater cooperation between the WTO and the ILO, while the latter pointed out that there was no justification in the Singapore Declaration for a second round of discussion to link trade and labour standards. The Government member of Saudi Arabia warned that the ILO should retain its full autonomy.

38. The Government member of Uganda reaffirmed the need for the ILO to continue its high-level and field contacts with United Nations agencies and the Bretton Woods institutions to sensitize them to ILO standards: World Bank and IMF representatives in Kampala had started consulting the Ministry of Labour and employers' and workers' organizations on labour-related matters, which was an encouraging development that should be further promoted. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya said new policies such as those set out by the IMF and the World Bank should not be introduced without preparation, otherwise there was a risk of negative consequences on, for example, conditions of work and social security systems. The Government member of Portugal thought the ILO should intensify its collaboration with various international organizations; and the Government member of Italy thought the present Committee a suitable channel for cooperation with UN bodies on these issues. The Government member of Guinea-Bissau was fully aware of the important role employers' and workers' organizations could play in seeking solutions to the social problems particularly of globalization.

39. The Government members of Brazil and Uganda supported the campaign initiated by the Director-General in 1995 as a follow-up to the Copenhagen Social Summit to promote the ratification of the fundamental ILO Conventions. The latter said it had been successful, but should not be limited to a few Conventions, as others were equally important, such as those concerning the protection and promotion of employment and working conditions and the environment; and such classification might give the wrong signal as regards the relationship between the so-called core Conventions and others. The Government member of Cuba was pleased that the Committee of Experts did not ignore its responsibility concerning Conventions on employment policy, social security, occupational safety and health, and the protection of wages, which were sometimes set aside due to, among other reasons, flexibility and deregulation of the labour market: even though they did not appear in the list of core Conventions, the nature of the rights protected in them had a direct bearing on social development, and one should not underestimate them. For the representative of Education International, too, the section in the Committee of Experts' report highlighting the Conventions on employment, social security, safety and health and protection of wages was a compelling refutation of those who argued that the ILO should focus only on the fundamental Conventions.

40. Several individual Worker members enlarged on their group statement, especially as regards the ILO's role in respect of trade union and other basic rights (for example, Worker members of Colombia, Guatemala, Paraguay, the United Kingdom). The Worker member of Argentina recalled the important work of the ILO's tripartite Committee on Freedom of Association, especially as regards complaints against Latin American countries occasioned by aggressive, neo-liberal policies. A Worker member of Germany stressed the indivisibility of civil and political, economic, social and cultural rights and the close relationship that should be maintained with UN and regional — especially European — organizations: the standards supervisory system was an important feature of international law on human rights. The Worker member of Italy called for the adaptation of international labour standards to the process of globalization, with guidelines as to how the Committee of Experts' comments could be satisfied. The Worker member of Pakistan said care had to be taken not to bow to the economic pressures brought by the World Bank and the IMF, whose programmes did not always take into account the basic rights of workers: the ILO's responsibility was to help ensure a safety net for workers affected by structural adjustment and deregulation imposed by the Bretton Woods institutions — a sentiment echoed by the Worker member of Senegal, who remarked that respect for international labour Conventions was essential also for democracy. The Worker member of Burkina Faso drew attention to the threat to women and other workers in countries where the World Bank and the IMF forced reversal of labour codes towards greater flexibility and precariousness of employment: cooperation with the WTO should be reinforced to ensure that globalization did not result in marginalization of the poorest countries. The Worker member of the Netherlands pointed out that in the follow-up to the Beijing Conference a gender perspective should be integrated into all ILO programmes and projects, so as to promote equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women workers. The representative of Education International said that workers were prepared to grasp globalization with both hands as the Employer members urged, so long as they were full partners in the process and it occurred within a framework where at least the fundamental labour Conventions were respected. And a Worker member of Brazil noticed that the countries which at the Singapore ministerial meeting had insisted the most that the ILO was the competent organization to deal with standards-related questions were the ones criticized most frequently by this Committee: the Worker member of the United Kingdom said that governments which supported the ILO's role when speaking in Singapore must be consistent and give the ILO the means to do the job.

Export processing zones

41. The Employer members noted that, in view of the scarcity of available information, the comments by the Committee of Experts in previous years on this subject had been more of an informative nature, while this year's comments appeared more positive in approach. They now welcomed the establishment of a special ILO action programme under which studies would be carried out on social and labour factors and on the success of these zones. They looked forward to the results of these studies, which were due to be published later in the year.

42. The Worker members were very concerned by the development of export processing zones, which often became law-free zones either because the social legislation was not applied or because there was total absence both of supervision and of workers' organizations, the functioning and even existence of which were not accepted. Such zones aimed at attracting foreign investment by making more and more concessions under pressure of competition. Some multinational enterprises were exercising considerable pressure on governments so that they did not ratify or did not apply the ILO Conventions. It was to be hoped that the ILO through its special action programme on social questions in export processing zones would continue to monitor the situation in the field together with the Committee of Experts.

43. Several members expressed approval of the ILO's current activities in relation to the zones, including the comments of the Committee of Experts. The Government members of Kenya and the United Republic of Tanzania both described their governments' intention to respect workers' rights in the zones, the former urging employers to follow a "best practice" approach to improve conditions, as in Kenya. The Worker members of Costa Rica and Nicaragua nevertheless drew attention to violation of workers' rights — especially those of women — in export processing zones. The Government member of the Dominican Republic said that child labour did not exist in export processing zones in his country: the Labour Code was applied there, where 170,000 workers were employed. Trade unions were recognized in the zones and collective agreements had been signed. In order to resolve the problems that had been encountered in the past, the Government had helped in arriving at a tripartite agreement on basic workers' rights, the creation of a tripartite committee for the harmonization of labour relations which would have the responsibility for receiving complaints of violations of freedom of association, and a tripartite committee for the realization of social benefits. This meant that the workers in the export processing zones enjoyed the same respect for their rights as workers in any other enterprise outside the zone.

Representations procedure under article 24 of the Constitution

44. The Employer members noted that the Committee of Experts referred to the large number of representations concerning violations of ratified Conventions. The number of representations submitted had increased over recent years, as had the number of cases brought before the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body. There were a number of reasons for the use of these procedures, even though the cases involved might perhaps be dealt with adequately under normal reporting procedures. They placed a great burden on the Office, but there was little evidence that they were much more effective than the regular supervisory work of the Committee of Experts. By bringing national disputes to an international body it was often hoped to obtain advantages at the national level. Suggestions that the procedures were being abused were borne out, for example, by cases in which representations were submitted even before a Convention had entered into force in the country concerned. The criteria for examining whether cases were conclusive and therefore admissible under these special procedures should be applied more strictly and therefore more restrictively.

45. The Worker members attached great importance to the procedures of complaint and representation, which were the necessary complement to the mechanism of supervision based on regular reports and guaranteed access of workers to the supervisory system. The more frequent recourse to these procedures was linked to the more active role of the workers' and employers' organizations resulting from the changes in the reporting cycle, as well as from the efforts of the ILO and its constituents to give more training in the ILO procedures to workers' organizations, in particular by the wide distribution of the Handbook of procedures. It was also the consequence of the structural reforms of the labour market brought about by the liberalization of international trade, which often had a negative incidence on the application of standards, even if the standards left a great latitude to governments and social partners as to the articulation of the social policy. To limit the use of these procedures to the fundamental or priority Conventions would be unacceptable. The particular attention which, no doubt, should be accorded to the respect of fundamental standards should not serve as a pretext to close out everything but those instruments. This reasoning applied also to the work of this Committee: the Worker members and the Employer members, supported by certain Government members, had always considered that the choice of individual cases to be discussed should include Conventions considered to be more "technical". The Worker members were in favour of the more effective use of procedures and the strengthening of their complementarity, and it was not at the present moment, when the ILO was seeking to reinforce its supervisory system and ensure greater respect for its standards and constitutional principles, that doubt should be cast on procedures which had proved their effectiveness.

46. The Worker member of the United States suggested that the increase in numbers of article 24 cases could be a reflection of a troubling pattern of non-compliance by governments with their obligations under ratified Conventions; or it could reflect that the number of individual cases reviewed by this Committee had been declining in recent years, with the result that workers looked beyond the normal machinery to other ILO mechanisms, such as the article 24 procedure, as the best way to persuade governments to meet their obligations.

Submission to the competent authorities

47. The Worker members shared the concerns expressed by the Committee of Experts over the problems of submission, because it was indispensable that national parliaments be informed of the work of the ILO. The Committee of Experts usefully recalled in paragraph 134 of its report the scope of the obligation to submit the instruments adopted. From their side, the Worker members would also denounce in the plenary sitting the countries listed in paragraph 138 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts, which had not respected this obligation with respect to the instruments adopted during the last seven sessions of the Conference.

48. In response to a question from the Government member of Lebanon, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that all Conventions which had not been formally abrogated under any new procedure adopted by the Conference were still subject to the normal submission obligation, and could indeed still be ratified. The proposal before the Conference was that Recommendations accompanying Conventions should have the same treatment as regards abrogation.

49. The Government member of Portugal asked for statistics as to developments regarding the breach of submission obligations. The Worker member of Sweden pointed to many serious violations of the submission obligation and reminded governments of the need to include in the process concrete proposals whether to ratify the Conventions concerned. The Government member of Kenya recommended that countries in breach of the obligation should urgently seek the Office's technical assistance.

Sanctions in national law

50. The Employer members emphasized that sanctions were only applicable where the Convention in question expressly envisaged them. In other cases, it was for each member State to decide the manner in which it would give effect to the provisions of ratified Conventions. In spite of the Committee of Experts' statement that it did take into consideration the discussion in the present Committee, the Employer members did not find a proper answer to their concern. However, in the Committee of Experts' previous report the Experts specified that where violations of basic human rights were concerned, penal sanctions had to be contemplated, especially when sanctions were provided for by the relevant ILO Conventions. According to the Employer members, this implied that penal sanctions could not be appropriate in the case of all Conventions but only for those Conventions that provided for sanctions. This clarification did not appear in this year's report of the Experts so that sanctions to ensure observance of the provision of the Conventions were required in a general and unrestricted manner. Furthermore, they wondered why in this context, the term "basic human rights", which had been used for years, had been replaced last year by the term "basic workers' rights". This was not in conformity with the present standards system. The Committee of Experts should consider this issue thoroughly.

51. The Government member of Germany was opposed to the idea in paragraph 128 of the Committee of Experts' report that ratifying States must use sanctions, including penal sanctions, to ensure conformity with measures contained in Conventions even where such sanctions were not specifically laid down.

52. The Worker members said that the criticisms addressed to the Committee of Experts by the Employer members concerning the question of sanctions raised in paragraph 128 of the report of the Committee of Experts seemed to result from a confusion with the analysis contained in the report of the previous year because the statements in this year's report were more general and did not deal specifically with the question of penal sanctions. A Worker member of Germany supported the conclusion of the Committee of Experts concerning the adoption of sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, in particular where the fundamental rights of workers were involved: he thought such sanctions authorized by article 19 of the Constitution of the ILO, even if there were no express provisions in the Convention concerned.

Technical cooperation relating to standards

53. The Employer members noted that a number of planned seminars and training activities had had to be cancelled due to budgetary constraints. However, as in the past, they welcomed the many activities that had been undertaken, and particularly those involving the multidisciplinary advisory teams (MDTs). They called for future reports of the Committee of Experts to contain more information on the feedback from such work received by headquarters.

54. The Worker members said that budgetary constraints should not slow down activities of standards promotion, which were increasingly solicited in view of the globalization of the economy, reform of labour and employment policies and the effort for democratization in certain countries. The International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC), which was principally financed from extra-budgetary resources, was a good example of the practical activities accompanying the implementation of standards; it could serve as a model to promote the application of other standards as well. On the other hand, regretfully only six out of 14 multidisciplinary teams had specialists on standards, in spite of the constant requests by the Worker members in the Governing Body. This situation should be improved as soon as possible.

55. The Government members of China, Cuba, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, the Gambia, Guinea-Bissau, Kenya and the United Republic of Tanzania all spoke in praise of the technical assistance they had received in relation to international labour standards, especially through respective multidisciplinary teams (MDTs). The Government member of Kenya pointed out that now only six out of 14 MDTs included standards specialists, whereas those teams are vital to the process of formulating and executing country objectives; and he welcomed in this light the Governing Body's coming review of the Active Partnership Policy. The Government members of Lebanon and Saudi Arabia particularly called for the post of standards specialist in the Beirut MDT to be filled: the latter noted that technical assistance for standard-setting activities had been reduced due to financial constraints, but, as it was of particular importance for developing countries to benefit from all the different types of technical assistance that the ILO could offer in order to help them in complying with their obligations related to ratified Conventions, he hoped that technical assistance would be reinstated. He expressed the wish that the staff of the International Labour Standards Department would be involved in these activities to an even greater extent than at present and supported the work of the Arab States Regional Office and the Beirut MDT. The Employer member of the Islamic Republic of Iran was glad of the seminar recently held in his country on human rights standards; the Government member of Uganda looked forward to a coming seminar in his country which aimed at improving ratification and implementation of the human rights Conventions. The Government members of Djibouti (regarding labour legislation and tripartism) and Sri Lanka (regarding application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81)), and the Worker member of the Russian Federation (regarding the application of fundamental Conventions) also stressed the need for further technical assistance.

Questions concerning the application of particular Conventions

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

56. The Employer members said that the comments of the Committee of Experts were based on reports from 29 member States, although it was not clear when the reports had been submitted or the periods that they covered. Although the Employer members had never denied that Convention No. 122 was of particular importance, there was a series of other important Conventions which were not analysed in this way in the report. With regard to Convention No. 122, the comments of the Committee of Experts were critical and somewhat pessimistic. Such pessimism was an outdated pedagogical approach. A more modern approach would be based on praise. There could be no doubt that the achievement of full, productive and freely chosen employment was a fundamental ILO policy and should remain so. In view of the problems experienced concerning labour markets, it was necessary to examine all means of action in terms of their impact on employment. The Committee of Experts' analysis of labour market problems was confined to international competition, globalization and the process of the transition to a market economy in some countries. However, the Employer members pointed to other undeniable causes of labour market difficulties, including over-regulation, the inflexibility of the legal framework, the desire to defend acquired rights and, frequently, high taxation and high labour costs which were a burden to employers. The Employer members emphasized that employment policy could not be implemented in isolation and needed to be coordinated with other important social and economic policies. The various policy areas were interrelated. At this time of great change, it was therefore incomprehensible that only the social sector should remain unchanged. Moreover, the so-called problems cited by the Committee of Experts, such as higher levels of competition, globalization and the transition to a market economy, could also have a positive effect through the employment and social opportunities that they created. The success of enterprises and therefore the existence of jobs depended on the quality of the products and services produced, which in turn depended on the skill of the workers and management. The value of an enterprise was therefore determined by the manner in which its products and services were perceived by its clients in a competitive environment. The free market represented an opportunity rather than a threat and the positive effects of competition could benefit everybody. However, too many people believed in regulation, rather than establishing rules for fair competition, which included minimum social standards. In this context, the Employer members noted the emergence of new forms of employment, including part-time work and fixed-term contracts. They added that in many countries the demand for part-time work was greater than the supply. For example, for various reasons, workers, and particularly many women, preferred to work part time for a number of reasons. Nevertheless, many who wanted to work part time had to accept full-time employment, or remain unemployed. The challenge was to work towards a better balance of supply and demand.

57. The Employer members stated that labour markets were changing rapidly with the advent of new and different forms of employment, which took into account different needs, including those of workers. The situation had changed from the traditional approach of everyone working the same number of hours a week at the same time each day. The needs of industry had meant that the situation was now much more complex, but offered a broader range of employment opportunities. However, the Employer members could not accept that workers should be the only ones to have the right to change from part-time to full-time work whenever they so wished. Nor was it in line with the real situation for the Committee of Experts to say that all workers only wanted to obtain traditional full-time work. It was fully in line with the wishes of the workers for different forms of employment. Such cases did not constitute a failure to give effect to the objectives of the Convention, since the concepts involved were no longer the same as they had been at the time that the Convention was adopted. Some countries had reduced the working week, for example to 35 or 32 hours a week, which was a level that would be considered part-time work in other countries. Although the Committee of Experts had admitted that the concept of full employment might be different in developing countries, the Employer members considered that this difference applied in all countries. Nevertheless, they agreed with the Committee of Experts that the major challenge was to create a large number of jobs which provided a livelihood for all workers. Although the Committee of Experts praised the Republic of Korea and Hong Kong for the progress that they had made in achieving full employment, it did not analyse the reasons for their success. The Employer members believed that there were good grounds for praising other larger countries for their achievements in this respect. In particular, those countries which had accepted the challenges of globalization had been successful in promoting employment and had experienced fewer employment problems.

58. The Worker members said that the Committee of Experts should be commended on the coherence of its approach and the quality of its observations; it should also be encouraged to continue the dialogue with the present Committee, both with respect to general trends and on individual cases. The paragraphs of its General Report this year supplemented the previous year's and had to be examined with particular attention. One should recall that the promotion and application of this Convention was the top priority of the ILO, as attested by the conclusions of the Conference of 1996 concerning the policy of full employment in the globalized economy, the new World Employment Report, the declaration of the Copenhagen Summit, and the placing on the agenda of the present session of the Conference of the question of the contribution of small and medium-sized enterprises to employment creation. Contrary to the opinion expressed last year by the Employer members, the Committee of Experts has not gone beyond the terms of the Convention in determining the more specific notions and obligations resulting from it, nor had it shown reticence in the face of the economic globalization or the transition to the market economy; but it confined its position to objective presentation of the facts. The World Employment Report and the Director-General's Report on the standards activities also concluded that liberalization of international trade did not lead automatically to social progress and equality of opportunities and that it did not reduce social exclusion and poverty. Member States should develop an overall policy to stimulate employment and promote equal opportunities and the application of standards. The Committee of Experts underlined in this respect the need to keep the objective of full employment in mind when determining micro-economic policies, though this, regretfully, was not always done: too many governments still limited their intervention to labour market policies and flexibility.

The Committee of Experts explained also that full employment remained a valid objective for all countries, even if the Convention permitted using different means and strategies to attain this goal. The Committee strove to promote better understanding of the obligations under the Convention in terms of full employment, free choice of employment, productive employment and consultation with organizations of workers and employers. It was quite right in suggesting that a link could be established between its comments on the application of the Convention in individual cases and the country employment reviews undertaken as a follow-up to the Copenhagen Summit, as well as with the studies of the impact of the liberalization of international trade. Finally, the Committee of Experts stressed the importance of resolute action in favour of employment and the institution of a legal framework in conformity with the obligations under the Convention, with reference also to Convention No. 150.

59. Several Government members expressed agreement with the Committee of Experts' comments as to full, productive and freely chosen employment. The Government member of Kenya was glad that this had remained the goal of the ILO, which should continue to play the role assigned it by the Copenhagen Summit. The Government member of Sweden (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries) also welcomed the emphasis on the human aspects of employment brought out by the ILO, while the Government member of Italy noted the positive impact of human rights observance on employment possibilities. The Government member of Portugal placed the debate in the context of the current Conference's discussion of employment in small and medium-sized enterprises and the need to integrate employment and training policies and programmes. The Government member of Germany considered that the Committee of Experts' general comments concerning employment policy were unconvincing and warned especially against too severe a criticism of fixed-term contracts, which could evolve into permanent ones. The Government member of Belgium stressed the importance of examining how the supervisory machinery could be relocated at the heart of the ILO's activities in the field of employment, taking into account developments in certain labour markets: he questioned the continued relevance of certain standards concerning employment in a situation where the traditional employment relationship between employer and workers was opening up, the employer being further removed, for example through multinational groupings, and with increasing subcontracting. To this was added the precarious working situation of numerous workers in the most industrialized States; higher value should be given to individuals' desire to work, so as to take into account their creativity at all levels, without restricting the work relationship to two legal entities, and providing increased legal protection, for example, by allowing contracts to be entered into with a collective.

60. The Government member of the Dominican Republic described the positive experience in his country, where a tripartite commission on employment, alongside a free employment service, had been created: through modern technology, job trafficking had thus been eliminated. As regards security of employment, the Government member of Sri Lanka said his country was experiencing difficulties in the wake of liberalization of the economy and the process of globalization, with new investors entering the country as well as local industrialists seeking relaxed labour laws and industrial peace for smooth operation of industries and enterprises. The most disturbing legislation, in investors' opinion, was the Termination of Employment of Workmen Act (No. 45) of 1971 which concerned unjust dismissal of workers: creation of new employment, they argued, had become prohibitive, as the law restricted termination of workers at the will of the employer; employment generation would become possible with free mobility of labour which was not restricted by artificially created provisions entrenched in legislation; and they argued that rigid labour laws were counterproductive not only to employment generation but also for productivity. What should be discussed was the suitability of this line of thinking for developing economies including Sri Lanka, and how labour standards fit in. No labour standards expressly or implicitly negated productivity or employment, and perhaps no economy could thrive without industrial peace and labour standards.

61. The Government member of India said that in his country the majority of the workforce worked in the unorganized and informal sectors, where legal standards were only of distant relevance. The major problems of workers in these sectors were unemployment, underemployment and intermittent employment, as well as inadequate income and access to the basic amenities of life. There were few grounds for expecting any meaningful change in this situation in the near future, despite the commitment made by governments at the Social Summit to adopt a policy to achieve full, productive and freely chosen employment for all. Without minimizing the importance of standard-setting activities, equal or greater emphasis therefore needed to be given to operational activities in order to maximize employment opportunities. In this context, he suggested that the bleak employment situation, described in the ILO's report World Employment, should be considered by the Conference Committee so that it could obtain an overall perspective that would make its work more objective. India was nevertheless in the process of ratifying Convention No. 122.

62. The Worker member of China agreed with the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning employment policy. With the active efforts of Chinese trade unions, the Chinese Government had taken the decision to ratify Convention No. 122. Globalization was advancing very rapidly and unemployment and property were major challenges throughout the world. Problems related to unemployment and employment were much more severe in the developing countries than the industrialized countries. The ILO therefore needed to focus its assistance on developing countries. Since the opening-up of its economy, China had created 200 million new jobs. However, the Chinese population was also growing rapidly and more employment was required. In China, the vocational training schools provided skills for the workforce and the employment agencies within the trade union movement endeavoured to find them jobs. There was a need for greater cooperation between the ILO and trade unions to promote the implementation of employment policy measures and increase employment throughout the world.

63. Other Worker members raised particular aspects of the employment question. The Worker member of the United Kingdom warned that part-time employment was not always the free choice of women workers, but often meant poverty pay in a dead-end job with no training prospects. Worker members of Colombia and Costa Rica pointed to the cost in jobs of structural adjustment policies and false restructuring. A Worker member of Germany also observed the negative effects on employment of international monetary policies, while noting the beneficial effect of partnership between labour and capital in improving competitivity and employment. Failure to apply Convention No. 122 had an important negative effect on the application of other ILO standards. He and the Worker member of Argentina wished for more detailed analysis of these issues.

64. The Worker members were glad that the Committee of Experts' analysis of employment policies had been welcomed and several Government members had recognized that the pressure of competition and the constant search for low labour costs were a threat to labour law and social protection. The Employer members were right to emphasize that employment policy should not be separated from economic and social policy as a whole.

65. The Employer members reaffirmed that they and almost everybody else believed in the effectiveness of the market economy. Rather than the absence of enforced unemployment, full employment was a level of employment where all those who were actively seeking work could find it, in line with the discussions of the Committee on Employment in the last Conference. They also emphasized that the trend towards deregulation, which was occurring at different rates in different countries, had as its root cause the development of too high a level of regulation in recent years. They believed in the fundamental objectives of the ILO. Their disagreement with some speakers in this respect concerned the means by which these objectives were to be achieved. By way of illustration, it was unsound practice to deal first with the distribution of wealth, while only addressing as a subordinate question the manner in which it was produced. Those countries which developed the best responses to employment issues would be those that faced up to the new global situation, and especially global competition. The priority objective was to create more employment. Attention should therefore be focused on the most rapid way in which the resources needed for the economy as a whole could be produced in future, as a basis for improving the social situation.

Conventions on social security

66. The Employer members thought that, in its comments on the generalization of the process of reform in social security, the Committee of Experts had painted a negative impression of rising contributions and falling benefits. The Committee of Experts had emphasized the dangers involved in the privatization of social security systems, but the comments were somewhat naive and lacked understanding of the real needs for reform. The proportion of GDP required to finance social security systems was constantly increasing. As a result the financial limits had been exceeded in many States. This was a result of many years of one-sided development in which no consideration had been given to the fact that everything could not be provided by collective welfare systems without reform measures. Moreover, the demographic developments in many countries have had a major impact on social security systems. The privatization of such systems could ensure that they were more effective. The Committee of Experts referred to the flexibility contained in recent social security standards. But the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), which was now 45 years old, was in need of such flexibility. Indeed, far from their action being premature or hasty, as suggested by the Committee of Experts, many governments had reacted too late to avoid the problems faced by social security systems. It was now time to get back on course and ensure sustainable core provisions in the social security system.

67. The Worker members stated that the Committee of Experts noted the more general, profound and accelerated character of the process of reform in social security. This Committee had already discussed the serious problems of application in this area at previous sessions. The Committee of Experts recalled that, while these standards were drafted in flexible terms, the fundamental principles of organization and administration of social security systems should be respected in all circumstances. Reform and partial or total privatization of certain branches of social security should take account of the international standards. In its conclusions the previous year on one individual case, this Committee requested the government concerned to ratify Convention No. 128 and denounce Convention No. 35; it also discussed the fundamental principles of the organization and management of social security schemes, including the participation of workers in their management and the general responsibility of the State in the provision of benefits and administration of schemes. These principles were essential in any social security system, whether private, semi-private or public. Substantial reforms should not be engaged in a hasty manner, because it was extremely difficult to correct them later.

68. The Government member of Germany, supported by the Worker members of Swaziland and the United Kingdom, said that privatization has no place in social security. The Employer member of the Islamic Republic of Iran stated that employers were not supposed to bear all of the social security costs: governments and the whole of society should also participate in financing social security. A Worker member of Germany expressed surprise at the comments by the Employer members that Convention No. 102 was inflexible: only three out of the Convention's nine parts had to be accepted, and the Convention required only a low level of social coverage; there was danger in increased pressure on countries, particularly developing ones, to reduce already low levels of social spending; and privatization of social security systems reduced solidarity, ultimately benefiting the few while leaving whole sectors of the population unprotected. Insured persons were at risk from inflation and bankruptcy of private institutions, which was a fairly frequent occurrence; and private systems did not necessarily reduce the overall cost of social benefits. Improved economic performance and social security could be complementary. Social benefits were a fundamental requirement for the peaceful settlement of social disputes.

69. The Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania concurred with the Committee of Experts concerning revision of social security legislation. His country was transforming its National Provident Fund into a comprehensive social security scheme along the lines of Convention No. 102 and had been spared the social confrontations experienced in other countries, mentioned in paragraph 66 of the report, though there were debates between the various stakeholders. To ensure broad participation, a round-table discussion was convened which incorporated the social partners, the ILO, the International Social Security Association (ISSA) and other countries which had successfully made such transformation. Subsequently, ratification of the relevant ILO social security Conventions would be possible.

70. The Worker members noted that the Committee of Experts' analysis of the risks of privatization of basic social security systems had been broadly supported in the Committee. The Employer members could understand why the subject of the privatization of social security provision was so emotive, particularly in countries where social security systems had been in force for many years. They emphasized that they were not suggesting the privatization of all the components of social security systems. However, there were areas in which privatization could be of great benefit in making social security more efficient and less expensive. A good example was health insurance, where private provision was already very common in many countries. The same trend was evident in pensions systems, where the private sector was taking over a greater share of the market, thereby reducing the burden on the State. Enterprise retirement schemes were a good example of how private provision could supplement public systems. Clearly, the State had to determine the framework conditions for private operation, including for contingencies such as bankruptcy. The private provision of social benefits had proven to be successful and secure. It complemented state social security schemes, rather than replacing them. The trend would undoubtedly continue.

Conventions on occupational safety and health

71. The Employer members agreed that the standards were very technical and detailed. They believed that this was the major reason for the difficulties experienced in their implementation and observance at the national level.

72. The Worker members said the Committee of Experts' comments on these Conventions had the merit of attracting attention to the problems of application in general. Firstly, the Committee of Experts highlighted the relation between regional standards, such as those adopted by the European Union, and more universal standards. The Worker members shared the opinion that the incorporation of regional standards, such as the European Directives, into national legislation was not always sufficient to give effect to ILO standards. In this respect the majority of the regional rules established minimum standards which did not prevent member States from introducing and maintaining higher levels of protection. Member States of the European Union and other regional organizations should also ratify ILO standards and not limit themselves to implementing regional standards, which should at least offer a level of protection equal to that of the international standards. The Committee of Experts also stressed the crucial importance of the practical application of standards in this area. The adoption of legal texts should be followed by a set of coordinated measures to ensure effective protection of workers. Consultation of workers' and employers' organizations during the elaboration and implementation of texts was indispensable. The proposal of the Committee of Experts for making better use of technical cooperation should be supported. It also observed that the government reports did not often contain complete information in this area, particularly statistics concerning occupational accidents and diseases.

73. The Government member of Kenya underlined the need for tripartite advisory bodies on this subject, with a programme of training and information for workers and their participation in the drafting and evaluation of legal provisions. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic referred in this context to ILO/UNDP assistance received by his country.

Wage protection

74. The Employer members emphasized that it was unacceptable that workers in Eastern Europe, Africa or Latin America should not receive their wages, or receive only partial wages, over a period of months or years. Although they agreed with the Committee of Experts that the situations in question might have their origin in economic and financial difficulties the blame for such problems could not be placed on the transition to a market economy, unless the transition had been incomplete or defective. Situations in which workers were not paid or were paid late were not typical of free labour markets. An improvement in this situation would not be achieved by the ratification of new Conventions, but rather through the adoption of practical measures to improve the performance of national economies.

75. The Worker members said the present Committee regularly discussed the application of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), in individual cases. The transition of economies, structural adjustment policies, negligence or the general climate of non-respect of law were often at the root of serious problems having disastrous social and economic consequences. The conclusions of the Committee of Experts on supervision, sanctions and remedies for loss were very pertinent and should be supported.

76. The Government members of Germany and Kenya referred to the seriousness of the wages issue: the former attributed the problem to transition to a market economy, the responsibility lying with the earlier dirigiste governments. The Worker members of Guatemala raised the question of grave violations in their country, while the Employer member of Guatemala referred to the role of tripartism in settling such issues. The Worker member of the Russian Federation agreed with the Committee of Experts in paragraphs 71-73 of its report: non-payment or late payment of wages in Central and Eastern Europe and in Africa and Latin America breached one of the fundamental rights of workers and seriously increased poverty, while reducing chances of building civil and democratic society. He said governments rarely created legal structures which aimed at applying this Convention in practice, and in the Russian Federation this had affected almost 80 per cent of the population: total unpaid wages exceeded 9 billion US dollars. He hoped that the Committee would examine this problem in an efficient manner, in view of the Committee of Experts' opinion that there should be not only appropriate sanctions to punish and prevent infringements, but also strict enforcement against those who take advantage of economic situations to commit abuses.

Child labour and forced labour

77. The Employer members supported all measures taken to combat forced labour and the exploitation of child labour, particularly in the form of child prostitution and pornography, which had become a problem of international dimensions. Concrete action needed to be taken to alleviate these evils and to identify the reasons behind them, which normally had their roots in poverty and the absence of prospects for self-improvement. Special campaigns were a more appropriate means of combating these problems than the development of new standards. In this context, they reaffirmed their support for the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC).

78. The Worker members recalled the Committee of Experts' view expressed in 1994 on forced child labour and particularly the sexual exploitation of children and trafficking in children. These concerns called for resolute action to fight such practices. Certain countries had taken measures to punish acts of exploitation of children committed abroad and other countries should be encouraged to follow this example. Notwithstanding the recent resolution of the Conference concerning the prohibition of child labour, the IPEC programme and the preparation of the new Convention starting from 1998, there was still a lot to be done in this area.

79. Several Government members (Belgium, Canada, Egypt, Equatorial Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Kenya, the Netherlands) expressed their concern as to the problem of child labour and their support for ILO activities in that field. The Government members of Canada, India and the Netherlands hoped for an effective new Convention on child labour in 1999; the Government members of Egypt, Guinea-Bissau and the Netherlands also drew attention to the value of the existing Convention No. 138 and favoured its ratification and implementation. The Committee was informed of the gap in coverage of the child labour problem between the Forced Labour Convention (No. 29) and the Minimum Age Convention (No. 138), and the still relatively low number of ratifications of the latter, which, at a time of heightened international awareness of the problem, were the occasion for the possible adoption of new standards in the ILO.

80. The Government member of Egypt observed that it was often only economic and financial difficulties which prevent developing countries from ratifying Convention No. 138. The Government member of the Dominican Republic thought ILO figures might be exaggerated: in his country child labour persisted in the informal sector, but the Government was implementing programmes for its suppression on a tripartite and interministerial basis and with IPEC help. The Government member of Equatorial Guinea stressed the risk to children under 15 in particular: child slavery arose from the exploitation of poverty in many countries. The Government member of Lebanon remarked that 1996 legislation in her country absolutely prohibited the employment of children under 13.

81. The Worker members of Argentina, Italy, Nicaragua, Pakistan, Swaziland and the United Kingdom and the representative of Education International all called for intensified action at the international and national levels against child labour. International cooperation was desperately needed to stop child sex tourism and the trafficking of children for forced sex labour. The Worker member of Nicaragua pointed to the long hours sometimes worked by girls in particular. The representative of Education International detailed the need for comprehensive government strategy including legislation, enforcement, free, compulsory and good quality basic education, transition education programmes for children who had been labourers and income support and generation programmes for families. She applauded those governments which were taking action often in the most difficult economic circumstances and those governments that were supporting action particularly through the ILO's IPEC programme. The Worker members of Italy and Pakistan mentioned the role of tripartism and unions in fighting and finding funding for the campaign against child labour. The latter welcomed initiatives in his country in cooperation with the ILO, UNICEF and employers for the education of children formerly employed in the sports industry; and to establish "RUGMARK" Inspection International on a tripartite basis to help deal with the child labour problem.

82. The Government member of the United States urged the Committee of Experts, when reviewing article 19 reports due next year on the application of Convention No. 29, to take an objective look at emerging trends in privately operated prisons and increased opportunities for private employment by prison inmates. This, he said, was a growing trend in many member States which took into consideration the best interests of both the prisoners and the public and the Committee of Experts needed to consider what constituted permissible involvement of the private sector in prison labour today and an adequate level of supervision and control by the public authorities. The Worker member of the United States strongly supported this request: the use of prison labour by private employers was a growth industry in the United States, being promoted by the Justice Department as a cost-effective alternative to workforces found in Mexico, the Caribbean Basin, South-East Asia and Pacific Rim countries. He noted that by the year 2000 prison industries' sales would be some 9 billion US dollars; prisoners received 15 to 50 cents per hour for the 4.6 million hours they worked in a single year and were largely exempt from minimum wage laws and other legal protection and had no collective bargaining rights. The trade union movement was becoming increasingly concerned about this growing practice in the country and the threat it posed to labour standards. The Committee was informed that the Committee of Experts had decided to consider the matter further in its review of special article 19 reports on the forced labour Conventions at its next session.

The Report of the Director-General:
The ILO, standard setting and globalization

83. The Employer members said that, although the report of the Committee of Experts contained no detailed comments on the ILO's general standard-setting policy, this subject was covered by the Director-General's Report to the Conference on The ILO, standard setting and globalization. The Employer members had been calling for such a discussion for many years. The poor response to recent standards meant that it was necessary to examine closely the ILO's standard-setting system and the causes of non-compliance with the standards that were adopted. The Conference Committee had discussed this issue two years ago. It was an important development that nobody now believed that everything was perfect in the system and that no changes were required. Moreover, no one seriously believed that the production of as many new standards as possible was the most important task of the Organization. Indeed the present stock of international labour standards needed careful review, particularly with regard to obsolete Conventions that were no longer applied. There was also an urgent need to revise many standards. Unfortunately, the Employer members had gained the impression that the pace of this work was slowing down, which would have a negative impact on the image and effectiveness of the ILO. It was essential to avoid the ILO becoming a cemetery for labour standards that were no longer of any use. It was also necessary to fill the gap in the ILO Constitution so that obsolete Conventions could be abrogated.

84. In the Employer members' view, only such new standards as were absolutely necessary should be developed. Instead, greater emphasis should be placed on the more important objectives of creating jobs and combating unemployment. Where standards were adopted, they should not necessarily take the form of a Convention, but could consist of Recommendations, guidelines or codes of conduct. Where a decision was taken to elaborate a new Convention, it should always be confined to general principles. In a context in which a rapid response was required to changing circumstances, detailed provisions were an obstacle to the ratification and implementation of international labour standards. Moreover, the Employer members warned against including in Recommendations provisions upon which agreement had not been reached with regard to Conventions. Such practices discredited the value of Recommendations.

85. The Employer members noted that the Director-General's Report contained other valuable ideas concerning the development of standards, including greater involvement of member States and the social partners, better designed questionnaires and a better discussion of the substance in various bodies. With regard to the changes that were needed in the standard-setting process, governments should only support new Conventions in the plenary session of the Conference when they were actually willing to subsequently ratify them. Any other approach seriously undermined the standard-setting process. A suitable balance needed to be struck between the requirement for the coming into force of a Convention, for which only two ratifications were needed, and the very limited opportunities for denouncing Conventions. Together, the minimal conditions for the entry into force of Conventions and the difficulty of denouncing them served to make the statistics look good. However, they also made responsible governments hesitate to ratify Conventions. Indeed, although some 750 ratifications had been registered between 1992 and 1996, over 500 of these had been from the new States created from the former USSR, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia. There had not therefore been so many new ratifications.

86. The Employer members thought that some of the increasing number of problems encountered in the application of ratified Conventions were also due to the very broad interpretation made by the supervisory bodies of provisions in Conventions that were often very simple. In so doing, they created further obligations that governments had not foreseen when ratifying the Convention. One good illustration was the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), concerning which detailed and precise concepts concerning the right to strike had been developed by the supervisory bodies, whereas the Convention only contained very general provisions. However, during the process of the adoption of the Convention, the inclusion of provisions on the right to strike had been rejected.

87. A number of ideas had been proposed to improve the effect given to Conventions on human rights, said the Employer members. One proposal had been to include a social clause in trade treaties, which was no longer a viable solution. Similar objections had been raised to the concept of social labels, as proposed by the Director-General in his Report. Another suggestion was to establish a special supervisory procedure similar to the Committee on Freedom of Association. This procedure would also be applicable to member States which had not ratified the basic Conventions. This approach assumed that these basic principles, namely non-discrimination and the elimination of forced and child labour, were enshrined in the ILO Constitution. However, it was difficult to determine the extent to which such principles were indeed set out in the Constitution. The Employer members could not therefore support the establishment of new bodies to examine whether obligations deriving from the ILO Constitution were being fulfilled. The experience of the Committee on Freedom of Association illustrated the potential problems. The principle of freedom of association was set out in the Preamble to the Constitution. However, the results obtained by the Committee on Freedom of Association could not be considered strictly as the application and interpretation of the principle set out in the Constitution, if the term "principle" was to retain its meaning. Indeed, the extensive jurisprudence of the Committee on Freedom of Association extended to strike situations. In cases concerning countries that had not ratified Convention No. 87, the only legal basis for decision was the principle of freedom of association contained in the Constitution. The Committee on Freedom of Association appeared to be of the opinion that any infringement of the right to strike, which it considered to be almost unlimited, was unlawful and a violation of the ILO Constitution. This approach, and its results, did not abide by the usual principles of legal interpretation. In this context, the Employers noted that there was close collaboration between the work of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, with cross-references to their conclusions. It should be recalled that the legal interpretation of the Committee on Freedom of Association was based on the Constitution, while that of the Committee of Experts was based on the provisions of Convention No. 87. Although the Employer members supported general measures to give greater effect to ILO principles and fundamental workers' rights, they considered that the establishment of a principle of freedom of association without any limits or constraints would constitute unlimited interference in the affairs of third parties, without any solid legal basis. They believed that there was no precedent in national legal systems for this approach. Only the core aspects of the right to freedom of association could be afforded special protection. More detailed provisions needed to be established by the competent legislative body in member States. The Employer members reaffirmed the fundamental difference between obligations with respect to ratified Conventions and unratified standards. It was very dangerous when an organization did not apply its own rules, even where the objective was desirable. In legal terms, public international law survived because of the willingness to create a consensus and uphold peace. Any constraint that did not have a lawful basis could not be applied and would give rise to opposition.

88. The Employer members welcomed the success of the Director-General's campaign for the ratification of fundamental ILO standards, although they noted that this success did not extend to the standards on child labour. It was not unrealistic to hope for greater ratification of fundamental Conventions. Indeed, in recent years the ILO had had to re-examine its fundamental role. In their opinion, standard setting had lost much of its importance. Although the Organization had been affected by the signs of a crisis, it should be recalled that crises were not necessarily negative. Crises should be seen as a turning-point which offered opportunities for improvement, which should be taken up.

89. The Worker members said that in many countries there was a considerable gap between ratification of Conventions, their application through legal principles and their application in practice: the second part of the report of the Committee of Experts and the high number of representations and complaints before the Committee on Freedom of Association provided sufficient evidence of that. One could not accept such an inconsistent attitude. Even the non-binding provisions which some would like to put in place of Conventions, such as Recommendations, resolutions or codes of good conduct, were not always taken seriously. It was regrettable that too many member States were, by ratifying few or no Conventions, avoiding an important part of their constitutional obligations. Happily, certain constitutional provisions and principles remained applicable to them, such as observance of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, the objective of social justice and the obligation to report on unratified Conventions. The efforts of the Director-General and several constituents to make the most of the means offered by the Constitution to promote the observance of fundamental rights as a whole independently of the ratification of the corresponding Conventions and without weakening the existing supervisory system should be fully supported. These rights should be observed in all countries and all enterprises, whatever the level of economic development, because they formed the basis of a social policy which, while taking into account the national possibilities, made possible the application of other standards on, for example, safety and health at work or social security. In this context, and bearing in mind the divergent opinions on this subject, the Worker members would like to recall their proposal as to a social clause in a multilateral and non-protectionist framework, not as a goal in itself, but as an instrument to reinforce the system of supervision serving the objective of social justice.

90. The Worker members noted that, while having declined in comparison with the previous year, the number of new ratifications registered remained encouraging and was a concrete demonstration of support by the member States for the principles and values of the ILO. These numbers should be seen in the context of the campaign to promote the ratification of Conventions on the basic rights. The prospects for ratification of these Conventions were very real, including Convention No. 138, which 12 governments had already indicated their intention to ratify and ten others stated they were examining. This campaign should therefore be continued and supported and the resolute attitude of the Office in encouraging these ratifications, particularly through technical cooperation, should be commended. The work of the Governing Body on the revision of certain Conventions and the promotion of others also had a role to play. Tripartite consultations at the national level could contribute to promoting the ratification of fundamental Conventions by showing that obstacles to ratification invoked previously were no longer relevant. In spite of progress, the pace of new ratifications was still very slow. The industrialized countries in particular had to adopt a more dynamic attitude: it was unacceptable that some of them still had not ratified the fundamental Conventions.

91. The Worker members said that the 2,132 cases of progress registered since 1964 proved that the supervisory system based on dialogue, cooperation and technical assistance had a real impact on workers and their families. This year, 25 cases concerned fundamental rights and important Conventions. Frequently it was firm action and campaigns led by the workers' organizations at the national and international level which had led to such progress. The strengthening of the supervisory system retained its essential role, and the credibility of standards required the elimination of attitudes rejecting cooperation and dialogue with the ILO and its supervisory bodies. The proposals of the Director-General concerning the global social label and the introduction of a complementary procedure for discussing cases of non-observance of fundamental rights stood in this line of reasoning. It was indispensable for the ILO to have the necessary financial means to fulfil its mandate.

92. The Government member of Kenya supported the continuation of the Director-General's campaign for universal ratification of the basic human rights Conventions. The Government member of Germany thought some link between labour standards and trade indisputable — as demonstrated by the export processing zones; initiatives of producers, business people and consumers in the area of social labelling could not be ignored; and it was important that the standards supervisory system should be improved, although Government delegates at the Conference should not — as had been suggested — be compelled to vote for the adoption only of Conventions which their governments were sure to be able to ratify. The Government member of Saudi Arabia suggested the replacement of Recommendations by a system of guidance on the adaptation of national systems to international labour standards. The Government member of Sweden (speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries) supported the Governing Body's work for modernization of the standard-setting system and was also interested in the establishment of a portfolio of proposals for standards to enhance medium-term planning. The Government member of the Netherlands supported the campaign for ratification of the basic human rights Conventions, which had already been fruitful, as well as the proposal for a Declaration involving also a procedure to monitor compliance; the choice of subjects for new standards should be strategic and take account of what would be durable and legally verifiable; details could be included in appendices, for easier amendment, and autonomous Recommendations should be reintroduced; obsolete Conventions and Recommendations should be abrogated, but he was sceptical as to the practical use of an updated version of the International Labour Code. The Government member of Canada said the Director-General's Report contained important initiatives to be discussed in the Governing Body: opportunities should be acted on with vision. The Government member of India supported the Governing Body's work for the revision of existing Conventions; new Conventions should take account of widespread unemployment in the world, the predominance of the unorganized sector and prohibitive cost of sophisticated social security systems in developing countries, and the ineffectiveness of labour inspection systems, and the pressures of international competitiveness; future Conferences should address these problems without unnecessarily burdening state enforcement machinery or harassing employers and without allowing the unscrupulous exploitation of workers. The Government member of Uganda said that improvements in the supervisory machinery envisaged by the Director-General should remain within the terms of the Constitution, and existing mechanisms already caused government difficulties in reporting. The Government member of the Republic of Korea endorsed the revision process, a selective approach to new standard setting and flexibility in application according to national conditions.

93. Worker members of Burkina Faso, Germany, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Swaziland and the United Kingdom all spoke in favour of the ILO having more power to enforce the application of labour standards, particularly through a trade link. A Worker member of Germany was surprised at the Employer members' objection to social labelling, which would not be regulatory, but voluntary, merely informing consumers that goods had been produced in a way that respected human rights; at the same time, he welcomed the Director-General's proposal for new supervisory procedures relating to forced labour and child prostitution in particular.

94. The Worker members considered that a positive attitude towards standard-setting activities and the role of the ILO and its supervisory system clearly emerged from the interventions of the Employer members, as well as from the large majority of governments. Thus, a more constructive approach than at previous sessions had characterized nearly all of the interventions on the part of governments, who had stressed the importance of ILO standards in a context of economic and social change and called for social justice and progress as guarantees of sustainable economic development. The Worker members noted that the Employer members and the majority of Government members, though in sometimes very general terms, had come out in favour of reinforcing the supervisory system and a better application of standards in practice by means of the wider use of technical cooperation and the multidisciplinary advisory teams. They noted that several Government members had supported the efforts of the ILO to promote the ratification and application of standards. Some of them had insisted that concrete actions should be undertaken and made suggestions to improve the efficiency of the ILO in this respect. They recalled that the Government member of China, in particular, had stated that his country would adopt a more constructive attitude towards ILO standards.

95. The Worker members considered, however, that the concrete scope of these general remarks and suggestions was not fully clear: what was meant precisely when it was stated that the ILO should take into account economic and social realities for the application of fundamental standards? Which realities were meant when it was stated that standards should take account of the changes in the world and that no new standards should be adopted unless they were absolutely necessary? The Worker members endorsed the position of the Director-General to the effect that the idea of any break in standard setting was unacceptable. In contrast, globalization, increased international competition and new technologies made it necessary to adopt new standards and update existing standards. In this respect, the Worker members had no objection to a more rigorous selection and a more thorough preparation of subjects for new standards.

96. The Worker members wondered what was the exact meaning of the statement by the Government member of India to the effect that no links should be established between standards and international trade. While the comparative advantage resulting from the low wages was undoubtedly acceptable, it was so only to the extent that the level of wages and conditions of work corresponded to the level of economic and social development of the country concerned and on condition that the right of workers to organize freely to negotiate the level of their wages was guaranteed. But the situation was completely different and unacceptable where an artificially low level of wages and conditions of work resulted from a disregard of fundamental international standards and from the absence of any social policy.

97. The Worker members noted that the Employer members had said that the supervisory system should be strengthened, while at the same time insisting on limiting the possibilities of resort to complaints and representations and asking the Committee of Experts to be more restrained in requesting reports. They noted that the Employer members also called for more technical assistance and information on standards, while seeming, unless such interpretation was mistaken, to reject the proposals of the Director-General for systematic collection of information on social policies and the application of fundamental standards through a global social label. For the Workers, many positions advocated by the Employer members were a cause for concern, because they raised questions as to whether all the constituents really wanted to reinforce the supervisory system. This was particularly so when they rejected the adoption of new standards, the search for effective sanctions or the introduction of new procedures to monitor non-ratified fundamental Conventions. These examples illustrated the lack of consistency in certain positions and served to clarify the terms of the debate. Innovative proposals should not be put aside purely on the basis of legal arguments.

98. The Worker members thought the discussion had shown broad support for the initiative of the Director-General for the development of standard setting in the context of globalization. Several governments had stated their intention to proceed with ratifications following the Director-General's campaign, while others had voiced their concerns at reinforcing the practical application of Conventions.

99. The Worker members, referring to the statement of the Employer members reflected in paragraphs 86 and 87 above, noted that many governments had supplied useful and encouraging information as to the application of particular Conventions. To the Workers, the position of the Employer members concerning the right to strike was well known, as was also that of the Worker members, who fully endorsed the interpretation of the Committee of Experts, which was itself in line with the practice followed for many years by the Committee on Freedom of Association. It appeared that the Employer members were now openly criticizing the tripartite Committee on Freedom of Association in their statement that its approach to the right to strike was not in conformity with rules of legal interpretation. The Worker members would inform the Worker members of the Governing Body and its Committee on Freedom of Association of the position taken by the Employer spokesman, to seek clarification. Unless this was a misinterpretation, the position of the Employer members concerning the proposals discussed in the Governing Body and the Conference with a view to improving observance of fundamental rights, irrespective of the ratification of the corresponding Conventions, was also surprising. Their reluctance to accept a procedure analogous to that of the Committee on Freedom of Association in respect of the protection of other fundamental rights could be understood, but it did not justify the criticisms of the Committee of Experts. The discussion of these subjects needed to be pursued in a constructive manner that respected the positions of all the various parties.

100. The Employer members recalled that they had been commenting on the issue of the right to strike for many years. They acknowledged that the principle of industrial action, including the right to strike and lockouts, formed part of the principles of freedom of association as set out in Convention No. 87. Their criticisms were aimed at all the detailed jurisprudence developed over a number of years on the basis of these principles. Such detailed provisions were not to be found in either Convention No. 87 or the ILO Constitution. Moreover, the comments of the Employer members concerning the interpretation of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association contained no new elements and did not constitute a general criticism of the overall work of the two bodies.

101. The Employer members believed that there had been some misunderstanding during the general discussion on their comments concerning social labelling. They wished to reaffirm their support for the objective of greater universal respect for fundamental human rights Conventions. However, there was no easy means of achieving this objective. Some proposals had been made. These included the social clause, which had failed. The Employer members' concerns regarding social labelling were similar, although not exactly the same, to those they had expressed in respect of the social clause. A number of these concerns had been explained in the Report of the Director-General, even though he had ultimately come out in favour of social labelling. Although the idea of social labelling may be appealing to some, its effectiveness was doubtful. The details of such a scheme had not yet been fully worked out, but it was difficult to imagine how it could be applied in practice. One problem was that injustices might occur, for example where States were not granted the label or the label was withheld. In such a case, all the producers, and therefore the workers and their families in the country would suffer, even where they had observed the necessary standards. The system would therefore involve group liability. In addition, it was uncertain that such a system would achieve the desired effects in terms of consumer reaction. Although general opinion might be influenced relatively easily on such issues as the exploitation of child labour, even such important problems as forced labour represented more abstract concepts for the general public. It was uncertain that they would prevail over the immediate concerns of price and quality. The Employer members therefore believed that the viability of the proposed system had been overestimated and the dangers underestimated.

102. On the issue of standard setting, the Employer members pointed out that many of the points made in the Report of the Director-General were in line with the proposals put forward by the Employers' group over recent years. If these proposals were implemented, a new form of standard setting would be set in motion which would involve the adoption of fewer standards. They emphasized that this did not mean the adoption of no standards at all. However, any new standards adopted should focus on basic principles, rather than detailed provisions. If this approach had been adopted earlier, there would not be so many Conventions with very few ratifications. Many older standards which did not comply with the new approach would need to be revised or abrogated. It was a significant development that proposals of the nature contained in the Report of the Director-General now commanded agreement from all sides.

C. Reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution

Labour Administration Convention (No. 150) and Recommendation (No. 158), 1978

103. The Committee held a discussion on the General Survey made by the Committee of Experts on the basis of reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution on Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158, 1978, concerning labour administration. The survey also took into account reports on the Convention communicated under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution, as well as comments received from employers' and workers' organizations with the governments' reports in accordance with article 23(2) of the Constitution.

Introductory statements

104. The Worker members stated that they had examined with great interest the first General Survey on the instruments adopted in 1978. This Committee had already emphasized that these surveys could also fulfil the function of evaluating standards, a view that had been endorsed by the Director-General in his Report. The task of the Committee of Experts consisted of identifying problems of interpretation or application and making suggestions for their solution; bringing to light the strong points, as well as the weak points of the Convention with a view to facilitating its ratification and application; and describing the national practices which exemplified the best manner of implementing the provisions of the Convention. In its final remarks, the Committee of Experts outlined in balanced terms the advantages of ratifying the Convention. Like the Committee of Experts, they regretted that a number of States have not supplied all the necessary information on the budgetary or institutional difficulties facing labour administration or on the reasons which were delaying or preventing the ratification of the Convention.

105. The Worker members noted that this Convention, which had been well prepared and adopted unanimously, was closely linked with Conventions Nos. 81 and 144. It was also based on article 11 of the Constitution, which provided for the direct communication of labour administrations with the ILO. Moreover, its application facilitated access to technical cooperation. These instruments had the advantage of promoting a coordinated and, as emphasized in the General Survey, a dynamic approach by the various competent authorities engaged in ensuring effective labour inspection. However, the administrations and ministries concerned did not currently benefit from any priority treatment in terms of budgetary resources and only rarely received any significant political support. This situation was not tenable at a time when the economic and social changes resulting from globalization and structural adjustment should be making labour administration even more indispensable.

106. The Worker members pointed out that, in spite of its relevance, the Convention had been ratified by only 39 member States. It was surprising, as pointed out by the Chair of the Committee of Experts, that a related Convention which contained more stringent requirements, such as Convention No. 81, had received wider ratification than this Convention, which was of a more promotional nature. These instruments sought principally to establish a coordinated and efficient system of labour administration ensuring good collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations. As recalled by the Committee of Experts, they were originally intended to protect the nascent administrations against the risk of marginalization. However, 20 years later, labour administrations in many countries still occupied secondary places in the hierarchy of priorities, even if it was generally recognized that the proper functioning of the labour market was a decisive factor in economic success. This could be interpreted, as had been done by the Committee of Experts, as a consequence of the concept promoted, particularly by the IMF, according to which employment was facilitated by deregulation and the weakening or suppression of the institutions of dialogue between the social partners. The idea that this dialogue was necessary to ensure economic growth was once again gaining prominence, although much remained to be done for it to be shared by political decision-makers and received budgetary support.

107. According to the Worker members, the chapter on the various functions of labour administration systems recalled that these included promoting the practical application of international labour standards by facilitating their incorporation into national law and practice. Another essential function concerned the establishment of the dynamic partnership between public or semi-public bodies and workers' and employers' organizations in the application of national labour and employment policies. The third essential function of labour administration, related to the previous ones, consisted of guaranteeing protection of freedom of association and efficient collective bargaining. While democratic progress supported collective bargaining and tripartite cooperation, their institutional framework was being weakened by economic difficulties. The Committee of Experts was right to refer to the conclusions adopted by the Conference the previous year concerning tripartite consultations in relation to economic and social policies, which had noted the same trends. The survey had the merit of dispelling misunderstandings concerning the obligations resulting from Article 7 of the Convention, which appeared to be at the origin of a reticence by some countries to ratify it. By providing for the possibility to extend the functions of labour administration to other categories of workers, such as self-employed workers, farmers or workers in the informal sector, the Convention did not oblige the State Party to apply its legislation to these categories of workers.

108. The Worker members shared the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts with regard to the major difficulties facing labour administration, one of the consequences of which was late reporting or failure to report. These conclusions should be borne in mind when the Committee of Experts noted the relatively low level of resources allocated to labour administrations in the industrialized countries, or when it observed that this was one of the lowest budgetary priorities in the developing countries, because under-financing had a direct consequence on the services provided, and therefore on living and working conditions. The examination of difficulties relating to ratification showed that they were not insurmountable, irrespective of whether they were related to the scope of Article 7 or to the provisions of Article 2, which made it possible to delegate certain activities to employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee of Experts had made a useful contribution in dissipating possible misunderstandings in this respect. Governments should be called upon to re-examine their position in this respect in consultation with the social partners. Its ratification should be promoted because the Convention provided an institutional framework to improve the functioning of the labour market and the employment situation and to stimulate economic growth, as emphasized in the final remarks of the survey.

109. The Employer members commended the General Survey of the Committee of Experts. Employment laws and regulations would be worthless if there were no system of labour administration to assess and enforce compliance. In this respect, it was disappointing that some 52 per cent of member States had not provided the reports due under article 19 of the Constitution for the purposes of this survey. This was a serious problem which compromised the ability of the Committee of Experts to provide an accurate and complete assessment of the situation as regards labour administration throughout the world. The development of an effective system of labour administration was a difficult proposition which varied widely due to the broad diversity of national conditions, including their historical and economic development, culture, government structures, country size and financial resources. Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158 therefore provided general guidelines for the general institutional framework of labour administration. They were notable instruments because they were not the product of the process of extensive amendment, subamendment and voting that was normally involved in the development of international labour standards. In view of the broad differences among countries, the texts of the two instruments had largely been formulated by the Drafting Committee. Because the Convention was drafted in general terms and because of the limited legislative history of labour administration, there was no basis under the Vienna Convention to establish more precise requirements. Under Article 1 of the Convention, the systems of labour administration and national labour policy were to be approached in a broad manner which gave ratifying States a great deal of discretion. In accordance with national conditions, Article 4 required the organization and effective operation of a coordinated system of labour administration with, under the terms of Article 5, input from organizations of employers and workers.

110. The Employer members noted that the functions of the system of labour administration related to the principal fields of national labour policy, which was still evolving and which included labour protection, employment, research and labour relations. The fact that several other aspects of national labour policy not covered by the Convention were described in the General Survey bore witness to the rapid changes taking place at the workplace, as well as to the adaptability and flexibility of the Convention. Indeed, the General Survey amounted to a compendium of change at the workplace and in labour administration. In view of the fact that social security retirement systems were experiencing a period of far-reaching financial crisis throughout the world, and also in view of the flexibility of the Convention and recent discussions concerning the need to revise certain of the ILO's social security Conventions, it was surprising that the Committee of Experts had adopted an unreceptive approach to privatization alternatives that could make publicly financed systems of labour administration more solvent. This position by the Committee of Experts showed a failure to acknowledge that publicly financed schemes could no longer be funded in traditional ways without absorbing a disproportionate share of national economic output. The fact that fewer than 25 member States had ratified recent ILO social security Conventions was further proof of the outmoded nature of this attitude.

111. The Employers stated that, in its comments on employment and human resources development, the Committee of Experts had overstated the functions of the system of labour administration when they observed that almost all countries had endowed their system with a fundamental role in formulating and implementing national employment policy. The conclusions of the Conference's discussions in 1996 on employment policies in a global economy had emphasized that the essential requirements of employment policy were a stable economic, political, legal and social environment; low inflation; low interest rates; coherent macroeconomic policies; stable exchange rates; enforceable contracts; open markets; stable commodity prices; low taxes; currency liberalization; and debt reduction. With the exception of guarantees concerning human rights, these were matters which lay well outside the scope and competence of labour administration systems. In view of the lack of legislative history on what was meant by the technical committee which drafted the Convention on this point, it was incorrect to convert the instrument into an employment policy administration Convention. The Employer members pointed out that when Article 6, paragraph 2, of the Convention required labour administration systems to take into account relevant international labour standards, this did not mean that the Conventions embodying those standards needed to be ratified or applied. Commenting on the provisions of Article 7 of the Convention, which provided for an extension of the functions of labour administration to non-wage workers, the Employer members believed that it would be difficult to cover persons working voluntarily for themselves, especially when they operated outside the regular labour market in the informal sector and engaged no outside help. Such persons would even fall outside the scope of the discussion on contract labour which, if they were adopted, would result in instruments covering slightly less than 1 per cent of the workforce.

112. The Employer members noted that since the adoption of the instruments on labour administration, there had been a number of important changes to the economic and social context in which such systems operated. These included globalization, the development of regional trading blocs, a tightening of government budgets, increased privatization, the restructuring of companies and the worldwide recognition of the pre-eminence of market economies. The fact that the Convention continued to be relevant was a testament to a degree of flexibility that should have been included in many other standards to ensure their durability. In particular, the Convention needed to be particularly flexible and adaptable in a situation of falling trade barriers, instant communications, relatively rapid and inexpensive international transport and the rapidly changing technologies that were shaping labour markets and the rules of the game, which differed substantially from those pertaining when the standards had been adopted. Although there were no simple strategies for labour administration, approaches adopting management techniques and treating users as customers who needed information and advice were yielding better results than the traditional and more expensive adversarial enforcement systems. Other approaches, including mediation and arbitration were providing swifter and more effective labour administration. In this respect, the Committee of Experts had placed too much emphasis on the importance of material means and human and financial resources as a measure of the effectiveness of labour administration systems and the quality of the services that they provided. In at least one large country, the number of workplace injuries was declining at a time when workplace inspections were being reduced.

113. The Employer members pointed out that, even with its inherent flexibility, the Convention had only been ratified by 39 countries since it had come into force in 1980. Moreover, 70 per cent of the ratifications had been registered up to 1985. Convention No. 150 had model character because of its very flexible provisions. It was therefore surprising that other Conventions imposing more detailed obligations on member States had been ratified at higher levels. The General Survey clearly indicated that many member States misunderstood the requirements of the Convention and its basic flexibility. The survey would therefore contribute significantly to clarifying the requirements of the Convention which did not, for the most part, impose an obligation to produce specific results, but rather encouraged ratifying States to use their best efforts to improve their labour administration systems. More ILO technical assistance, outreach and promotion of the Convention was required. In view of the much higher ratification levels for far more prescriptive Conventions, it was ironic that a primarily procedural and goals-oriented instrument, on a subject that was essential to the implementation of employment law, had received so few ratifications.

114. The discussion that followed after the presentation from the spokespersons for the Employers and Workers centred around several subjects essentially concerning the continuing relevance and flexibility of the instruments in the context of challenges which have resulted from economic globalization and increased competition; the importance of tripartism; functions of labour administration; available resources and ILO assistance; prospects for ratification.

Relevance and flexibility of the instruments

115. A large number of Committee members underlined the importance, relevance and continuing usefulness of the instruments because of their flexibility, in the context of economic globalization, liberalization and structural adjustment.

116. The Government member of Belgium considered that it was appropriate to study the instruments on labour administration at a time when the ILO was examining the consequences of globalization, since observance of the ILO's objectives and the application of international labour Conventions depended on the proper functioning of labour administration. The instruments covered by the survey provided the institutional framework for the fulfilment of the responsibilities that derived from membership of the ILO. Not in the least obsolete, they also offered all the desirable flexibility. The Government member of Greece also underlined the relevance of these instruments which help improve systems of labour administration. The Government member of Haiti noted that Convention No. 150 is a constant point of reference and model for the concept of labour administration. The Government member of Morocco, noting the prime objective of the Convention as being to ensure a coordinated labour administration, underlined the importance of the Convention in the current context of open markets. Even if it is not one of the fundamental Conventions, this Convention deserves special attention as it permits the enforcement of other Conventions and principles promoted by the ILO. The Government of Tunisia noted that the discussion concerning the Convention was of great topical relevance in view of the important changes that numerous States were faced with in the context of the globalization of the economy and the impact of structural adjustment programmes. While labour administrations were witnessing an increase of their functions, their resources were being reduced. Labour administrations had, at present to assume a series of functions not within their traditional competence. In order to limit the negative impact of the economic upheavals caused by globalization, States should ensure social progress and permit labour administrations to promote employment and job security, to assist self-employed workers and to support medium and small enterprises. Competitiveness should not be maintained artificially by having recourse to simplistic solutions, such as massive lay-offs, a reduction of social coverage or a deterioration of working conditions.

117. The Worker member of Spain was pleased that labour administration was the subject of this General Survey as it was important not only to set out rights but also to ensure their respect. Convention No. 150 aimed at guaranteeing the application of the provisions of the fundamental Conventions of the ILO. The ILO should not, in his opinion, limit its supervisory activities to the fundamental Conventions and should not ignore other instruments like Convention No. 150. The Worker member of India noted that Convention No. 150 permitted the enforcement of the other Conventions as well as flexibility as regards its own implementation. A Worker member of Germany and Zimbabwe also referred to the flexibility of the provisions of the Convention as well as to the general guidelines that it provides. The former noted that the Convention contained very basic provisions, including only few special provisions in the implementation of which account could be taken of the various national legal systems. The latter recalled that Convention No. 150 provided general guidelines for a coordinated and effective national labour administration, without making specific requirements. It defined the role, functions and organization of national systems of labour administration in order to help and encourage member States to adopt cohesive and efficient structures which were relevant to technological developments, globalization and changes in world trade. The instrument could apply to all member States regardless of their level of development. Its greatest strength lay in allowing flexibility to achieve its aims and permitting a variety of approaches adapted to different and changing national circumstances. The Convention therefore made a very important contribution to the establishment of a coherent national social and economic policy. The Worker member of Japan highlighted the importance of labour administration in protecting the rights and interests of workers in the current context of fierce competition between enterprises and governmental policies which favoured deregulation of the market. The Worker member of Pakistan considered the role of labour administration to be very important, not only for the formulation of the labour policy in conformity with international labour standards, but also for its implementation at the national level.

Relevance of tripartism

118. Basing themselves on Article 5 of Convention No. 150 which deals with consultation, cooperation and negotiation between the public authorities and the most representative organizations of employers and workers, or — where appropriate — employers' and workers' representatives, a great number of speakers emphasized the importance of tripartite cooperation by showing the need to have constructive consultation with the social partners and their organizations at all stages of the preparation, administration and review of labour standards and employment policy.

119. The Government member of Trinidad and Tobago considered the General Survey provided a good basis for tripartite deliberation on the subject. The Government member of Argentina stressed the importance of tripartism in this domain. To comply with its obligations under the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), her Government was seeking to ensure consultations on the process of determining penalties under the labour legislation. Several Governments referred to their national practice. The Government members of Equatorial Guinea, India and Romania provided particulars concerning their national practice on labour administration. The Government member of Equatorial Guinea stated that his country had a law which regulated labour policy and labour administration which attributed essential functions to employers' and workers' organizations in the fulfilment of the aims of economic, social and cultural progress. It provided that these organizations should take part in the conciliation and arbitration procedures in labour disputes. The Government member of India indicated that in his country there were two national level tripartite consultative bodies where consultations regularly took place on the development, adoption and review of labour standards and their application. The services of the administration machinery were made available to workers' and employers' organizations for regulating the terms and conditions of employment through conciliation machinery or by registration of bipartite settlements. The Government member of Romania indicated that advisory committees had been created under the auspices of the Reform Council, ministries and local administrations. She was convinced that high quality tripartite dialogue was a prerequisite for this success of economic and social reform.

120. Many Worker members also underlined the importance of tripartism. The Worker member of Germany stated that to ensure an effective system of labour administration, employers, workers and their organizations, should participate alongside the public authorities in the design and implementation of national labour policy. This active partnership ensured the success and practical effectiveness of the system. In his view Germany was a good example of a country where the social partners had played a historical role in the development of labour administration and were continuing to do so. The Worker member of the Republic of Korea insisted on the importance of systems of labour administration comprising a tripartite structure. There was often an imbalance in the tripartite composition of labour administration which led to the under-participation of social partners in the process of consulting and reviewing national employment policy. Throughout 1996, the revision of Korean labour legislation had been discussed by a commission, but workers had been insufficiently represented and the result was that their rights and interests were not fully taken into account. For the stability of industrial relations, labour administration had to reflect genuine tripartism. The Worker member of Spain stressed the importance of Article 5 of the Convention concerning consultation, cooperation and negotiations between public authorities and the most representative organizations of employers and workers. The non-application of this Article was generally explained by a lack of confidence in the social partners. Thus, in his country, the signing of various agreements bore witness to the confidence that was placed in the social partners. It was incumbent on the ILO to help governments to implement Article 5 of the Convention. The Worker member of Singapore stated that she also supported the call in paragraph 259 of the General Survey for tripartite collaboration in the development of strategies to respond to the challenges in a planned and organized manner. Although Convention No. 150 had not been identified as one of the ILO's fundamental Conventions, it reflected the major themes and values promoted by the ILO and in particular the paramount importance of machinery or collective agreements. The Worker member of Uruguay stated the workers' organizations were calling for a broadening of trade union rights in Uruguay, in dialogue with the Government and the employers. The Worker member of Zimbabwe stated that Convention No. 150 promoted the paramount principle of tripartite consultation in labour administration systems. Tripartite consultation was vital to the success of structural adjustment programmes, which were being undertaken by most African governments. This included consultation with organizations of employers and workers at the design and implementation stages of economic development processes.

Functions of labour administration

121. Many members of the Committee referred to one or various main functions and tasks of the competent bodies of labour administration as mentioned in the instruments or carried out in national practice. They specifically referred to national employment policy, human resource development, some protective aspects of national labour policy such as social security, occupational safety and health and the role of labour inspection.

122. Worker members of Germany and Pakistan referred to the role of labour administration in the preparation and administration of national employment policy. The first stated that he considered that employment policy was one of the essential functions of labour administration and that industry-targeted policy was not enough to promote employment. What was also needed was a comprehensive public infrastructure. Although the Convention did not contain special provisions concerning human resources, it was indisputably an employment policy issue. Recommendation No. 158 also linked occupational guidance and vocational training policies to employment policy, as had the conclusions of the 1996 Conference Committee on Employment Policies. The second stated that the employment situation everywhere was critical and one of the major roles of labour administration was to prepare the young labour force, through training and retraining opportunities and facilities, so that they could meet the requirements of new labour markets. Even where there were jobs, unskilled manpower could not meet the requirements of the labour market and still did not have access to gainful employment.

123. The Government members of Morocco and Tunisia referred to activities of their labour administration especially concerning the preparation of laws, the promotion of collective bargaining, and settlement of collective labour disputes. The latter referred to assistance to disabled and older workers and the improvement of social cover. Placement agencies had been set up throughout the country on the national and local levels and training and retraining centres created. The social progress in his country was due to political will and the active participation of employers and workers but also to a well developed labour administration.

124. The Government member of Argentina underlined the efforts of the central labour authorities to promote skills, capacity-building and career prospects of the members of their staff.

125. With respect to the role of labour administration in social security matters, a Worker member of Germany considered that with regard to privatized systems, it was workers who bore the highest risk and who could least sustain it. Comparing the social protection in Germany and the United States, he stated that the level of social protection in the United States was surely not better than in Germany. With regard to privatized systems, workers who bore the highest risk were those who could least sustain it. Therefore, it was not possible to conclude that a private system would be cheaper and more efficient.

126. Regarding worker protection the Worker member of China emphasized that the protection provided to workers by labour legislation could only be made effective through labour administration systems, which covered such important areas as labour force management, the control of wages, effective labour inspection. The relevant rules were not enforced and workers' rights were not protected. Noting that workers' organizations should play an active role in labour administration, she described the role played by Chinese trade unions in the implementation of the relevant laws.

127. The Worker member of the United States responded to the Employer members' statement concerning possible reasons for declining workplace inspections, in particular in the field of occupational safety and health. He stated that according to the Employer members voluntary compliance and cooperation had significantly reduced the problem and need for such intervention. He strongly challenged the Employer members on this. One part of their premise was certainly true — there were unquestionably fewer workplace inspection and enforcement measures regarding occupational safety and health in the United States. As for the rest of the Employer members' premise, he questioned if the fall in inspections and enforcement measures was due to a significant diminution of occupational safety and health threats to United States workers. Official OSHA statistics again proved the Employer members wrong: there were approximately 7.9 million workers in the United States who were not within federal and state OSHA jurisdiction. The economic costs of workplace safety and health did not indicate more voluntary compliance and a lesser problem since over 70 billion US dollars per year were spent on workers' compensation, not to mention the millions of dollars of lost productivity due to workplace-caused sickness and injury. He stressed that the devastating drop in governmental inspection and enforcement in workplaces was not due to a diminution of the problem — it was due to an anti-worker political assault which took many forms, such as budget cuts, hiring freezes and cut-backs and neo-liberal reductions in vital federal and state occupational safety and health agencies. The United States had not reduced its workplace safety and health capability because it was a workers' safety and health paradise; on the contrary, that country had become, regrettably, an increasingly dangerous place to work.

128. A Worker member of Germany referred to the importance of strong social institutions in the context of economic restructuring. For instance, without its strong labour inspection system, Germany could not have undergone its reunification with such a low level of conflict.

129. The Worker member of Pakistan considered that the workplace was becoming more hazardous and that it was the responsibility of governments to change their inspection systems and to train workers and employers in coping with industrial accidents and occupational diseases. He stated that Pakistan had a large rural workforce where labour laws did not apply and facilities were lacking. Some minimum guarantees against accidents and minimum wage protection had to be provided to these members of the labour force. Women and children were subjected to even more intolerable forms of discrimination which could only be tackled by an effective labour administration.

130. The Worker member of the Republic of Korea mentioned that his country had ratified the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), but none of the seven fundamental human rights Conventions. Korean workers had staged demonstrations over the labour law reforms earlier this year and these were issues closely related to labour administration, since they involved employment policy, safety and health and vocational training. The revision of the labour legislation had not fully taken into account their rights and interests.

131. The Worker member of India stated that in his country, structural adjustment had resulted in a substantial increase of the level of unemployment. National circulars were weakening labour inspection with a resulting deterioration of working conditions in factories. It was of utmost importance to reduce the impact of such structural adjustment measures because labour inspection could play a major role in the area of child labour, in the informal sector as well as in export processing zones. Labour administration should remain impartial and report objectively on the application of labour laws.

132. The Government member of Uganda referred to difficulties faced in the implementation of Convention No. 81 and in the decentralization of labour administration. With reference to cooperation with the ILO, he noted the recent measures taken in this domain. Labour administration had been included in the country objectives for Uganda and that the draft employment policy had been debated earlier in the year by the social partners and other stakeholders. A tripartite Minimum Wages Advisory Board had been appointed and its report was being considered by the Government. Moreover, negotiating machinery for the public service had been developed. He also informed the Committee that his Government was working very closely with ILO/International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) to develop a project for the elimination of the most intolerable forms of child labour. In addition, his country had hosted a conference on the harmonization of labour legislation and the promotion of tripartism in East Africa.

Organization, human and financial resources and technical assistance

133. Many Government members brought up the precarious state of labour administration and the lack of means at their disposal. The Government member of Trinidad and Tobago stated that his Government supported the recommendation in the General Survey that national budgets should be increased for labour administration and that governments should be encouraged to recognize the great importance of labour ministries and the need for effective and efficient labour administration systems. He stated that in his country, only 0.22 per cent of the national budget was allocated to labour matters. With reference to the quality of the staffing of labour administration departments, he welcomed the assistance provided to his country by the ILO in this respect. The Government members of Equatorial Guinea, Haiti, Morocco and Tunisia emphasized the importance of putting adequate means at the disposal of labour administration for their proper operation. In this context they underlined the need to strengthen ILO technical assistance. The Government member of Equatorial Guinea referred to the lack of human resources and material means to respond to the needs throughout the country. He stressed that the ILO should support national efforts in this regard. The Government member of Haiti recalled the importance for Haiti of the technical assistance which it had requested from the Office on this matter. The Government member of Morocco stressed that the ILO should support national efforts in this regard and that the regional activities of the Organization should be expanded, in particular for African and Arab countries. The Government member of Tunisia stated that the Office should provide technical assistance for the close monitoring of Convention No. 150, especially to developing countries. Cooperation at the international level, comparable to that of the Arab Regional Centre for Labour Administration (RAPLA), should be supported by the ILO.

Difficulties and prospects of ratification

134. With respect to prospects of ratification the Government member of Germany stated that this survey was more detailed than some previous surveys, particularly with regard to the question of obstacles to ratification. It was a good example of how better use could be made of the possibilities offered by reports on non-ratified Conventions, along the lines suggested by the Director-General in his Report this year. It would also be useful for such General Surveys also to cover the difficulties encountered by ratifying States.

135. The Government member of Belgium considered that the broad ratification of these instruments would have the triple advantage of: improving the impact of the technical assistance of the ILO by decreasing the dependence of both member States and of the Office on competing international expertise and help; facilitating the implementation of national policies responding to the ILO's major concerns in the area of fundamental standards, employment and occupational safety and health; and increasing involvement in the ILO's activities through a continuous dialogue between the social partners and government authorities.

136. The Government member of Trinidad and Tobago informed the Committee that at the 13th meeting of the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) Standing Committee of Ministers with responsibility for labour, CARICOM member countries had been requested to give priority to the strengthening of their respective labour administration systems and the ratification of Convention No. 150. To date only two of the 13 CARICOM countries had ratified the Convention, despite the fact that the principles set out in the Convention and Recommendation were generally adhered to in the region.

137. The Worker member of Japan indicated that labour administration should constitute a basis for an equitable development and, consequently, labour administrations should not be weakened. The ratification of Convention No. 150 and the implementation of legislation ensuring respect of its provisions at the national level were indispensable in this regard. The Worker member of Pakistan called for more ratifications of the Convention.

138. The Government member of Haiti stated that his Government was considering the revision of the Labour Code in order to render it more efficient and better adapted to the current needs and to the ongoing administrative reforms, as well as more in line with international standards. An effort was being made to vitalize and restructure the labour inspection system. The Government member of India described various arrangements which demonstrated that his country respected the spirit of Convention No. 150 but his Government considered it not possible to ratify this Convention because of Articles 2 and 7. The structure and character of the employers' and workers' organizations made Article 2's requirements impractical. In the context of the globalization of the economy and the need for public expenditure cut-backs, it could not be envisaged at this stage of development to request labour administration to cover all workers as envisaged under Article 7.

Final remarks

139. In their conclusions on the discussion of the General Survey, the Employer members regretted that of the 24 speakers in the debate, only four represented countries which had ratified Convention No. 150, the rest participating to explain the obstacles to its ratification. It would have been useful to have heard more about its implementation from countries which had ratified it because shared experiences were very valuable, especially in improving the effectiveness of labour administration systems. He was also disappointed in the low rate of reports sent under article 19 in respect of this General Survey. In spite of this, the Committee of Experts had been able to prepare what all speakers had agreed was a useful General Survey, stressing the flexibility and range of Convention No. 150. There was general agreement on the continued validity of the Convention and the need for its ratification. It provided a structure, general guidelines and an institutional framework. It allowed a great deal of national discretion as regards implementation, as long as it was coordinated and effective, as long as the country provided labour protection, unemployment insurance or conducted research, the activity had to be organized and effective. Likewise, this meant that if a country did not have a particular labour law or employment protection, the Convention did not require this, as long as the functions listed in Article 6 — such as research — were fulfilled. The difficulty was that, notwithstanding the generality of the Convention, it had received few ratifications. This was puzzling because labour inspection was the basis for enforcing all labour matters. Perhaps governments hesitated because there was a tendency to put too much in this Convention; there had to be a distinction between flexibility and vagueness. The ideal Convention was one which was short and was composed of clear general principles. Articles 1 to 6 of the Convention came close to this. The Employer members generally supported the aims of the Convention and, while not necessarily agreeing with all the comments in the survey, wished to point out that sometimes the language used could create the impression that the Convention was wider than it was in reality.

140. As for the privatization of social security, the Employer members pointed out that the debate had reached a point where reactions were becoming automatic, yet this was not a black or white issue. Some members of the Committee had suggested that governments be the guarantor of everything: retirement benefits, health care, and so on. Governments could no longer afford to do this, so other strategies had to be explored. It did not have to be a choice between completely private or completely public financing, but could be a blend of systems.

141. Regarding the role of labour administration in employment policy, the Employer members also pointed out that the words "national employment policy" were mentioned only once in the Convention, in Article 6(2)(a). If a country handled certain employment policy issues, then the requirements of coordination, checking and review applied. But the Convention was not all-encompassing and the Committee of Experts was over-reading it if they perceived that the system of labour administration had a central role to play in employment policies. The Employer members considered that the Committee of Experts placed too much emphasis on the amount of material resources, both human and financial, that member States required for an effective system of labour administration. All governments were under severe budget restrictions and governments, like the private sector, had to look at a variety of new and different approaches to obtain their objectives. For example, there were more cost-effective ways to undertake the education and training of employers, workers and their organizations in basic worker protection, and private audit agencies might be used to perform the same functions as government inspection teams. The Convention was a constructive one which deserved serious consideration by the Committee.

142. The Worker members noted that all the interventions made had confirmed the importance of Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158, in an era when countries and regions all over the world were confronted with major political changes. This confirmed, more than ever before, the value of the general directions contained in these two instruments adopted in 1978. Several speakers, in particular from industrialized governments, had voiced the specific and substantial problems that their national labour administrations were facing. Further, although the efficiency of labour administration systems did not depend only on budgetary means and qualified personnel, a certain minimum level was still required to ensure that they functioned properly. At the same time, however, the level of resources allocated gave an indication of the political importance attributed to different ministries in any particular country. The Worker members subscribed to the plea for an active support of the ILO in order to convince politicians in charge as well as other international organizations that proper labour administration systems were of importance.

143. They underscored that one of the major thrusts of the two instruments on labour administration under examination was the coordinated approach to be given to labour and employment policies. The elaboration, implementation and evaluation of employment policies went beyond the competence of either one of a labour ministry or a labour administration system. In this context it was therefore of essence to adopt, as already had been underscored by the Employer members, a global approach encompassing the economic, social, monetary, legal as well as institutional levels. In this context, labour administrations had a mission to fulfil, as they should take part in the preparation, implementation, coordination, supervision and evaluation of national employment policies as provided for in Convention No. 150. Labour administrations could thereby engage the social partners in the elaboration of such a policy.

144. With respect to social security, the Worker members stressed that the Committee of Experts, in paragraph 83 of the report, only restated their previous observations according to which the new ways to administer social security systems, notably by way of privatization, were a cause of serious concern. The interest of the protected persons should be fully taken into account and the representatives of these persons should continue to be involved in any reform programme. At issue was, in fact, fundamental principles of any democracy and of any sound administration which the public authorities were bound to respect.

145. Finally, the interventions made had also underscored the importance of the General Survey conducted to promote the ratification of these instruments. The Committee of Experts had emphasized that the obligation contained in Article 7 of the Convention is an obligation of means and not of result and that it therefore was not useful to invoke this Article as a cause for non-ratification of Convention No. 150.

146. The Committee commended the quality of the first General Survey of the Committee of Experts on the labour administration instruments. It welcomed the description of national practices which exemplified the best manner of implementing the provisions of the Convention and the advantages of ratifying outlined by the Committee of Experts in its final remarks. Noting the flexible, dynamic and adaptable nature of the provisions of the Convention, the Committee found that the survey was timely and appropriate in view of the important changes that have taken place in the economic and social context in which labour administration operated. It noted that the survey clarified the requirements and contents of the Convention with a view to facilitating its ratification and application.

D. Compliance with specific obligations

147. The Committee decided that, in examining individual cases relating to compliance by States with their obligations under or relating to international labour standards, it would apply the same working methods and criteria as last year, as amended or clarified in 1980 and 1987.

148. In applying those methods, the Committee decided, on the proposal of the Worker members supported by the Employer members, to invite all governments concerned by the comments in paragraphs 102 (compliance with reporting obligations), 109 (supply of first reports), 113 (lack of reply to comments of the supervisory bodies), 138 (special problems relating to submission) and 142 (lack of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations) of the Committee of Experts' report to supply information to the Committee in one half-day sitting to be devoted to those cases. The Committee considered that this approach should in no sense be understood by governments as dispensing them from the need to take part in the Committee's discussions.

Submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities

149. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the manner in which effect is given to article 19, paragraphs 5 to 7, of the ILO Constitution. These provisions require member States within 12, or exceptionally 18, months of the closing of each session of the Conference to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted at that session to the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action, and to inform the Director-General of the ILO of the measures taken to that end, with particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent.

150. The Committee noted from the report of the Committee of Experts (paragraph 131) that considerable efforts to fulfil the submission obligation had been made in certain States, namely: Chad, Guyana, Jordan, Lebanon, Mauritius, Mongolia and Suriname.

151. The Committee was informed by various other States of measures taken to bring Conventions and Recommendations before the competent national authorities. It welcomed the progress achieved and expressed the hope that there would be further improvements in States that still experience difficulties in complying with their obligations.

Failure to submit

152. The Committee noted with regret from paragraph 138 of the Committee of Experts' report that no indication was available that steps had been taken in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted between 1988 and 1994 by the 75th to 81st Sessions of the Conference to the competent authorities, in the cases of Cameroon, Ecuador, Guatemala, Guinea, Haiti, Madagascar, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Syrian Arab Republic, the United Republic of Tanzania, Yemen.

Supply of reports on ratified Conventions

153. In Part B of this report (General questions relating to international labour standards) the Committee has considered amongst other things the fulfilment by States of their obligation to report on the application of ratified Conventions. By the date of the November-December 1996 meeting of the Committee of Experts, the percentage of reports received was 63.3, compared with 65.8 per cent for the November-December 1995 meeting. Since then, further reports have been received, bringing the figure to 78.2 per cent (as compared with 78.9 per cent in June 1996, 82.0 per cent in June 1995 and 77.2 per cent in June 1994). In November-December 1996, the Committee of Experts noted that 70.4 per cent of the reports on Conventions for which information on practical application was requested contained such information, compared with 73.4 per cent in November-December 1995 and 62.5 per cent in February-March 1995. The Committee emphasizes the importance of sending practical information, without which it is impossible to know if a Convention is actually being applied. The Committee joins the Committee of Experts in appealing to governments to make every effort to include the necessary information in future reports.

Failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions

154. The Committee noted with regret that no reports on ratified Conventions had been supplied for two years or more by the following States: Armenia, Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burundi, Liberia, the Netherlands (Aruba), Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone and Somalia.

155. The Committee also noted with regret that no first reports due since 1992 on the ratified Conventions had been supplied by the following countries: Liberia (Convention No. 133); or since 1993, by Yemen (Convention No. 159); or since 1994 by Latvia (Conventions Nos. 111, 122, 135 and 151); and since 1995 by Armenia (Convention No.111); Burundi (Conventions Nos. 87, 100 and 111), Kyrgyzstan (Conventions Nos. 133 and 160), the Republic of Moldova (Convention No. 105), Nigeria (Convention No. 144), Seychelles (Convention No.149). It stressed the special importance of first reports, on which the Committee of Experts bases its first evaluation of compliance with ratified Conventions.

156. In this year's report, the Committee of Experts noted that 28 governments had not communicated replies to most or any of the observations and direct requests relating to Conventions on which reports were due for examination this year, involving a total of 323 cases (compared with 337 cases in March 1995 and 354 the previous year). The Committee was informed that, since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, 11 of the governments concerned had sent replies, which would be examined by the Committee of Experts at its next session.

157. The Committee noted with regret that no information had yet been received regarding any or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which replies were requested for the period ending 1996 from the following countries: Barbados, Bolivia, Burundi, Czech Republic, Denmark (Greenland), Djibouti, Estonia, France (French Polynesia), Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Latvia, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mozambique, Myanmar, the Netherlands (Aruba), Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Swaziland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Yemen.

158. The Committee noted the explanations provided by the Governments of the following countries concerning difficulties encountered in discharging their obligations: Barbados, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Czech Republic, Denmark (Greenland), Djibouti, France (French Polynesia), Guatemala, Jamaica, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Madagascar, Mauritania, Myanmar, the Netherlands (Aruba), Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Rwanda, Seychelles, Swaziland, the United Republic of Tanzania, Trinidad and Tobago.

159. The Committee stressed that the obligation to transmit reports is the basis of the supervisory system. It requests the Director-General to adopt all possible measures to improve the situation and solve the problems referred to above as quickly as possible. It expressed the hope that the multidisciplinary teams would give all due attention in their work in the field to standards-related issues and in particular to the fulfilment of standards-related obligations. The Committee also bore in mind the new reporting arrangements approved by the Governing Body in November 1993, which came into operation from 1995.

Application of ratified Conventions

160. The Committee noted with particular interest the steps taken by a number of governments to ensure compliance with ratified Conventions. The Committee of Experts listed in paragraph 119 of its report new cases in which governments had made changes to their law and practice following comments it had made as to the degree of conformity of national legislation or practice with the provisions of a ratified Convention. There were 25 such cases, relating to 21 countries; 2,132 cases of progress have been recorded since the Committee of Experts began listing them in 1964. These results are tangible proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory system.

161. At its present session, the Committee was informed of other instances in which measures had recently been or were about to be taken by governments with a view to ensuring the implementation of ratified Conventions. While it is for the Committee of Experts to examine these measures, the present Committee welcomes them as fresh evidence of the efforts made by governments to comply with their international obligations and to act upon the comments of the supervisory bodies.

162. The Committee thought it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to various important cases which it had to consider.

Cases of progress

163. The Committee noted with satisfaction that in a number of cases — including many involving basic human rights — governments have introduced changes in their law and practice in order to eliminate divergencies previously discussed by the Committee. It considers highlighting these cases a positive approach towards influencing governments to respond to comments of the supervisory bodies. In this respect, it refers to the report of the Committee of Experts and the discussion of individual cases which appears in Part Two of this report.

164. The Committee noted with satisfaction that in the following case the Government has introduced changes in law or practice in order to eliminate one of the divergencies (the right to organize of GCHQ staff) previously discussed by the Committee: the United Kingdom (Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87)).

Special cases

165. The Committee considered it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to its discussions of the cases mentioned in the following paragraphs, a full record of which appears in Part Two of this report.

166. As regards the application by the Islamic Republic of Iran of Convention No. 111, the Committee took note of the observations that the Committee of Experts had been formulating for several years, the oral information presented by the Government representative as well as the detailed discussion in the Committee. It also took note of the explanations provided by the Government for not heeding the offer of a direct contacts mission, as well as on technical assistance which had been provided in accordance with the priority given by the Government. The Committee noted with concern that in spite of concrete initiatives and time which had elapsed, violations of the provisions of this as well as other Conventions subsisted, and required additional information. The Committee therefore expressed the firm hope that it would be informed of the measures that would be adopted in order to eliminate any form of discrimination in job offers as well as in the criteria applied by the competent authorities to declare certain groups illegal. The Committee notes the statistical information on the employment of religious minorities and women, the information on the constitutional provision according to which it is forbidden to question people about their beliefs and the amendment permitting women to hold certain functions in the judiciary. The Committee expressed the wish that the Government would continue to provide information on progress made until such time as the national legislation and practice were in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee strongly urged the Government to accept the direct contacts mission evoked last year, in order to be able to register rapid and noticeable progress.

167. As regards the application by Morocco of Convention No. 98, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative and the debate that followed. The Committee recalled that it had discussed this case on several occasions in 1987, 1988 and 1994. The Committee noted that both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association had criticized the divergencies between law and practice in relation to the provisions of Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. Despite the fact that the Government had undertaken to submit a draft Labour Code to Parliament to bring its legislation into full conformity with the Convention, the Committee was bound to regret with deep concern the numerous complaints concerning measures of anti-union discrimination and interference in trade union activities submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee urged the Government to supply the above text so that the Committee of Experts could examine whether its provisions guaranteed adequate protection to workers against acts of anti-union discrimination and to workers' organizations against acts of interference, and whether they promoted to voluntary negotiation of collective agreements for the determination of terms and conditions of employment. The Committee once again urged the Government to indicate in its next report whether the draft Labour Code and the draft Law on the Settlement of Collective Disputes, to which it had referred, had been adopted. The Committee expressed the firm hope that it would be able to note substantial progress in this respect in the very near future. The Committee regretted that the Government had not accepted the proposal to invite a direct contacts mission, as the Committee had requested the Government to do three years ago.

168. As regards the application by Myanmar of Convention No. 87, the Committee took note of the statements made by the Government representative and of the wide discussion which took place. It recalled that this case has been discussed by the Committee on numerous occasions, in 1987, 1989, 1993, 1994, 1995 and 1996. In 1995, the Committee put its conclusions in a special paragraph of its General Report, and in 1996 it also mentioned this case in a section of its General Report highlighting the continued failure to implement, taking into account that, for many years and in spite of various appeals, serious discrepancies with the Convention continued to exist in legislation and practice. The Committee could not but deplore the fact that no government report was received by the Committee of Experts and expressed its profound regret that serious divergencies between the national legislation and the Convention continued to exist. It also deplored the fact that the Government failed to cooperate. Being greatly concerned with the total absence of progress in the application of the Convention, the Committee once again urged the Government to adopt, as a priority, the measures and mechanisms necessary to guarantee, in legislation and practice, to all workers and employers, without any distinction or any previous authorization, the right to join organizations of their own choosing to protect their interests. The Committee insisted also on the need for those organizations to have the right to affiliate with federations and confederations and with the international organizations, without any interference from the public authorities. The Committee expressed a firm hope that substantial progress in the application of the Convention might be noted in the very near future and urged the Government to supply a detailed report to the Committee of Experts.

169. As regards the application by Nigeria of Convention No. 87, the Committee noted the statement of the Government representative and of the debate which followed. The Committee set out its great concern that, although this case had been the subject of a special paragraph in 1995 and 1996, no concrete progress had been made to date in relation to the very grave trade union situation in the country. Both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association had profoundly deplored the gravity of the situation of trade unions in Nigeria. The Committee once again urged the Government to urgently derogate not only Decrees Nos. 9 and 10 of 1994, concerning dissolution of the executive councils of trade unions persecuted by the public authorities, but also to nullify the Decree of January 1996, which fixed the number of trade unions for each category of profession, and which reinforced the current trade union monopoly. The Committee lamented that notwithstanding the guarantees given by the Government, it had not replied to the request of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Governing Body to accept an ILO mission to the country with the object of examining the questions raised in this case. The Committee called on the Government to accept without delay this mission in order to examine the trade union situation in Nigeria, including the situation of the imprisoned union leaders. The Committee urged the Government to ensure full respect of civil liberties, essential for the exercise of freedom of association. The Committee expressed the firm hope that it would be able to count important progress in the very near future and asked the Government to send a detailed report to examine anew next year the situation.

170. As regards the application by Sudan of Convention No. 29, the Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representatives and of the discussion which ensued. For many years the Committee of Experts had been making references to the accusations that forced labour was frequently being imposed with the complicity or indifference of the Government. The same allegations had been made in the various reports of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan and in the comments made by the World Confederation of Labour. The Committee took note of the detailed information supplied by the Government representatives on the different questions raised, regretted that they had not been submitted earlier and considered that this information, especially that relating to the activities of the committee created by the Government, should be examined by the Committee of Experts. It also took note of the historical background and of the situation of armed conflict prevailing in Sudan, to which one of the Government representatives made reference, as well as his opinion that the allegations were politically motivated. The Committee observed that the Government could not prove the commitment which it declared it had, to spare no efforts so as to bring forced labour to an end. In view of the contradictory information received and the continuing denunciations concerning violations of the Convention, the Committee urged the Government to increase its efforts to give full application to this Convention and request the technical assistance of the Office.

171. As regards the application by Swaziland of Convention No. 87, the Committee took note of the written and oral information supplied by the Government representative, as well as the discussion which ensued. The Committee noted the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association that, despite a direct contacts mission in October 1996 and specific progress concerning the education sector, the Industrial Relations Act, 1996, contained provisions which further violated the fundamental principles of freedom of association. The Committee expressed its deep concern for the numerous and major discrepancies between the national law and practice on the one hand, and the provisions of the Convention on the other. The Committee urged the Government fully to respect the civil liberties essential to the implementation of the Convention and to apply very rapidly the recommendations of the direct contacts mission, particularly those which the social partners had already agreed upon. The Committee also urged the Government to take all the measures necessary to eliminate the restrictions on the right of workers to constitute organizations of their free choice, to hold meetings and to demonstrate peacefully, to formulate their programmes of action and to bargain collectively. The Committee trusted that the next report would indicate detailed measures adopted by the Government, with the assistance of the Office, to secure the full application of the Convention.

172. The Committee trusts that the governments concerned will take all measures necessary to correct the deficiencies noted and invites them to consider appropriate forms of ILO assistance, including direct contacts, to ensure that real progress is achieved by next year in the observance of their obligations under the ILO Constitution and the Conventions in question.

Continued failure to implement

173. The Committee recalls that its working methods provide for the listing of cases of continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiencies, previously discussed, in the application of ratified Conventions. This year the Committee noted with great concern that there had been continued failure over several years to eliminate serious discrepancies in the application by Myanmar of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); by Nigeria of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); and by Sudan of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

174. The Governments of the countries to which reference is made in paragraphs 166 to 171 are invited to supply the relevant reports and information to enable the Committee to follow up the above-mentioned matters at the next general session of the Conference.

Supply of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

175. The Committee notes that 168 of the 307 article 19 reports requested on Convention No. 150 and Recommendation No. 158 were received at the time of the Committee of Experts' meeting, and a further two since, making 55.37 per cent in all.

176. The Committee noted with regret that over the past five years none of the reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution had been supplied by Afghanistan, Djibouti, Guatemala, Haiti, Jamaica, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Nepal, Nigeria, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Trinidad and Tobago, Yemen.

Communication of copies of reports to workers' and employers' organizations

177. Once again this year, the Committee did not have to apply the criterion "The government has failed during the past three years to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23(2) of the Constitution, copies of reports and information supplied to the ILO under articles 19 and 22 have been communicated".

Participation in the work of the Committee

178. The Committee wishes to express its gratitude to the 66 governments which collaborated by providing information on the situation in their countries and participating in the discussions of their individual cases.

179. The Committee regrets that, despite the invitations, the Governments of the following States failed to take part in the discussions concerning their countries' fulfilment of their constitutional obligations to report: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Burundi, Cameroon, Ecuador, Estonia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Haiti, the Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Kyrgyzstan, the Republic of Moldova, Mozambique, Nepal, Nigeria, Syrian Arab Republic, Yemen. It decided to mention the cases of these States in the appropriate paragraphs of its report and to inform them in accordance with the usual practice.

180. The Committee notes with regret that the Governments of the States which were not represented at the Conference, namely Armenia, Grenada, Latvia, Liberia, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia were unable to participate in the Committee's examination of the cases relating to them. It decided to mention these countries in the appropriate paragraphs of this report and to inform the Governments, in accordance with the usual practice.

181. The Committee has been delighted, in a year when the Conference has so many items on its agenda relating to international labour standards, by the sustained interest which has been shown in the Organization's work for the supervision of those standards and the consistently high level and quality of participation in that work. The role of "moral conscience" of the Conference is a worthy one, to which the Committee may legitimately aspire: for conscience is that objective and impartial control — or at least monitor — of conscious action to which all humanity is subject, and which provides some inkling of the deepest truths and justices. It is after all the desire for social peace and social justice which lies at the heart of this noble Organization.

182. The strength and the test of the ILO's supervisory processes, though, are those of its whole oeuvre: the ability to translate universal principle and standard in the labour and social sphere into deed. About this there is no mystery. The reports of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the present Committee abound with the evidence. It consists, in concrete terms, in agreed objectives as to basic human rights and other labour and employment conditions; respect for democratic and legal procedures and commitments freely entered into; dogged devotion to constructive dialogue among governments and independent workers' and employers' organizations at the national and international levels; plus determination to identify and propagate the best possible technical and practical means of achieving those rights and conditions. And, in all of the above, an inexhaustible stock of good faith and hard work.

Geneva, 17 June 1997.

PART TWO

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING PARTICULAR COUNTRIES

I. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (ARTICLE 22 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Countries

(a) Failure to supply reports on the application of ratified Conventions

The Employers' members stressed that this obligation concerned all member States which have ratified Conventions. The majority of States complied with this obligation, nevertheless there were nine countries which failed to do so for the past two years or more, not to mention many others that were cited by the Committee of Experts for not having supplied reports due this year. They recalled changes introduced recently to reduce the frequency of reporting on certain Conventions, particularly with the aim of enabling member States to better comply with this obligation. Without reports, the supervisory mechanism could not function. The possibilities offered by ILO technical assistance should be used to ensure precise compliance with this obligation, as was suggested by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 103 of its General Report.

The Workers' members were in full agreement with the Employers' members on this question. Speaking of strengthening the ILO supervisory system, one had to start by complying with the obligation to submit reports. The more flexible procedures adopted in 1993 were aimed specifically at improving compliance with this obligation.

A Government representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina stated that, following the signature of the peace agreements of Dayton in December 1995, the necessary institutional conditions were reestablished to make it possible for her country to comply with its obligations to the ILO. After the elections of September 1996, the necessary changes were initiated in cooperation with the international community, to prepare the reform of the labour legislation. Her Government was fully involved in the revision of the legislation and did not have sufficient time to prepare the reports. The new labour legislation would reinforce the application of the ILO's standards in future. The speaker hoped that the Committee would be understanding of the situation in her country and gave an assurance that, in future, the necessary reports would be sent. She added that her Government was grateful to the ILO experts who participated in a seminar and thus helped the authorities in the preparation of reports.

A Government representative of the Netherlands stated that his Government attached great importance to complying with the membership obligations of the ILO. Concerning Aruba, it should be recalled that each part of the Netherlands was free to accept Conventions and their incumbent obligations. The Government could not interfere in these questions, except to respond to requests for assistance made by Aruba. The administration of Aruba solicited assistance from The Hague, but regretfully during the period when there was an excessive workload due to the carrying out of functions of the presidency of the European Union. The Hague was at present discussing with the Aruban authorities a programme of cooperation and assistance on a structural basis. This programme would involve regular contacts between the relevant government agencies, both in The Hague and Aruba. It would consist, inter alia, of traineeships in The Hague for newly-appointed Aruban staff. At this time, the authorities of The Hague and of Aruba had also made contact with the multidisciplinary team in the Caribbean region with a view to elaborating a technical cooperation programme ensuring full compliance with the obligation to provide reports. The speaker asked the Committee to excuse this regretful situation.

The Workers' members expressed their understanding with respect to the declaration of the Government representative of Bosnia and Herzegovina. In relation to the declaration of the Government representative of the Netherlands, they recalled that last year his intervention was made in very similar terms. The Workers' members expressed their hope that the situation would improve in the near future.

The Employers' members endorsed this statement of the Workers' members.

The Committee took note of the information and explanations provided by the two Government representatives who took the floor. It recalled the fundamental importance of supplying reports on ratified Conventions in the established time-limits. This obligation constituted the very foundation of the supervisory mechanism. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Governments of Armenia, Bolivia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burundi, Liberia, the Netherlands: Aruba, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone and Somalia, who at this date had not supplied reports on the application of ratified Conventions, would do so as soon as possible. The Committee decided to mention these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

A Government member of the United Republic of Tanzania suggested that the prevailing situation in Somalia be acknowledged: this rendered it impossible for the country to fulfil its constitutional obligations.

(b) Failure to supply first reports on the application of ratified Conventions

The Workers' members emphasized the particular importance of the first reports, as underlined in paragraph 110 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts, which constituted the initial base on which the Committee made its first evaluation of the application of the ratified Conventions. The ratification of Conventions was important and excellent, but the need to examine the application of the ratified Conventions was indispensable for their supervision. The first report, if it contained all the required information, permitted to avoid difficulties in the following years. Where States had difficulties in complying with this obligation, they could request technical assistance from the Office. The Workers' members hoped that such advisory services would permit progress to be made in this area.

The Employers' members fully supported the statement of the Workers' members. First reports were the beginning of the supervisory procedure. The member States should send their first reports, prepared in the most complete and detailed manner.

A Government representative of Seychelles mentioned difficulties encountered in the supply of the first report concerning the Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149), but ensured that this report would be sent in the near future.

The Workers' members regretted that of the nine States invited by the Committee only one Government representative had appeared. The Committee should take note of the information provided and mention these countries in the appropriate paragraphs of its General Report.

The Employers' members shared the concern expressed by the Workers' members and emphasized the importance of having a dialogue on the implementation of this constitutional obligation.

The Committee took note of the information and the explanations supplied by the Government representative who took the floor. It recalled the crucial importance of the first report on the application of ratified Conventions which was the point of departure for the regular supervisory system. The Committee decided to mention the case of Liberia (for Convention No. 133), Yemen (for Convention No. 159), Lithuania (for Conventions Nos. 111, 122, 135 and 151), Armenia (for Convention No. 111), Burundi (for Conventions Nos. 87, 100 and 111), Kyrgyzstan (for Conventions Nos. 133 and 160), Republic of Moldova (for Convention No. 105), Nigeria (for Convention No. 144), and Seychelles (for Convention No. 149) in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(c) Failure to supply information in reply to comments made by the Committee of Experts

The Workers' members recalled that without adequate information the Committee of Experts could not fulfil its task. This was a complementary obligation to the submission of reports. During the general discussion, it had already been pointed out that the reports which did not contain substantial information served no purpose. To contribute to the dialogue, governments had to provide complete and detailed replies to the questions asked by the Committee of Experts. The technical assistance of the Office was available to those who needed it.

The Employers' members supported the Workers' declaration. The report had no value if it did not contain a full reply. An incomplete report could be equated with a failure to report. Attention should be given to this area which touched on the proper functioning of the supervisory system.

A Government representative of Barbados mentioned difficulties linked to the lack of competent personnel to reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, as the only official who had received appropriate training had been assigned to other tasks. With the assistance of the multidisciplinary team in Port-of-Spain, he hoped to obtain the necessary training to ensure compliance with this obligation.

A Government representative of Denmark regretted not being able to provide information with respect to Greenland which was a non-metropolitan territory of Denmark. The elaboration of reports was the task of a very small administration. Recently it had promised to send a complete reply to the direct request of the Committee of Experts, and the situation hopefully would improve in the next year.

A Government representative of Djibouti recalled that his country had ratified 62 ILO Conventions at the time of obtaining independence, many of which did not correspond to the realities of the country. His Government was examining which Conventions should be maintained and which others were not adapted to the socio-economic context of Djibouti. His country had rejoined the ILO after many years of absence, and hoped to receive technical assistance in these questions from the ILO Area Office of Addis Ababa. The speaker promised that a substantial number of full reports would be supplied to the Office.

A Government representative of France stated that the replies from French Polynesia had reached Paris on 7 June 1997 and that after consultations with the social partners, they would be promptly transmitted to the ILO.

A Government representative of the Lao People's Democratic Republic stated that no particular difficulty was encountered in sending the report on the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) which corresponded with the government policy based on the Labour Law of 1994. Failure to provide reports this year was due to the situation in the Ministry of Labour, lack of competent personnel and difficulties in collecting information from the remote regions of the country. The speaker ensured that due attention would be given to this question and reports would be sent in time. He asked for the assistance from the Office to improve the situation in the Ministry of Labour with respect to this obligation.

A Government representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya stated that the communication dated 25 January 1997 addressed to the Director-General of the ILO contained all the necessary information. Copies of this communication were transmitted by him to the Office on arrival in Geneva. This communication showed the will of his Government to maintain dialogue with the ILO and its supervisory bodies.

A Government representative of Myanmar stated that the problem was of a technical and administrative nature due to the lack of the adequate personnel. Technical assistance on standards would be welcomed particularly as the last seminar had taken place in 1983. He gave assurances that appropriate measures would be taken in future to avoid sending incomplete reports.

A Government representative of the Netherlands referred to his previous intervention concerning Aruba and ensured the Committee that the situation would be improved as soon as possible.

A Government representative of Rwanda referred to the difficulties in communications between his country and the ILO headquarters and gave the assurance that his Government was willing to improve the situation in the near future. To deal with the incomplete reports, technical assistance of the ILO would be sought.

A Government representative of Swaziland requested the Office to provide technical assistance to end the practice of incomplete reporting.

A Government representative of the United Republic of Tanzania indicated that during the preceding week it had been impossible to collect all the information requested by the Committee of Experts, as mentioned by the Minister during the general discussion of the Committee. The main difficulties were in obtaining information from the other competent bodies. The Office would receive the reports in the near future.

A Government representative of the Czech Republic stated that having collected the information requested by the Committee of Experts, new comments with new requests had arrived. It would be necessary to collect all the additional information so as to transmit full reports to the Office.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representatives for their participation and regretted that too many governments had refrained from doing so. It was necessary to recall the mandatory character of the obligation to provide information in reply to the comments of the Committee of Experts, and to urge governments to ensure strict compliance with this obligation.

The Employers' members noted that a long list of member States had been invited to participate in this discussion. The failure to comply with this obligation greatly disturbed the functioning of the supervisory system. The cases concerned should be mentioned in a special paragraph of the General Report of the Committee.

The Committee took note of the information in the explanations provided by the Government representatives having taken the floor. It stressed the great importance for the continuation of an open and constructive dialogue of the submission of clear and complete replies to the comments of the Committee of Experts. The Committee recalled that providing replies was part of the obligation to send reports. It therefore expressed its concern about the great number of cases in which information was not supplied in reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts. The Committee recalled that governments could request ILO assistance to resolve any difficulties that they might encounter in this area. The Committee urged the Governments concerned — Barbados, Bolivia, Burundi, Czech Republic, Denmark: Greenland, Djibouti, Estonia, France: French Polynesia, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Islamic Republic of Iran, Iraq, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Latvia, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mozambique, Myanmar, the Netherlands: Aruba, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Swaziland, United Republic of Tanzania, Yemen, to make every effort to supply as quickly as possible the information requested. The Committee decided to mention these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(d) Failure to supply reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

The Employers' members recalled that this matter was a constitutional obligation and the discussion of the General Survey of the Committee of Experts this year had revealed problems caused by the insufficient number of reports. When the number of reports available for the preparation of a General Survey decreased, the ILO and the social partners lost the opportunity to have a general overview on the topics selected by the Governing Body. These General Surveys were fundamental for the future activities of the ILO.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the Employers' statement. Measures had been taken to facilitate the governments' workload in connection with the ILO's supervisory system and governments, on their part, should better comply with the existing obligations.

A Government representative of Djibouti referred to his previous intervention explaining the difficulties facing his Government in complying with this obligation.

A Government representative of Guatemala, the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, acknowledged non-compliance with this obligation due to the numerous institutional and personnel changes in his country during the recent years. The situation could be improved with the technical assistance of the Office.

A Government representative of Jamaica referred to the absence of competent personnel to comply with this obligation. With the help of the multidisciplinary team of Port-of-Spain he hoped to obtain the necessary training for personnel and to receive the same satisfactory remarks from the Committee of Experts as had been made in respect of Jamaica in other cases. The reports due would be sent and after participation in the course of international labour standards organized by the ILO Turin Centre, the situation would change for the better.

A Government representative of Lesotho explained that the problem in complying with reporting obligations was of an administrative and technical nature. She stated that the fact that the ILO correspondence was sent to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs created difficulties for the Ministry of Employment and Labour in promptly replying to the questions raised in the reports. She made reference to the absence of competent personnel to carry out the reporting obligation and expressed the Ministry's anticipation that participation in the training course in international labour standards in the ILO Turin Centre would help improve the situation. After the visit of the Deputy Director-General for Technical Cooperation, a decision was taken to reinforce the office dealing with relations with the ILO. She added that, together with the assistance of the MDT in southern Africa, this would lead to the improvement of the situation in the future.

A Government representative of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya recalled that his country should be deleted from the list, taking into account the communication to the Director-General referred to in his previous intervention.

A Government representative of Mauritania requested the technical assistance of the Office to improve the present situation.

A Government representative of Papua New Guinea regretted failure to comply with this obligation. Nevertheless, she ensured that the report requested for the General Survey of 1998 had been sent. The possibility of ratifying the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), was being studied.

A Government representative of Paraguay referred to the ministerial changes which affected the functioning of institutions. In addition, the office in charge of the preparation of reports required strengthening. His Government was truly committed to complying with ILO standards. The speaker expressed his gratitude for the technical assistance provided by the ILO Regional Office as well as for the cooperation which was provided by the Ministry of Labour of Uruguay. He hoped to reverse the situation in the near future, so that the Government would be able to provide all the reports due.

A Government representative of Trinidad and Tobago stated that in 1996 a tripartite committee was created following the ratification of Convention No. 144 which was responsible for the presentation of the reports required. The report for the General Survey of 1998 had already been sent and the necessary measures would be taken to improve the situation as soon as possible.

The Employers' members took note of the brief comments made by the Government representatives, some of whom have requested the technical assistance of the ILO. This should be provided. There was no possibility of deleting a country from the list when there were no guarantees as to the content of the communications sent. Neither would it be appropriate to express satisfaction solely on the basis of the declarations made in this Committee. It was particularly necessary to improve the situation so as to strengthen the General Surveys of the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members supported the declaration of the Employers' members.

The Committee noted the information and explanations supplied by the Government representatives who took the floor. The Committee emphasized the importance it attached to the constitutional obligations to send reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations, particularly in connection with the future work of the Committee, as these reports permitted a better evaluation of the situation within the context of the General Surveys of the Committee of Experts. The Committee expressed its hope that in future all member States would regularly fulfil their obligations in this respect and that the Governments of Afghanistan, Djibouti, Guatemala, Haiti, Jamaica, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mauritania, Nepal, Nigeria, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Solomon Islands, Saint Lucia, Somalia, Trinidad and Tobago, Yemen, would fulfil their obligations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution. The Committee decided to mention these cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(e) Written information received up to the end of the meeting of the Committee on the Application of Standards[1]

Algeria. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the first report concerning the application of Convention No. 144, as well as replies to all the Committee's comments.

Convention No. 17: Workmen's Compensation (Accidents), 1925

New Zealand. (ratification: 1938). A Government representative of New Zealand stressed that his Government had previously acknowledged to the ILO that there were difficulties in respecting fully the provisions of the Convention and that steps would be taken to achieve compliance. The Committee of Experts had been kept fully informed of progress towards compliance, including information on the amendments made to the Accident Rehabilitation and Compensation Insurance Act in 1996. The Committee of Experts noted the information provided, urged the Government to move towards full compliance and asked for a detailed report in 1998. He indicated his Government's willingness to fulfil this request and specified that his Government should be able to provide, at that stage, detailed information on the impact of the 1996 legislative changes, which had been in force for only three months, as well as on any relevant amendments which might occur in this regard.

The Employers' members noted the admission by the Government representative that the provisions in force in the country concerning compensation for industrial accidents and benefits to injured workers were not in compliance with the Convention. They noted in this respect that the relevant regulations requiring victims to bear a part of the cost of the necessary medical and other treatment, as well as the whole cost of certain aids or appliances where their total cost was under a certain limit over a specified period, infringed the Convention. The Government representative had referred to the recent adoption of certain amendments, which he had stated were expected to lead to an improvement in the level of the benefits provided. However, the Government representative had stated that it was too early to be able to evaluate the actual effect of these amendments in practice. The Committee of Experts had emphasized the need to ensure full compliance with Article 9 of the Convention and had requested the Government to provide a copy of the above amendments. The Conference Committee should therefore request the Government to submit information on relevant amendments and practice as soon as possible, so that the Committee of Experts could determine whether the country was still in violation of the Convention.

The Workers' members recalled that New Zealand had ratified the Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17), in 1938, and had ratified the Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42),s in 1938. Basically, workers should be entitled to full compensation in case of occupational accidents and diseases. Throughout the history of the ILO, this had been considered one of the most important areas of worker protection. The report of the Committee of Experts described the practice in New Zealand of forcing workers who were victims of occupational accidents to bear part of the cost of both medical treatment and the supply and renewal of aids and appliances. This was contrary to Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention, according to which the costs should be paid either by the employer or by insurance institutions, and not by the injured worker. The Government had indicated that there had been some changes, but had not given full assurance that victims did not have to pay part of the costs. The Committee of Experts had made these same observations since 1993. In the 1994 report, the Government stated that a decision to rectify the situation had been taken in principle and that legislation would be modified as soon as possible. In the 1995 report, the Government reported that work on these issues had been put on a fast-track. They now asked the Government to assure the Committee that workers did not have to bear these costs. In the current report, the Government stated that it expected the amended legislation would result in higher levels of medical and rehabilitation benefits. He requested clarification of this statement and asked if this would result in full compliance with the Convention. In the past, in New Zealand as well as in Sweden, cases of occupational accidents had been taken to court in order to get damage compensation. Later, a general insurance system for employment injuries was introduced which had been beneficial for both the workers and employers. But the current discussion centred around damage compensation, not some type of welfare benefits which were dependent on the generosity of the State. That was why compensation in cases of occupational accidents and diseases could not be compared with, for example, health insurance benefits. As could be seen in the report, New Zealand was not the only country violating ratified Conventions on this subject, for instance, the report also cited violations on the part of Sweden concerning Convention No. 121. Was the Committee to conclude that workers must once again resort to the court systems in order to be fully compensated? He agreed with the request of the Committee of Experts, which once again urged the Government of New Zealand to take immediate steps to ensure full compliance with this Convention and to report in detail on additional measures for its implementation.

The Workers' member of New Zealand emphasized that, in this case, the question of non-compliance was not contested since New Zealand acknowledged the breaches which were: (1) the failure to ensure that all treatment costs for work injuries were provided at no cost to the injured worker as required by Article 9 of the Convention. The Government had admitted that injured workers in New Zealand were required to meet a total of at least $23 million each year for their own primary hospital treatment of work injuries. In fact, every medical attendance, procedure and treatment required a significant contribution by workers; (2) the failure to ensure that artificial limbs and other aids and appliances were supplied, repaired and renewed at no cost to the injured worker as required by Article 10. In this respect, the Government had admitted that even seriously injured workers were required under its regulations to meet part of the costs of artificial limbs and other aids and appliances; and (3) the failure to ensure that there was no time limitation on the payment of weekly earnings compensation to the widows and dependants of workers killed in work accidents.

These were serious breaches which struck at the heart of the Convention. As noted, the New Zealand compensation scheme was a trade-off for the legal right to sue employers in courts. The social contract had been seriously breached by the constant erosion of entitlements under the New Zealand Accident Compensation Scheme without the benefit of court remedies. It was inexcusable for a country like New Zealand to leave injured workers to partially fund their own treatment and renewal of artificial limbs. Nevertheless, it was to the credit of the Government that it had acknowledged the breaches and undertaken to remedy them. The real question for this Committee was to assess the credibility of governmental undertakings that the breach would be remedied. Despite assurances given by the Government to the Committee of Experts in 1994 and 1995 to the effect that the situation would be rectified and the issue put "on a separate fast-track" before the Parliament, the situation remained unchanged for injured workers in New Zealand. He noted that the 1997 Committee of Experts report contained yet another statement which was clearly intended to be a reassurance of progress. More precisely, the Government advised that a legislative amendment passed in August 1996 would permit a more flexible approach, which it was hopeful would result in the higher level of medical costs and rehabilitation being provided depending upon the way in which broad discretions in the Act were implemented. He insisted that despite the legislative amendment referred to nothing had changed for injured workers in New Zealand and it was very questionable whether the 1996 legislative amendments could make much difference in practice. He considered that, having failed to deliver on its repeated commitments to ensure full compliance, the Government had put its credibility at stake. He informed the Conference Committee that the latest public announcements indicated that further legislative change was possible in the near future which would require injured people to pay the first several hundred dollars of treatment costs. Such a move could transfer several hundred million more dollars of treatment costs from the compensation authority to the injured person and compound the current breaches of the Convention. He therefore asked the Government representative to clearly answer the following question: Would the 1996 legislative amendment ensure full compliance with the Convention? If the answer was yes, by what date would full compliance be achieved? and, if the answer was no, what specific legislative or other steps did the Government intend to take and by what date would this be achieved?

He informed the Committee that, as a result of a tripartite consultation, including the New Zealand Minister of Labour, held in Geneva with the technical assistance of the ILO, it seemed likely that full compliance with the Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42), could be realized by a ministerial policy directive to the compensation corporation which would be tabled in Parliament. He asked the Government representative if New Zealand was prepared to consider such a mechanism for the Convention since a ministerial policy directive to the compensation corporation could enable a real "fast-track" to comply with its provisions.

He called for the Committee to request the Government in strong terms to bring its law and practice into full conformity with the Convention and to provide a detailed report to the Committee of Experts so that it could achieve its examination of the case at its session to be held at the end of the year.

The Workers' member of Singapore stated that the breach of Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention was not in dispute. The only dispute was the extent to which the Government had taken steps to remedy these breaches. Since 1994, the Government had promised to comply with the Convention, and purported to have done so with the Amendment of 1996 to the Accident Rehabilitation and Compensation Insurance Act of 1992 which promised a "more flexible approach" to reimbursing workers for their medical costs and social rehabilitation. Therefore, the issue was whether this "more flexible approach" fulfilled the objectives of Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention: that the costs of medical treatment and artificial limbs and other aids and appliances for victims of industrial accidents be borne by either the employer or an insurance institution. In fact, even after the 1996 Amendment, injured workers continued to be required to pay for a substantial portion of the cost of medical treatment and surgical appliances, indicating that the measures taken were only half-hearted. Although it was true that injuries were sometimes caused by worker negligence, most often they were caused by inadequate safety measures in the workplace. It was not valid for the Government to argue that more time was needed to evaluate the results of the new Amendment which had been in effect for only three months since the Government had been promising for three years to solve the problem. Workers and their families had a fundamental right to be protected from the hardships caused by work injuries and should not be required to pay contributions out of their savings. Therefore, the Government should either further amend the laws to specifically provide for adequate compensation, issue specific administrative guidelines on how the "flexible approach" should be carried out in practice, or, at a minimum, restore the right of workers to recover full costs in court.

The Workers' member of the United States supported the statements made by the Workers' members and by the representative of the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions. The Committee had been informed that the workers' compensation scheme was a trade-off for the legal right to take employers to court. This agreement provided for full coverage of all treatment of work injuries at no cost to the injured worker, but this was no longer the case. Injured workers were now required to meet a substantial portion of the treatment costs of their work injuries, both for primary and hospital treatment. The Committee of Experts had noted for a number of years that this was in clear violation of Article 9 of the Convention. The current situation was created by governmental legislative action and threatened the foundation of New Zealand's workers' compensation scheme. It was not surprising to hear, therefore, that in New Zealand, the issue of the right to take employers to court was beginning to re-emerge in public discussions. He understood that there were situations where injured workers had the right to take employers to court on claims of negligence, intentionally reckless disregard of occupational safety and health, and on other bases, and that there had been cases where substantial payments by employers had been awarded by the courts. Not withstanding the 1996 amendment, the course of action followed by the New Zealand Government since 1992 would not seem to be a wise one and might be potentially costly for employers. Indeed, it appeared that the Government agreed, since it assured the Committee that it was taking steps to bring the Accident Rehabilitation and Compensation Insurance Act into compliance with Convention No. 17. The New Zealand Government had been giving this assurance to the Committee since 1993. It was, with all due respect, time for the New Zealand Government to make good on its commitments.

The Workers' member of Greece shared the views expressed by the Workers' members and by the Workers' member of New Zealand. However, he was surprised that this country applied such a social policy since it would be totally unacceptable even for less-developed countries. The limitation on the provision of medical, surgical and pharmaceutical aid recognized to be necessary, was in breach of Article 9 of the Convention. He recalled that the Convention was at the very heart of labour law and social security and that the costs of such aid should be defrayed either by the employer or by insurance institutions. In the case of insolvency, the State should take the necessary measures to ensure that medical assistance would be defrayed as provided for in the Convention.

The Workers' member of Pakistan emphasized that a worker injured in a work accident suffered not only physically but also mentally, and that other workers were also affected. It was the responsibility of the employers and the State to assist in minimizing these adverse effects, and in the interest of both the community and industry, social security should cover all costs incurred. Therefore, he supported the statements of the other Workers' members. He was happy to note the New Zealand agreement reached concerning the implementation of Convention No. 42 on occupational diseases, and welcomed a similar administrative solution to the problem of compliance under Convention No. 17. In closing, he urged the Government to comply fully with the requirements of Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention.

The Government representative indicated that his Government supported the principles underlying the Convention which was that injured workers should not have to meet the necessary costs of work injuries. In working towards compliance with that principle, a key question was how to ensure that only necessary costs were met by the employer or the accident compensation scheme. It was essential that only reasonable costs became a charge upon the scheme or the employer, and that there were no incentives for either service providers or claimants, to set prices or choose services at unrealistic levels. The key was to achieve an appropriate balance that met the genuine needs of the Convention — and workers — while not adversely affecting the sustainability of the scheme. As indicated to the Committee of Experts, changes had already been made to the accident compensation scheme in 1996 which would move his country towards compliance with the Convention. These changes involved freeing the corporation from regulatory constraints which limited or controlled the level of reimbursement of costs and giving it greater discretion to meet actual needs where those were reasonable. He recalled that those changes had been in force for only three months. It was therefore difficult to assess their impact on the extent of his country's compliance with the Convention and monitoring was ongoing. In addition, he stressed that the new Government was currently addressing a number of issues related to the accident compensation scheme. Options were being developed by officials which would potentially have an impact on the question of compliance with the Convention. With regard to the specific questions raised by the Workers' member of New Zealand, he considered that more time was needed to assess the real impact of changes promulgated. Their operation needed to be monitored over a reasonable period of time but he believed that his Government would be able to report fully to the Committee of Experts in 1998.

Concerning the time needed to put into force new legislation if necessary, he reiterated that the new Government was actually addressing a broad range of issues to do with the accident compensation scheme, and that, in doing so, consideration would also be given to its impact on the Convention. Finally, with regard to any technical issues which could arise in the future in connection with the Convention, he stressed that his Government would enter into dialogue with the ILO to explore administrative arrangements to overcome these technical problems.

The Workers' members stated that they had not heard the Government commit itself to complying fully with the Convention by eliminating all costs to the injured worker. They welcomed the Government's intention to monitor the new legislation, but wondered whether the Government was convinced of the need to change the present system, and they had doubts about the Government's resolve. Lastly, they thought that a report should be submitted earlier than the date requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative and the debate which followed. The Committee observed that victims of work accidents were required to pay part of the cost of medical assistance and other necessary treatment and that limits existed on the reimbursement of costs for prosthesis and orthopaedic appliances. The Committee asked the Government to adopt without delay the necessary measures to secure full application of Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention, and took note that the Government representative expressed the readiness of his Government to receive technical assistance from the Office. The Committee invited the Government to send a detailed report to the Office and hoped that it would be possible to note concrete progress in the near future.

Convention No. 29: Forced Labour, 1930

Brazil (ratification: 1957). A Government representative acknowledged that it was not the first time that the application of the Convention by Brazil had been before the Committee. The Government remained attentive to the observations of the Committee of Experts and reiterated that it was taking measures to combat and eradicate forced labour in the country.

The Brazilian legislation directly opposed the exploitation of forced labour. The federal law covered crimes against labour and the penal law covered crimes against individual freedom, such as reducing someone to conditions analogous to slavery which was punished with a minimum penalty of one to eight years imprisonment.

The Government, aware that legislation was not enough to eradicate forced labour, had put in place various mechanisms which had the principle objective of abolishing forced labour, especially in rural areas and regions which were difficult to access.

The Government's concern was not restricted to the ambit of the Minister of Labour, but also extended to all levels of the Federal Administration. The effort of the Government was exemplified in the creation of the Executive Group for the Abolition of Forced Labour (GERTRAF), instituted by the President of the Republic through Decree No. 1,538 of June 1995. The GERTRAF was comprised of representatives of the Ministers of: Labour; Environment; Hydraulic Resources and the Amazon Authority; Agriculture and Supply; Land Policy; Prevention and Social Assistance; Justice; and Industry, Trade and Tourism. The GERTRAF had elaborated, put into place and supervised integrated programmes to eliminate forced labour and to promote the necessary labour legislation for the widest implementation. In this area, with the object of completing the relevant legislation, it coordinated the actions of the competent bodies to eliminate forced labour and developed adequate measures with the assistance of the ILO and the Public Ministers of the Union and of the States.

Concerning the coordination with other bodies and entities, in addition to the GERTRAF, the Minister of Labour was now involved in various fields: firstly, in the context of the compromise agreement signed at the end of 1994 by the Attorney General, the Public Minister of Labour, and the Federal Police, government actions taken or which were to be put in effect were discussed, planned, and evaluated together, with the objective of preventing and punishing the practice of forced labour. At the same time, monthly meetings of the National Forum Against Rural Violence were held, which brought together governmental and non-governmental bodies such as the Pastoral Commission on Land and the National Confederation of Agricultural Workers (CONTAG). During these meetings complaints were brought, funding strategies discussed, and other complementary actions were taken.

To reinforce the system of inspection and guarantee the systematic investigation of complaints of forced labour, the Special Mobile Inspection Service has increased its agility. Since March 1996, it has decentralized its operations with the creation of Regional Centres. The Regional Centres of the Special Mobile Inspection Service were linked to a National Centre in Brasilia, under the responsibility of the National Secretary of Labour Inspection, who also coordinated GERTRAF. The Special Mobile Inspection Service consisted of a trained team of labour inspection agents with autonomy to carry out inspections at any location on national territory, independent of jurisdiction.

Of the 83 enterprises inspected in 1995, a total of 26,242 workers were affected; and in 1996, with the intensification of inspection, 239 enterprises were inspected, affecting 82,395 workers. The economic activities which were the subject of complaints and inspections were typically rural, and consisted largely of adult male labourers.

All of the reports of the Inspectors involving complaints of forced labour were directed by the Ministry of Labour to the Attorney General in order to prepare the procedures which occur in the Federal Prosecution of Civil Rights. As soon as the Public Ministry of Labour informed the Ministry of Labour on the development of the processes, this information would be transmitted to the Committee of Experts.

An important instrument in combating the practice of exploitation of forced labour was the application of Ordinance No. 101, of January 1995, of the Minister of Labour, which determined that, in virtue of the social function of ownership, in cases of employers who the Special Mobile Inspection Service verified were repeat offenders in degrading workers, a detailed report should be sent to the National Institute of Settlements and Agrarian Reform (INCRA) for a recommendation dealing with the confiscation of land for agrarian reform.

This past March, coordination was established between the Ministers of Labour, of Environment, and of Hydraulic Resources and the Amazon Authority, and the Public Minister of Labour, with a view to a rapid application of this instrument.

In order to secure the fulfilment of the objectives of the National Program on Human Rights, the National Secretary of Human Rights, linked to the Ministry of Justice, was created on 7 April 1997, which will coordinate, administer, and complete the execution of this programme. The principal objective was to give coherence to the sectoral policies of the various governmental areas concerning human and civil rights in a form consistent with civil society. Another objective was to promote the interchange and cooperation of international bodies concerning human rights; and to coordinate the Council for the Defence of Persons and the National Council for the Rights of Women, and with the group to support the National Program on Human Rights. The National Secretary of Human Rights would also promote and stimulate public awareness campaigns to create a culture of human and civil rights.

Furthermore, a Subgroup on Normalization was created, which proposed in July 1996 the establishment of measures to facilitate adoption of Draft Law No. 929/95, which defined as a crime all action leading to or involving the exploitation of forced or degrading labour. This draft law had been widely discussed by all segments of society and currently was before the Committee on Constitution and Justice in the Chamber of Deputies. This Bill contained the necessary means to apply more severe penalties and opened the possibility for the Government to verify that those who benefited directly or indirectly would be punished, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention.

The speaker stated that a recent meeting of the National Secretary of Human Rights was held, comprised of representatives of governmental and non-governmental bodies, which discussed the proposals formulated by the National Forum Against Rural Violence. The Federal Government, through the National Secretary of Human Rights, had begun to take the necessary steps to facilitate the presentation of the above-mentioned Bill before the National Congress. His Government would, as usual, keep the ILO informed of the presentation of the Bill, as well as of any new measures adopted to give full effect to the principles of the Convention. In conclusion, he pointed out that his Government accorded great importance to the fulfilment of ratified Conventions and emphasized fundamental labour standards; and it was especially dedicated to observing their application in practice.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information provided. Last year, this Committee noted that there had been a change in the Governments' attitude to the violations of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 since 1986. As a result of a representation submitted pursuant to Article 24 of the Constitution by the Latin American Central of Workers (CLAT), the tripartite committee set up by the Governing Body had examined the situation and submitted its conclusions. The case was also considered in detail by the present Committee in 1992, 1993, and 1996. During the last discussion, it was noted that the Government participated actively in the examination of the problems in question by submitting a report which demonstrated progress in several areas. The present Committee had insisted, however, in its conclusions that these efforts be pursued and expanded, both as regards the amendment of existing and the adoption of new legislation and the application of effective sanctions on the whole territory of Brazil. With pleasure and interest the Committee could note certain positive developments also this year in the directions urged by the Committee of Experts. It should, however, be emphasized that the efforts undertaken be commensurate with the scope and complexity of the problem of forced labour in all its manifestations, in a country which suffers from significant problems of exploitation and inequality. The serious problem of child labour should also be recalled in this context.

The information provided by the Government indicated that further progress had been made. However, there were shortcomings, as the Committee of Experts had stressed, in the application of Article 25 of the Convention. These existed notably in relation to the subcontracting and use of intermediaries which continued to favour the impunity of those who profited most from forced labour. It should be noted with interest that the ministers, the parliamentary Committees, as well as the national congress were preparing draft legislation with the assistance of GERTRAF. The civil society, notably through the trade unions and the churches, was involved in the preparation of projects which should allow for a more efficient repression of forced labour by imposing sanctions, including prison sentences, on those who use forced labour. In the same vein, the efforts in the areas of inspection and control were welcomed. The relevance of these measures were evidenced by the support it benefited from in the civil society. It was, however, of importance that the Government ensured that in the fight against slavery the essential service of inspection could be carried out with sufficient guarantee for the safety of its agents. It remained to point out that the deplorable and excessive slowness of the judicial procedures risked nullifying, in practice, the strengthening of the legislation.

In conclusion, while considerable progress has been noted in several areas, the practical implementation of the envisaged measures remain uncertain. That was why it was important to adopt urgently the draft legislation which provided for a more efficient repression of forced labour. The good intentions of the Government were welcomed, but they should not obscure the fact that the legal proceedings still proceeded with unacceptable slowness and that the profiteers from exploitation of forced labour continued to remain at large.

The Employers' members addressed the different points enumerated by the Committee of Experts in its observation. Last year there had been a detailed examination of this case further to a representation made by the Latin American Central of Workers (CLAT). This representation had been justified because it referred to situations of forced labour in all of its different forms such as debt bondage, physical ill treatment, torture, harassment and sometimes death of thousands of workers. Nonetheless the Government had started taking measures. An example was the establishment of the Executive Group for the Abolition of Forced Labour (GERTRAF) for the purpose of proposing severe sanctions for anyone exacting forced labour. It was not easy to establish who was responsible for the use of forced labour since often those responsible were not the users but the intermediaries.

Regarding the difficulty of imposing penalties due to the fact that the concept of slave labour contained in Section 149 of the Penal Code had not been clearly defined by legislation, the Employers' members stated that this ambiguity should be removed by the Government. As for the Bill being examined by the GERTRAF with a view to defining a whole series of definitions of forced labour, the text of the Bill must be verified to determine whether further specifications needed to be mentioned. Moreover, specific sanctions needed to be applied for specific types of child labour.

Although the activities of the Special Mobile Inspection Service had resulted in greater effectiveness of the inspection system and of the judicial proceedings initiated on the basis of the inspection reports, the Committee needed to know more about the number of prosecutions that had actually taken place. As for the slowness of judicial proceedings, this was often the consequence of the legal guarantees which were inherent in a State which was based on the rule of law, but maximum efforts should be undertaken to resolve this problem. The Government had undoubtedly taken a number of important and correct measures. It was important to coordinate these measures especially in a federal State like Brazil. At the end of the previous year's discussion in this Committee, the Employers' Employers' members had asked the Government to continue intensive efforts to put an end to forced labour. A year later they expressed this hope more urgently and trusted that there would soon be progress and major changes.

The Workers' member of Brazil highlighted the precision with which the Committee of Experts had treated the main questions of the present case. The observations went to the heart of the matter. Many initiatives had been taken to combat the problem of forced labour. The creation of GERTRAF and the coordination of the regional labour inspectorates, in particular the Special Mobile Inspection Service, were steps in the right direction. It had to be observed that the action of the unions, as well as the routine work of the inspection service and complaints, together with the other institutions of civil society, had led to a draft law on the abolition of forced labour.

Nonetheless, the speaker regretted that doubts existed about the definition of forced labour in Brazil and, therefore, the judiciary was afraid to consider forced labour as slavery. Should working for food be considered slavery? Certain social sectors did not recognize that the right to life was linked to the right to work.

The effective abolition of forced labour encountered significant obstacles in Brazilian institutions notably as concerned the powers exercised by the Judiciary and the Government's own administration. This situation permitted forced labour to be used by small enterprises, which acted as the intermediary for producers, thus benefiting in this perverse way many economic groups, including multinational corporations, which should also be subject to penal sanctions.

Immediate changes in the legislation were necessary to bring all violators to justice in a rapid and efficient manner. This was the spirit of Article 25 of Convention No. 29. It was not enough to simply create working groups or to adopt administrative measures. These measures, by their nature, would not affect all of those which were involved. The political will must also exist to leave the imaginary world for the real one.

The speaker asked about the political will to push through the draft legislation. The current Government had a majority which permitted it to complete within four months a constitutional reform to allow the reelection of the President of the Republic, as well as governors and mayors. If the will of the Government existed to eliminate forced labour in the country, it could solicit urgent treatment for the draft laws which provided for sanctions for those that directly or indirectly used forced labour. The Government of Brazil had made clear in the meeting of the WTO in Singapore that the ILO was the appropriate body in which to discuss social issues concerning the world of work. Consequently, the Government should accept the labelling of Brazilian products, certifying that they were made in accordance with international labour standards. This, no doubt, would give great political authority to proposed immediate action by Congress.

The Workers' member of Argentina stated that this case was important for all workers of his country given that they participated with workers' organizations of Brazil in the Network of Central Trade Unions of the Southern Cone and in the working committees and subgroups of MERCOSUR, in particular concerning labour relations, employment and social security. They shared the concern of the Brazilian workers that there be compliance with ILO standards, in particular those regarding fundamental human rights.

The speaker recalled that the case had been discussed by the Committee in 1993 and 1996: forced labour was the most brutal exploitation of humans and should be abolished definitively. There should be no indulgence shown towards those who used forced labour nor tolerance for the governments which allowed it. The Committee of Experts had drawn attention to the lengthy legal procedures and the lack of penal sanctions. The indications given by the Government raised serious doubts: it was not sufficient to create conditions or to present draft legislation; what was missing was the elimination of unacceptable employment recruitment practices by which workers were subjected to inhumane conditions for the benefit and greed of some.

The speaker urged the Government of Brazil to improve the mechanisms for supervision, to guarantee the enforcement of judicial decisions, and to demonstrate a real interest in eradicating the practice of forced labour. The Government should transmit to the Office concrete evidence of the abolition of forced labour, in particular for the most vulnerable workers, such as agricultural workers and indigenous peoples.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom pointed out that this case was a very difficult one. Although there was a lot of talk about what was going on, she was not clear as to what output or impact there had actually been. The speaker recalled that the 1996 observation of the Committee of Experts detailed cases of appalling abuse in which workers in various sectors of the rural economy were recruited on the basis of false promises, transported from their place of residence to isolated workplaces where they were forced to work long hours in sub-human conditions. These workers were in a situation of complete dependence, in conditions of debt bondage and forcibly prevented from leaving their employment relationship. Attempts to leave risked a violent response of ill treatment, torture, harassment and sometimes death.

In addition, there appeared to be an impasse on the legislative front. The first Bill referred to in paragraph 3 of the observation of the Committee of Experts seemed to be so wide-ranging that it risked obscuring Brazil's main priority which was to deal with slave labour, labour analogous to slavery and forced labour. The Bill covered a wide range of abusive employment relationships, some of which had only a tenuous relationship with forced labour and appeared to stretch the definition beyond what could be considered degrading, let alone forced labour, for example, gambling. Moreover, while the Bill provided for financial penalties, the Convention required that penalties should be adequate and strictly enforced. Thus, the Convention required more than the removal of credit facilities. Such penalties were not an appropriate response to what was a crime against humanity. Penalties needed to be punitive. The second Bill before Congress related to the impunity of enterprises that used a subcontracting system. Its provisions were listed in the observation of the Committee of Experts. They seemed to take the issue forward. But it was not clear what had happened to these proposed Bills. Where were they now? The speaker was of the view, however, that what was required was a unified, focused piece of legislation which laid down national standards to be enforced energetically through adequately resourced local agencies.

On the question of inspection, the Government had provided information on 83 enterprises in 1995. The speaker wondered what rate of coverage this represented and how long it would take for all enterprises to be inspected. Moreover, since the Government had stated that the Special Mobile Inspection Service had resulted in greater effectiveness of the inspection system, it should indicate how it had evaluated the effectiveness of these measures.

The Committee of Experts had also noted the excessive slowness of the judicial proceedings and that numerous trials initiated in 1991, 1993 and 1994 were still in progress. The Committee of Experts had considered that this amounted to a denial of justice. The speaker wondered what the Government had done to speed up the proceedings. Finally, she wanted the Government to provide further information on how many workers had been freed from forced labour since the start of the Government's programme and what support had been provided by the Government to those workers. Moreover, she wished to know what public awareness campaign had been launched at the State and national levels.

The Workers' member of Colombia indicated that the observations submitted by workers' organizations and the comments of the Committee of Experts were evidence that a violation of the Convention persisted. The Government should work more effectively to end this practice which constituted a serious offence against human dignity. The neo-liberal model imposed on workers not only the scourge of unemployment, but left them also in conditions of servitude. It was curious how tribunals functioned in these cases, to the detriment of an effective defense of the rights of workers. The information provided by the Government indicated that results had not been heartening. New laws were not necessary, only their fulfilment, along with a commitment from the Government to take measures to ensure that the situation of forced labour was eliminated in the country. Labour inspection should be reinforced and sanctions put in place to punish those criminals who profited from forced labour.

The Workers' member of Greece noted that upon a reading of the report of the Committee of Experts, Brazil did not stand out as the main culprit when it came to forced labour and slavery in all its forms. It was a source of pleasure to note the efforts the Government had agreed to undertake in order to halt these practices. But in order to evaluate the real impact of these efforts the Government representative should state in detail how many enterprises or individuals were condemned for such practices and the sanctions imposed.

The Workers' member of the United States stated that what was at the heart of this debate was simply equal justice and equal protection under the law. He recognized that efforts appeared to have been made by some Brazilian legislators to come to grips with the forced or compulsory labour problem, including the drafting of a Bill which was being examined by the GERTRAF (Executive Group for the Abolition of Forced Labour), a governmental agency instituted by President Fernando Henrique Cardoso. As the observation of the Committee of Experts made clear, this proposed Bill attempted to define a larger classification called degrading labour, including what would be identified as forced, compulsory and slave labour, with some efforts at providing for administrative sanctions. Moreover, the observation pointed out that the Government had reported that its Ministerial Decree MTb 369 of 29 March 1996 had conferred greater flexibility and efficiency to the inspection service on its efforts to identify slave labour, even though a mere 83 enterprises had been inspected in 1995 and 239 in 1996.

Nevertheless, his group was still awaiting a number of concrete results after one year, results which were not at all clear after hearing the Government's representation. In its report of last year, the Government had attempted to justify the difficulty of effective compliance with Article 25 of the Convention by saying that Brazilian legislation had not yet succeeded in defining the concept of slave labour under section 149 of the Brazilian Penal Code. Yet, Bill No. 929 of 1995, which was supported by many private and governmental organizations, including the National Confederation of Agricultural Workers (CONTAG), the Pastoral Commission on Land (CPT) and the Secretariat of the Ministry of Labour Inspectorate, just to name a few, provided for measures for the establishment of enforcement mechanisms and penal sanctions in order to ensure compliance with Article 25 of the Convention. To date, unfortunately, no real progress was known in respect of such a legislative initiative. Moreover, the Committee of Experts had noted in its observation that there were a number of cases concerning forced labour still pending in the Brazilian judicial system, including trials initiated in 1994, 1993 and 1991.

The speaker also pointed out that the decentralization of the inspection service, which the Government claimed had produced more flexibility and efficiency in the struggle against slave labour, certainly had not increased the security of inspection personnel responsible for the inspection function. To the contrary, many more of them had received threats to their physical integrity, as the Committee of Experts had observed. The Government representative had not mentioned any rectification of this very grave problem.

The speaker referred to the change in the legislation pushed through by the Government in the public sector to introduce temporary contracts, flexible work patterns, and deregulatory measures. He indicated several cases of repression against agricultural workers, the arrest of leaders of "The Landless Peoples' Movement", massacres of workers, such as at Eldorado de Carajas, sanctions against trade union members for participating in economic strikes, for example, the strike against the National Petroleum Federation two years ago. He insisted that the Brazilian Government punish those who violate the Convention by subjecting workers to forced labour, and that it show the same commitment as when it imposed sanctions to protect land, capital and private property. He considered that, in spite of certain measures taken, these were unfortunately insufficient.

The Workers' member of Pakistan pointed out that unfortunately the situation of forced labour prevailed in many parts of the world. This situation was an affront to human dignity. Since Brazil was a major country of Latin America, it had a special responsibility to deal with this problem. However, those responsible were not being punished as was indicated in the observation of the Committee of Experts. This was obvious from the fact that numerous trials initiated in 1994, 1993 and 1991 were still pending on this matter. The Government representative should have pointed out how many of those responsible for the exaction of forced labour had been taken to the courts. It was important that the legislation be enforced and that the Bills mentioned by the Committee of Experts be adopted. However, the most important factor was that the socio-economic problems leading to a situation of forced labour be removed by the Government.

The Government representative stated that he had listened attentively to the recommendations formulated by the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairpersons, declarations which had encouraged the Government to continue taking measures to combat forced labour. It was necessary to point out difficulties and a frank dialogue should be maintained between the social partners. The Government believed that the creation of the GERTRAF was the most productive way to combat forced labour within the context of a policy of human rights. Also, the speaker noted the comments of the Workers' members, and the information requested would be included in the Government's next report. It was important to emphasize that the number of enterprises inspected, mentioned in the Government's opening statement, were undertaken by the Special Mobile Inspection Service in its efforts to combat forced labour. The other labour inspection services also intervened in this area.

The Committee took note of the detailed explanations presented by the Government representative and the discussion which followed. The Committee also noted the information presented by the Committee of Experts which demonstrated that the Government was not indifferent to the gravity of the situation. The Committee noted the inspections made and considered that these inspections should be increased, continued, and intensified. The Committee expressed its disquiet that a large number of measures had yet to be adopted, specifically those which referred to the definition of slavery or forced or degrading labour, as well as the administrative sanctions envisioned, none of which had been applied. It hoped that information would shortly be provided on this question, in particular in respect of agricultural workers. The Committee expressed its concern over the slowness of proceedings to sanction cases of forced labour as well as the frequent evasion of responsibility by those who benefited from forced labour, which could constitute, in practice, a denial of justice. Finally, the Committee urged the Government to intensify its efforts to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention to eliminate definitively all forms of forced labour. The Committee hoped that in the near future the Government would be able to show substantial efforts toward realizing the full application of this fundamental Convention.

Pakistan (ratification: 1957). The Government representative of Pakistan indicated that her Government appreciated the valuable guidance and advice provided by this Committee for the promotion and protection of labour rights. She wished to highlight the following points in the context of the implementation of Convention No. 29. Over the past year enforcement of national laws on bonded and child labour had become more effective. The Child Labour Survey had been completed in Pakistan with the technical assistance provided by the ILO-IPEC Programme giving clear numbers of child workers and their areas of activity to allow for concerted and planned action for the elimination of child labour. The number of inspections under the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act 1992 and the Employment of Children Act 1991 had increased manifold. From January 1995 to January 1997, 35,000 inspections were conducted under the laws governing child labour. More than 9,000 inspections were held under the Employment of Children Act 1991. There were 6,183 prosecutions and 1,349 convictions. Under other child labour laws, 24,695 inspections were also carried out, resulting in 8,274 prosecutions and 3,556 convictions. Three hundred and forty-nine raids were conducted in Sindh and Punjab in the context of bonded labour. According to the figures provided by the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, an NGO, 1,000 bonded labourers were freed over the past year. Significant new developments had taken place demonstrating the Government's will to enforce the law and to deal with the issues of child and bonded labour. These included clear and unambiguous administrative instructions, and concrete programmes in the public and private sectors, with the involvement of all social partners. Steps were being taken to address areas of weakness such as inadequate funds for rehabilitation. Finally, there was growing public awareness and sensitivity to the importance of eradicating these problems.

The Government had ratified five of the seven ILO core Conventions. It had already expressed its intention to be actively involved in the work of the new Convention on the elimination of the most intolerable forms of child labour to be drafted next year. Needless to say, Pakistan was a developing country with myriad problems, some rooted in poverty and some in the socio-cultural milieu of society. In addition, it faced an extremely difficult economic situation due to multiple factors, including a crippling debt burden, the continued presence of 1.5 million Afghan refugees for more than a decade providing a large supply of workers, and a difficult geo-strategic situation. Thirty-six per cent of the population lived below the poverty line. Despite such deep-rooted impediments, efforts had been made to implement obligations voluntarily undertaken by ratifying ILO Conventions. The Government had always taken the comments of the Committee of Experts and of the Conference Committee very seriously. It wished to continue to cooperate with these two bodies; to note constructive criticism made by them; to provide, as far as possible, clarifications; to acknowledge deficiencies and use the comments of the Committees to improve the implementation of existing laws.

The speaker went on to explain that the Government of Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif was installed in February 1997. The new Government's commitment to the eradication of bonded labour was evident from the specific reference to it in the 1997 election manifesto of the Pakistan Muslim League, the party to which the Prime Minister of Pakistan belongs. This was also made clear by the Prime Minister to the Governing Body's Worker Vice-Chairman, during his recent visit to Pakistan. The Federal Government had set up an Advisory Committee on Child and Bonded Labour. The Committee included representatives of the Ministries of Labour, Foreign Affairs, Commerce and the private sector to follow up on action taken and provide advice on comprehensive action plans for the elimination of child and bonded labour in Pakistan.

In regard to the specific observation made by the Committee of Experts, it appeared to draw heavily on information provided in the Anti-Slavery International Report. This Report however dated back to 1995. Since then several positive developments had taken place. She wished to inform the Committee that the Government had been involved in a constructive dialogue with Anti-Slavery International in the context of the Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery. The Government had endeavoured to provide as much information as possible to it regarding the concerns it raised bilaterally as well as through the Working Group.

The Committee of Experts had referred to a figure of 20 million bonded labourers of whom 7 million were child labourers. These were totally unsubstantiated figures — a view shared by the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions. The issue of the magnitude of child and bonded labour in Pakistan arose some years back when an NGO with a specific agenda came up with the 20 million figure. Without confirming its authenticity, the figure was quoted by some highly respected international NGOs and unfortunately even the ILO. To assess the true extent of the problem of child labour the Government entered into an arrangement with the ILO under the IPEC Programme to carry out a survey of child labour in Pakistan. The results of the survey, which was conducted on a sound scientific and statistical basis, had been published. According to that survey, there were between 2.7 and 3.3 million economically active children in Pakistan. In addition, if the figure of 20 million persons in bondage in Pakistan were taken to be true, it meant that about 60 per cent of the 33.87 million workforce in Pakistan worked in bondage. This was totally impossible. Nevertheless, the speaker also referred to a list of 3,000 bonded labourers in the Sindh province that the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan (HRCP) claimed to have prepared. Such a list logically implied that the number of bonded labourers in Pakistan was not likely to be more than a few thousand. The HRCP was an independent NGO, and had been extremely forthright in pointing out and taking action against any deficiencies that it found in the promotion and protection of human rights in Pakistan. It was also very active in trying to identify and release bonded labourers. The HRCP may not have accounted for all bonded labourers in Sindh. It was also entirely possible that the practice might still be extant in some pockets of the Punjab province. But the figure could not be as high as 20 million. She agreed, however, that in the final analysis numbers were not important. This abhorrent practice could not and should not be tolerated, even if it affected only one individual. On the basis of information provided by the HRCP, raids had been conducted by the District Administration in Sindh in the past year. Representatives of the HRCP were accompanied by a senior official of the Ministry of Human Rights during these raids. About 1,000 bonded labourers were released over the period of the last year in Pakistan.

Anti-Slavery International had made a number of observations on the statutory instruments and machinery for the elimination of bonded labour. In this regard, she pointed out the following. In order to facilitate the enforcement of the Employment of Children Act 1991 and the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act 1992 by the provincial Governments, rules were formulated and notified in 1995 with the technical assistance provided by ILO-IPEC. The Government of North-West Frontier Province (NWFP) issued a notification dated 31 May 1995 empowering all District Magistrates under section 9 of the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act 1992, to ensure that the provisions of the Act were properly implemented, and issued another notification dated this month empowering, under section 16 of that Act, all Magistrates of the first instance to try offences under the 1992 Act. Magistrates had been similarly empowered by the Governments of Baluchistan and Punjab. The Sindh Government had also empowered all Additional District Magistrates (ADMS) to file cases related to bonded labour violations. Moreover, Vigilance Committees had been formed at the district level in the four provinces in accordance with the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act 1992. Some of these Committees were not very effective and might need to be reinforced, yet these did provide an institutional framework in all provinces for the monitoring and investigation of incidents of bonded labour. Efforts were being made to further strengthen the functioning of the Vigilance Committees under the supervision of the Home Departments of the Provinces. Also, a system of evaluation had been put in place with the performance of these Committees being frequently assessed in the interministerial and inter-provincial governments' meetings. The Government welcomed any assistance of the ILO for further improvement of the functioning of the Committees.

With regard to the rehabilitation of released bonded labourers, Rule 9 of the 1992 Act provided for the establishment of a fund to finance projects for the rehabilitation and especially the training of freed bonded labour. The Rule stated that the fund should consist of contributions made by the federal Government or the provincial Government. The Government intended to set aside a specific amount for this purpose. The present Government's commitment to the elimination of bonded labour was evident from the fact that on 21 May 1997 it had signed an agreement with the European Commission and the ILO to launch a programme to eliminate bonded child labour. The programme would cost US$2.2 million and was spread over two years. It would raise awareness on exploitative and hazardous child/bonded labour practices, increase the capacity of the government machinery, employers' and workers' organizations and NGOs to withdraw children from bondage and prevent children from entering into bondage. The programme targeted a small group of child/bonded labour and their families. The programme had a major focus on rehabilitation activities. It involved among other measures: the establishment of 18 Community Education and Action (CEA) centres throughout the country for rehabilitating children in specific economic sectors and occupations with a high incidence of child/bonded labour; withdrawing a selected number of them from this type of work; preventing younger siblings of the bonded labourers from entering bonded labour and providing them and their families with viable alternatives; strengthening of the capacity of the Pakistan Bait-ul-Mal (PBM) and the provincial/district PBM officers and the Bunyad Literacy Community Council, the Anti-Child Abuse Committee of the Pakistan Paediatric Association and the Pakistan Human Rights Commission to provide an integrated package of support services to ex-bonded labour through community action.

The Government of Pakistan was taking measures to raise the level of awareness about bonded labour. The Directorate of Workers' Education of the Ministry of Labour had published the Urdu version of the 1992 Act and the 1995 Rules for the information of the general public. The Ministry of Social Welfare had prepared a project which envisaged a four-year programme of awareness raising on child and bonded labour through the electronic media. The presence of an open and free press had contributed towards sensitizing the general public on laws relating to bonded and child labour. Various programmes initiated under the IPEC Programme had further contributed to awareness raising among the general public. The Government was also working on the initiation of an awareness programme in collaboration with AUSAID.

The reference in the Anti-Slavery International's Report to the petition before the Federal Sharia Court on the legality of sections 6 and 8 of the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act 1992 was correct. However, in 1988, the Supreme Court of Pakistan pronounced bonded labour as unconstitutional and thus in contravention of article 11 of the Constitution of Pakistan. The Supreme Court ruling ensured that the 1992 Act continued to be implemented.

Several concrete measures had been taken by the Government and the private sector over the past year aimed at the elimination of child labour. These included the following: the Sialkot Agreement was signed in February this year between the Sialkot Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the ILO and UNICEF with the objective of eliminating child labour from the soccer ball industry in Sialkot, Pakistan, over the following 18 months. The Agreement had set up a programme to assist manufacturers and assemblers of soccer balls in identifying and removing child labourers from the industry and providing them with educational and other opportunities. Moreover, a national-level NGO, the Child Care Foundation of Pakistan (CCF), had been set up to deal with child labour. The Board of Governors of the CCF included representatives of the Ministry of Labour, UNICEF and the HCRP. The Board of Governors had set up a subcommittee to prepare drafts for the establishment of a reliable and sustainable child labour monitoring system in Pakistan. The monitoring system was expected to be launched from August to September 1997. In addition, a number of initiatives had recently been taken by the private sector for international certification of their products. Rug-mark International, STEP, Care and Fair and Qualité France were actively working to set up monitoring-cum-certification systems and welfare projects for children in Pakistan. Rugmark Foundation and carpet exporters were about to sign an agreement to launch the system. Finally, the Pakistan Carpet Manufacturers' and Exporters' Association (PCMEA) had set up six schools in carpet weaving areas in and around Lahore where about 600 working children were being taught the basics of literacy. The members of PCMEA were also running ten dispensaries in areas where carpets were manufactured. The Sialkot Chamber had also set up a number of schools and dispensaries and vocational institutes for child workers in the soccer ball industry. These measures illustrated not only the commitment of the Government but also of the general public, trade unions, NGOs as well as the employers to combat and eliminate the phenomenon of child and child bonded labour in Pakistan.

Other initiatives of the Government for the elimination of child labour included the establishment of 27 rehabilitation centres by the Pakistan Bait-ul-Mal for the education and rehabilitation of working children. Moreover, Pakistan took a lead in the establishment of a time-frame for the elimination of child labour in South Asia. The Third SAARC Conference on Children in South Asia, held in Pakistan, adopted the year 2005 as the target date for the elimination of child labour in the region. Finally, the number of inspections had increased manifold as stated earlier. Training courses for inspectors had been organized to improve the methodology used and enhance their professional capacity in order to implement the law effectively.

On the question of restrictions on the termination of employment and the Committee of Experts' observation that the Government should take necessary steps to meet the requirements of Convention No. 29 on this count, she stated that the application of the Essential Services Act had further been narrowed. In 1995, there were nine establishments or categories of employment to which the Essential Services Act was applicable. This number had been reduced substantially. At present the Essential Services Act was applicable to six categories of establishment which were considered critical for the security of the country and the welfare of the community. These included employment with: (i) the generation, transmission, distribution and supply of electricity; (ii) specific oil and gas organizations whose number had been reduced from 17 to nine; (iii) the Pakistan Security Printing Corporation and Security Papers Ltd., Karachi; (iv) the Kahuta Research Laboratories; (v) the Civil Aviation Authority; and (vi) the Karachi Port Trust and Port Qasim Authority.

The Workers' members indicated that they would concentrate on Parts I and II of the Committee of Experts' observation. As concerned Part III — restrictions on termination of employment — they considered that the Committee's conclusions of last year should be reiterated. Even though the Government representative had said that there had been progress in this regard, it was clear from her comments that there were continuing restrictions on the termination of employment for some groups of workers. The Committee was asked to re-emphasize this point in its conclusions.

The Workers' members pointed out that the case had been before the Committee on numerous occasions and that each time the Committee had asked to see substantial progress. It was recognized that lack of legislation was not the problem here; it was the effective application of that law that was lacking. Bonded labour was prevalent in many sectors in Pakistan including brick manufacture, construction, sports goods manufacture and carpet weaving. It was prevalent despite the fact that the national Constitution forbade bonded labour and despite having been abolished under the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act. One of the ugliest manifestations of this practice was in agriculture which was still largely informal and unregulated. The landlords exercised considerable influence over income tax and other local officials. In other areas where parents were forced to provide labour services to landlords, their children were frequently trapped in debt bondage. Often the parents took a loan to meet urgent needs and then had to repay by working. In practice the debt did not decrease but instead climbed upwards. Thus every member of the family, including the child, had to contribute to the defraying of the accumulating debt. In some cases in agriculture, the tenant and his family were heavily guarded around the clock to stop escape and, in the most extreme cases, were kept in "private jails" and in iron fetters when working in the fields. Reports that women were subjected to sexual attacks were well documented.

Although the Government representative did not dispute that the problem existed, the Workers' members wondered what programmes had been undertaken by it to ensure that bonded labourers were aware that they were free from their debts. With regard to enforcement under the legislation, district magistrates had the power to ensure that the provisions of the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act were properly applied through inspection and monitoring. They were also empowered to establish Vigilance Committees. The rules relating to these Committees were specific and designated 18 categories of persons who could belong thereto. Only one place was allocated to an organization representing workers. The reality was that such Committees were heavily represented by those who held power in the community, including businessmen who themselves employed bonded labour.

The Workers' members wondered what changes had been introduced by the Government since last year when the Committee of Experts had called for greater progress in making these Committees more effective and representative of the community. Specifically, what had the Government done to improve the rate of detection and inspection; how many prosecutions had taken place; and what penalties had been imposed? It was noted that the conviction rate was low: what were the reasons for this? It was no use having a law if that law was not applied and enforced rigorously.

With regard to the release and rehabilitation of freed bonded labour, the Workers' members stated that the rules issued in 1995 under the legislation provided no guidance about release procedures. The Government representative had stated that her Government intended to allocate money to establish and support programmes designed to assist those workers freed from bondage. In practice it seemed that no resources had been identified to pay for rehabilitation. Moreover, the figures given by the Government representative on the number of those released were dismal in view of the great number of persons involved. Many of those released were forced to return to debt bondage because of the lack of assistance from the Government.

The Workers' members noted that the 1992 Act had been challenged in the Islamic court by a brick kiln owner. Although they had taken note of the Government representative's comments on this, the evidence suggested that employers were taking advantage of the legal uncertainty created by this case since a decision still had not been handed down. What had the Government done to clear up this legal confusion? It seemed that this case was a direct attempt to subvert the requirements of national legislation.

The Committee of Experts was of the view that no progress of any substance was being made on the violations of the Convention in practice, as reflected in its observations. Having said that, there was one example of progress and this was the Sialkot Agreement. While this affected only a very restricted export sector, the Workers' members welcomed this development and recognized that this was an example of unions, employers, Government, NGOs and voluntary organizations working together. The Workers' members were further pleased to note the initiative of 13 action programmes under IPEC in cooperation with the ILO. They urged the Government to continue this work with renewed vigour so that sustained and significant progress could be reported.

In conclusion, the Workers' members required the Government to commit itself to the detailed recommendations on the action that needed to be taken as set out in paragraphs 13 and 14 of the observation of the Committee of Experts. These recommendations were endorsed by the Experts in paragraph 15. Specifically they referred to a publicity campaign to tackle attitudes as well as to provide information on the law, the establishment of an integrated programme of legal and social action at national, provincial and district levels, so that pending cases could no longer be cited as an excuse to ignore the law, legal procedures to be strengthened and Vigilance Committees to be better resourced and empowered. There was also a call for practical help and assistance to be made available to those freed, an expansion in the resources directed towards education and the ending of harassment and repression of activists working to free bonded labour. It was noted that the Experts had made further recommendations in paragraph 16. The Workers' members asked the Government to give an unequivocal commitment today to implement these recommendations.

The Workers' members also referred to the fact that the Government had not replied to various points raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts, including the comments made by the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions.

The Employers' members pointed out that this case which had been discussed 11 times since 1981 was a regrettable one. While it appeared that the magnitude of the problem of bonded labour and bonded child labour might have been overstated, it was still a significant problem that could not be minimized, particularly in the brick kiln industry. The barrage of statistics and information that had been provided by the Government representative had to be analysed by the Committee of Experts. However, there had never been a lack of information from the Government. They could only express the firm hope that the Government was moving expeditiously to take concrete and comprehensive steps to eradicate bonded and child labour.

In 1992 the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act was enacted and it gave district magistrates the power to implement the law and authorized Vigilance Committees to support the district magistrates in their efforts to identify, free and rehabilitate bonded labourers. Unfortunately, for three years the law was not enforced at all. Since 1995 some steps had been taken by the central Government to delegate powers to the district magistrates, including instructions to set up Vigilance Committees. One of the main aspects of the 1995 Rules was the relatively weak Rules for rehabilitation of released bonded labourers. Specific and detailed information on the application in practice of the rehabilitation programmes should be given to the ILO. The Employers' members had confirmation on the number of labourers released but no accurate information on the success and failure of the rehabilitation programme. Local officials appeared not to be enforcing the law. Moreover, few Vigilance Committees had been established and they did not conform to the law when they were established. Finally, judges had not been given the necessary powers or jurisdiction.

The Employers' members indicated that these problems needed to be corrected. It appeared that the Government was working on the issue of child labour and bonded labour through Committees, surveys, and a commitment to providing primary education, all of which should be encouraged. The Government should clarify the circumstances under which a child had offered him or herself voluntarily. However, there were also indications that the Government was not effectively dealing with the challenges to the law. This merely encouraged debt bondage. At the same time there was evidence that activists working against bonded labour were victims of arrests and harassment. Clearly there needed to be full and effective implementation of the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act. This had to be reflected in the Committee's conclusions in the strongest possible terms.

Finally, there was a problem of federal employees under the Pakistan Essential Services Act terminating their employment without the consent of the employer, even if the employment contract provided otherwise. This was a kind of forced labour. The Government had indicated for a number of years that it would be amending the law which was enacted in 1952. Moreover, it stated year after year that the law only applied to certain essential services and categories of employees that were reviewed regularly and that the list was constantly reduced. None the less, this was a serious violation of the Convention that had to be remedied. As an urgent matter, this Act should be amended and brought into line with the Convention so as to eliminate restrictions to the freedom of workers to leave their employment.

The Workers' member of Pakistan pointed out that children were the future of the posterity of any nation and that if children were lost the nation was lost. In Pakistan the prevalence of the feudal system had not allowed economic and social conditions to develop. He stressed that in addition to the Vigilance Committees, there should be a commitment by the Government to allocate resources for social and educational purposes. In carrying out these measures, a national action programme was needed. Measures were needed to be taken against the underlying causes of poverty. In addition, economic incentives needed to be used for poor families to send their children to school. He acknowledged that a new Government had been installed and a commitment made but the actual implementation of this commitment had to take place. He would appreciate it if the Government had recourse to ILO technical assistance.

The labour movement in Pakistan had been putting pressure upon policy makers to allocate adequate resources for education and training for the children. By virtue of the poverty of the parents, the children should not be deprived of their basic right to full physical, mental and spiritual development due to their non-access to meaningful education facilities. He informed the Committee that some positive development had taken place with the cooperation of the ILO, including (i) the signing of an Agreement between the ILO, UNICEF and the Sialkot Chamber of Commerce and Industry (Punjab Province) for the rehabilitation of children engaged in the soccer ball industry; and (ii) the establishment of the "Rugmark Foundation" for the elimination of child labour in the carpet industry and for the provision of education and training and the rehabilitation of the children concerned. He indicated that the trade union movement had also contributed to creating awareness in society against the evil of child/bonded labour and to ensuring the success of these two projects, with their symbolic monetary support. The speaker urged the Government to repeal the Essential Services Act and to bring national labour legislation into conformity with the provisions of Conventions Nos. 29 and 87, and into consonance with the recommendations made by the ILO technical mission to Pakistan. He also called upon the Government to withdraw the recent amendment to the Banking (Special Courts) Ordinance 1996 which, in debarring a person not employed in the banking industry from standing for election as a trade union officer, runs counter to the principle of freedom of association.

The Workers' member of Turkey was of the view that the Government's report concerning the cases of bonded labour discovered by the authorities was not persuasive. A report by the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan in 1995 estimated the number of children working to be realistically in the region of 11-12 million. According to the same report, at least half of these children were under the age of ten. Their wages were, on the average, a third of the wages of adult workers; their entrance to the labour market had further depressed the wages of their parents. Thus child labour had not contributed to the solution of the problem of poverty of families but rather had exacerbated it. Moreover, the assertion that Pakistani children had traditionally worked with their families was not relevant now. Until the 1960s children seldom worked outside the family. The present system of bonded labour developed from the 1960s onwards, when the Government tried to expand the manufacturing base. This led to a large increase in the number of children employed as wage-earners.

The speaker wished to have information from the Government representative on the following points: the number of labour inspectors in Pakistan to inspect enterprises; the legislation concerning the rights of homeworkers; the size of the informal sector; whether members of the Bonded Labour Liberation Fund had been prosecuted or were free to engage in legal activities; whether the assassin of Iqbal Masih had been apprehended; what the school enrolment rate of children below the age of 15 was and whether there had been any improvement in this ratio since the promulgation of the 1992 Act; and whether sanctions had been applied to district magistrates who had not fulfilled their obligations under the 1992 Act.

The Workers' member of India, recalling that the Government had ratified the Convention in 1957, pointed out that the result of 40 years of implementation was not adequate at all. While he acknowledged that it was not easy to eliminate this problem, measures had to be taken gradually. For example, the presence of Vigilance Committees was not enough since someone had to supervise their work. Moreover, the problem of released bonded labourers had to be addressed since often, as in India, after six to eight months, released bonded labourers again became subjected to debt bondage. It was not true that the problem could be eliminated by 2005 as it had been referred to, since it had existed for centuries. Finally, IPEC only raised awareness of the problem. However, the mechanisms to eliminate bonded labour needed to be established at the domestic level.

The Workers' member of New Zealand asserted that the observation of the Committee of Experts revealed that very little, if anything, had changed since the previous year. It was clear from the observation that much bonded child labour arose from the parents' indebtedness and enslavement of the whole family. The conclusion was inescapable that as long as adult bonded labour persisted, so would child bonded labour. As far as adult bonded labourers were concerned, the observation of the Committee of Experts revealed that the Government had failed to systematically and thoroughly publicize the rights of bonded labourers; had failed to take all necessary steps to ensure the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act was fully implemented; had failed to provide adequately for the rehabilitation of released bonded labourers; and had failed to end the harassment of activists involved in identifying and freeing bonded labourers.

Much of the information contained in the observation was shocking, particularly on the following points: the failure to speedily resolve the legal challenges to the law by employers of bonded labourers, thus allowing all employers to claim that the law did not have to be implemented; the involvement of employers of bonded labour on some Vigilance Committees; and the fact that some 2,000 cases lodged by bonded labourers under the Act between March 1992 and early 1995 were turned down by the courts on the grounds that they did not have jurisdiction. In view of the above, the Government had to launch an extensive publicity campaign so that bonded labourers knew their rights and employers knew their responsibilities. Moreover, the Government had to adopt a comprehensive and integrated campaign of legal and social action. Finally, it had to put an end to the harassment of activists working to free bonded labourers.

The Workers' member of Italy emphasized that the documentation gathered by the Committee of Experts showed the breadth of this particularly shocking situation: laws existed but were not enforced except by certain local magistrates or thanks to the action of groups committed to freeing bonded workers. In light of the socio-economic realities in which bonded labour was entrenched, profound changes were required. The Government representative's statement appeared to be in the right direction. But the authorities must stop obstructing the work of NGOs such as the Bonded Labour Liberation Front. The representatives of this NGO were recently invited to testify in Italy: they had said that too often freed workers returned to bonded labour to escape destitution. The struggle against bonded labour must be the object of a vast and integrated programme based on the IPEC model.

The Workers' member of Greece pointed out that it was inaccurate to state that the situation was only known through information from NGOs: it was described at length throughout the 13 pages of the report of the Committee of Experts and it was too easy to claim that NGOs were over-stating the figures concerning this criminal phenomenon. To rely on colonialism as an argument to explain bonded labour was no justification. To put an end to this intolerable situation was also the responsibility of developed countries. Through the WTO, a mechanism indicating where products came from and where they were manufactured should be found and this would probably encourage consumers to reject these products. Since the intentions of the new Government were not yet known, excessive pressure should be put on the new Government. Nevertheless, this case had to be followed very closely to ensure that the Government was not only making statements of principle but had real desire to eliminate such exploitation.

The Government representative thanked all speakers and indicated that their comments would be transmitted to the Government. She assured the Committee that detailed responses in writing would be provided to the Committee of Experts. With regard to the allegation that little progress had been made in inspection, she pointed out that more than 35,000 inspections had taken place this year, as compared to 6,800 the previous year. While it may be true that the 1,000 bonded labourers released over the last year was not a high number, the figure of 20 million persons working as bonded labourers was unrealistic. She noted that there had been criticism of the Vigilance Committees as well as of the Rules issued in 1995 under the legislation on the release and rehabilitation of freed bonded labourers. However, these Rules had been drawn up with ILO technical assistance. Finally, with regard to the criticism that the Government had had since 1957 to implement the Convention and still had not done so, she pointed out that while it was true that the Convention was not fully implemented, it had only been five years since the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act had been enacted.

The Workers' members indicated that it was difficult to evaluate all the information given by the Government representative. However, they maintained that the conviction rate of those responsible for using bonded labour was relatively low and that no information had been given by the Government about the penalties imposed on those convicted. They insisted that it was a pressing, major and widespread problem. They regretted that they had not heard the Government representative commit to implementing the recommendations formulated by the Committee of Experts in paragraphs 13, 14, 15 and 16 of its report. They appealed to the Government to include, at district and local levels, in the machinery to implement the Bonded Labour (Abolition) Act, 1992, representatives of employers' and workers' organizations as well as non-governmental organizations devoted to the elimination of bonded labour.

The Workers' member of Pakistan insisted that this problem should be the primary concern of the Government. Moreover, he stressed that the number of persons working as bonded labourers quoted by Anti-Slavery International was not based on correct information. How, in a modern information age in a democratic country could two-thirds of the labour force be termed as "bonded labour"? However, such a scourge required to be eliminated at the earliest time. This needed great political will and the allocation of adequate economic and social resources. The punishment for this crime should be sufficient to serve as a real deterrent. He added that the Government should make available legal assistance to persons who were the victims of bonded labour since these people did not have the means to take legal action themselves.

The Committee took note of the detailed information provided by the Government representative and of the exhaustive discussion which had taken place. It also noted that the Government adopted a certain number of measures aimed at eliminating forced labour and that it had received technical assistance from the ILO and from IPEC, in particular, for the elimination of child labour. The Committee noted the Government's statement that estimates of the number of workers in bonded labour were exaggerated. The Committee noted with concern that an important number of questions were still pending concerning the practical impact of the measures taken until the present time to resolve this case which has been discussed already for a number of years. It hoped that the new Government would avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office to continue in its efforts to effectively abolish this unacceptable practice and that it would consider the possibility of inviting a direct contacts mission. The Committee urged the Government to provide in its next report full detailed replies on all the questions raised by the Committee of Experts with a view to being able to note concrete progress in the next year.

Sudan (ratification: 1957). A Government representative restated his Government's commitment to put an end to any practice of forced labour whenever it was established that such practices existed. The investigation committee, set up by the Ministry of Justice in 1995, had completed investigations in 249 cases of such alleged practices. Decree No. 2 of 5 March 1996 extended the mandate of the investigation committee, and Decree No. 3 of 21 May 1996 extended its composition by including non-governmental representatives. The measures undertaken by the committee consisted of sensitizing the citizens; informing non-governmental organizations and ensuring their involvement; informing the competent authorities of allegations of forced labour and slavery; summoning persons allegedly involved and investigating the allegations; conducting inspections; disseminating information by radio and local television about inspections being conducted in order to allow citizens to submit complaints or allegations; and arranging for meetings to inform personalities such as the Ambassador of the United States, the Special Rapporteur of the United Nations, the members of the African delegation of human rights and representatives of the State Department or of the Congress of the United States. This committee had conducted a first inspection in the areas of the Nuba mountains on 4 to 14 July 1996 after receipt of certain — rather vague — information from Christian Solidarity International and the African Commission on Human Rights concerning practices of the sale of slaves and the use of children as domestic servants in the service of officers of the armed forces or high officials. Following meetings with several high-ranking officials, including the main persons in charge of the police force — visits which were recorded on video film as well as in written form — the investigation committee concluded that it had not obtained any information concerning the slave trade in the areas in question; that no instances of rape or abduction had been established; that following inquiries on the question of child domestic servants it had been shown that all received wages and that there was no evidence that children were used as unpaid agricultural labourers.

A second visit took place in another region from 16 to 20 November 1996 to investigate allegations concerning the abduction and forced transfer of 27 school pupils in May 1996. On the basis of contacts established with the representatives of the armed forces, the internal security forces, the police and Sudanese Red Crescent Society, as well as calls through the press for any testimonies which could validate or invalidate these allegations, the investigation committee established that the pupils had left voluntarily, with the consent of their parents, in order to pursue their secondary education. All students had been found and were presently together with their next of kin. This incident was founded on a rumour broadcast over the radio by the opposition parties under the subterfuge that the date of the students' departure did not coincide with the beginning of the school year.

A third visit took place from 13 to 17 January 1997 in the area of Bahr El-Gazal. The investigation committee noted that no complaints had been lodged, that the allegations by the United Nations Special Rapporteur had not been proven, that children and adults moved freely by northbound trains in search of better living conditions, and in order to flee from the fighting, and that those responsible for the disappearances of children were the rebels who enlisted them to serve as porters.

The endeavours of the investigation committee rigorously to establish the facts bore witness to the Government's determination to put an end to any violation. The preliminary report of the investigation committee had been submitted to the United Nations Centre for Human Rights and demonstrated clearly that the Government fully respected its obligations by its systematic efforts to establish the existence of any cases of forced labour or of slavery. Several officials were responsible for collecting claims throughout the country and the work of the committee was continuing. He stressed that the issues discussed did not involve slavery but were the result of tribal conflicts which led to the taking of hostages. The Government was attempting to intervene in order to contain these conflicts and to arrive at the release of hostages and compensation. The war had added to the complexity of the situation as the rebels had engaged in the abduction of hundreds of children in territories where the Government exercised no control. It was to be hoped that the implementation of the peace agreement, signed in April 1997 with all but one of the rebel factions, which stipulated respect for all fundamental human rights, would bring about an end to this situation. These explanations demonstrated that the Government was pursuing the dialogue with the Committee of Experts and this Committee in order to establish the facts clearly and gain recognition for its commitment to taking all necessary measures to prohibit any violation of the Convention.

Another Government representative, the Minister of Manpower, stated that he had read with keen interest the Committee of Experts' observation on the situation of servitude and abduction of women and children, large-scale slave trafficking and that people came from abroad to buy and sell slaves in the Sudan. But he wanted to explain the situation in the Sudan which did not tally with that information. He pointed out that the war in the Sudan had gone through two phases: the first ended after 17 years during which a massive number of the southern Sudanese people had fled to neighbouring countries. Thus, the UNHCR had been obliged to repatriate some of these refugees. The situation was different during the second phase of war which started in 1983. The southerners this time fled en masse to northern Sudan. People from southern Sudan lived in extended families but during the war and these exoduses they became separated and dispersed and roamed in and about Khartoum in their thousands. In these circumstances, he wondered how there could be a market for a slave trade. He asserted that the reports referred to in the observation of the Committee of Experts were from outside sources and were politically motivated. He had been Chairman of the Human Rights Committee of the National Assembly in 1994 and 1995 and, in an effort to verify such reports, he had led a delegation to southern Sudan, only to discover that there were a lot of refugees returning from the north. While these refugees lacked food and clothing, they were not victims of bonded labour. The delegation did not see any case of forced labour anywhere. The areas where forced labour allegedly took place and which were mentioned by Christian Solidarity International in the observation of the Committee of Experts were in rebel-held territories and often were linked to tribal fighting during the dry season when water was scarce. The Government authorities could not go to these rebel-held areas because they would be killed. He therefore could not see how Government troops could resort to the use of forced labour in these areas as alleged by the above organization.

Referring to the recently signed agreements which provided that there would be a transitional period of four years, after which the southern Sudanese would decide whether to remain with the north or to become a separate State, he contended that the practice of forced labour would not stop completely unless there was peace in the country.

The Workers' members contended that this case involved trading in slaves and the imposition of slavery, servitude and forced labour on people from the black African Dinka, Shilluk and Nuer tribes, and the tribes of the Nuba mountains in southern Sudan. Evidence from eye witnesses and first-hand accounts testified to gross human rights abuses encouraged or directly inflicted by the Government and its security forces. The case was compounded by its pronounced racial aspect. The Committee of Experts had made comments on the application of this core Convention by the Sudan in 1989, 1990, 1992, 1993, 1994 and again this year. This case had come before the Committee in 1989 and in 1992 when the conclusions were placed in a special paragraph, as well as in 1993 when they were placed in a special paragraph for continued failure to implement the Convention. The Government had always denied the existence of forced labour. In 1993, it had stated that the problems were related to tribal conflicts. As the Committee of Experts had noted, this would not in any case exonerate the Government from its responsibility to ensure the right to life, security and freedom of its citizens. The 1994 observation was based on two visits to the Sudan by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan in 1993, who reported a great deal of consistency with respect to the circumstances of the abduction and sale of slaves. This year's observation was based on the most recent report of the Special Rapporteur (February 1996), which was corroborated by comments from the World Confederation of Labour and evidence collected by Human Rights Watch, Christian Solidarity International and the press. The Government had not replied to the WCL's comments. Referring to paragraph 22 of the Committee of Experts' observation, the Workers' members pointed out that the documentation highlighted inter alia that the number of chattel slaves held in northern Sudan was estimated to be in tens of thousands. Government-backed militia regularly raided black African-Sudanese communities for slaves and other forms of booty. The slaves, in most cases children and young women, were taken north where they were forced to provide domestic and agricultural labour and to provide sexual services against their will — for nothing other than a minimum amount of food for survival. Some boys were forced to attend military training camps where they were indoctrinated and trained to wage war against their own people. The raids undertaken by the Government-backed militia were accompanied by atrocities. Captives who were deemed unfit to serve as slaves were generally tortured and/or killed.

The Special Rapporteur had noted the lack of interest of the authorities in investigating the cases of forced labour brought to their attention, as well as an alarming increase in reports of slavery, servitude, the slave trade and forced labour in the Sudan. The Workers' members therefore requested the Government to take immediate and effective measures to secure the observance of the provisions of the Convention and to report on concrete action taken, including information on cases brought to justice, the number of convictions and penalties imposed on the offenders. They had taken note of the information supplied by the Government representative regarding the report of the investigation committee and awaited its evaluation by the Committee of Experts. Because of the gravity of this case, its long history and the overwhelming evidence pointing to the direct involvement of the Government in the violations, the Workers' members urged that the Committee place this case in a special paragraph of its report for continued failure to implement the Convention.

The Employers' members pointed out that this was a very serious case which had been discussed on numerous occasions. Information from various sources which had carried out investigations on the spot — such as the Special Rapporteur of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and non-governmental organizations — demonstrated that for several years, different types of forced labour existed on a wide scale. The "cleansing" campaign carried out in Khartoum consisted of the abduction of homeless children who could be bought back by their families, as a way of earning money for the poorly paid soldiers. It appeared that this practice was systematic and tolerated by the Government. The arguments put up in defence by the Government had evolved over the years. It started by denying the allegations. Then it stated that forced labour was an offence under the Penal Code, and that the absence of convictions showed that the problem did not exist. Finally, it stated that the problem was the result of tribal conflicts rather than the abduction of slaves. While one Government representative here seemed to admit that a problem of forced labour existed, the other Government representative stated that measures would be adopted only if such cases were brought to light. It thus appeared that the Government kept on denying the existence of slavery and forced labour. Despite the good relations that it seemed to have with the United Nations Special Rapporteur, the Government had apparently not found any proof which enabled it to conclude that such practices existed, except to attribute them to the action of the rebels or to tribal conflicts which were presented as an exhibition of folklore, while it was in fact a deadly civil war. This position was unacceptable. For years the Government had been lying and had taken none of the necessary measures. Therefore, this Committee had to accept with great mistrust the statements of the Government representatives. This case became more and more disturbing as time went by. The peace agreement was a tiny element of hope but it had not led to any results so far. The Employers' members thus subscribed fully to the position of the Workers' members, and considered that the extremely disturbing nature of this case had to appear in the conclusions of this Committee.

The Workers' member of Turkey stated that all reliable and credible testimonies concerning the Sudan gave numerous examples of the most severe cases of slavery, servitude, slave trade and forced labour. Moreover, what was even worse, the armed forces, popular defence forces and the mujahidin of the Government were directly involved in these horrible acts against humanity. The slaves were forced to work, raped, beaten and starved. It had been reported that some masters severed their slaves' Achilles tendons to keep them from running away. The Government's claim that there were tribal conflicts in which both sides took hostages was completely out of the question. There was outright slavery, the price of slaves vacillating according to supply. According to reliable sources, a woman or child could be bought in 1989 for US$90. Due to oversupply, the price fell to US$15 in 1990. In December 1996, 58 slaves were redeemed, the price being three cows per slave. Slavery in the Sudan was much worse than apartheid had been in South Africa. He therefore supported the proposal to mention this case in a special paragraph of the Committee's report.

The Workers' member of Italy expressed his horror and helplessness faced with which seemed to be a synthesis of the worst scourges of humanity: ethnical and religious conflict, children forced into slavery and the denial of the right to life and human dignity. Although these deplorable practices of slavery and forced labour had to be placed in the context of the war, the Government was none the less implicated. The international community should increasingly pressure the Government to take concrete measures so as to end these extreme violations of the Convention. The opening up of a dialogue with the United Nations was an interesting factor which should be complemented with dialogue at the national level.

The Workers' member of the Sudan stressed that these problems did not only concern the Government, but rather the whole Sudanese society. If the practices described by the United Nations Special Rapporteur really did occur, this would imply a regression to times of slavery and servitude. The situation therefore had to be thoroughly examined. The Workers' Trade Union Federation of Sudan had invited the World Confederation of Labour to make in situ inspections so as to enable it to base its judgement on a more solid foundation than merely newspaper articles. The case should be considered by requesting more detailed information in order to be able to make a more balanced evaluation of the case.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom stated that the details of this case were truly chilling and horrifying. The Government representative had again repeated that the problem was not one of slavery but of tribal conflicts in which hostages had been taken. The Committee of Experts, however, pointed out that reports and eye witness accounts revealed a great deal of consistency with regard to the circumstances and locations of abduction, the names of locations where children and women were said to be kept in special camps, and where people from northern Sudan or from other countries, reportedly came to buy these people. The sale or traffic of children seemed to be an organized and politically motivated activity on a massive scale. The Committee of Experts noted that the Government had not replied to the comments of the World Confederation of Labour which had stressed that the officers and soldiers responsible for the raids in which these people were taken were able to pursue their actions with impunity. In spite of all this detailed evidence, the Government representatives had stated that the accusations were rather vague. She drew the Committee's attention to paragraph 23 of the Committee of Experts' observation which described in the greatest detail, with names, places and dates, one particular allegation involving a father trying to buy back his daughter in April 1996 who had been abducted by troops of the Government of Sudan. What more did the Government want in the way of specific details? The Government could not abrogate responsibility for this atrocious situation which was a gross violation of its obligations under the Convention.

The Government member of the United Kingdom, speaking also on behalf of the Governments of Canada, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Iceland, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States, indicated that she was gravely concerned by the reports, over several years and from many sources, of the persistence of slavery and related practices in the Sudan. She was especially dismayed by the findings of the 1996 report of the Special Rapporteur of the Commission on Human Rights on the human rights situation in the Sudan as well as by the 1996 comments made by the World Confederation of Labour. The Government's responses to these reports were not credible. She echoed the deep concern expressed by the Committee of Experts over the continuing failure of the Government to fulfil past undertakings to suppress these practices. She therefore fully endorsed the Committee of Experts' call for the Government to take immediate and effective action to implement its obligations under the Convention.

The Government member of Morocco noted that he had listened attentively to the statements by the Government representatives outlining the efforts undertaken by the Government to ensure the practical application of the Convention. This Committee should call for dialogue and cooperation in order to obtain concrete results and to help member States to resolve their problems. In this regard, the Committee should purposefully use the various means at its disposal. If, however, it sometimes had to resort to less pleasant measures, care should be takn not to do so only against certain countries. Although technical cooperation was the most appropriate means to help member States ensure the application of Conventions, it was time to consider which concrete results could be obtained by traditional means such as technical assistance, special paragraphs or direct contacts missions. Such an evaluation should permit a re-examination of the methods of work of the Committee to ensure greater efficacy in its work.

The Workers' member of Pakistan asserted that all persons had the right to live in dignity. He considered that the peace process through political dialogue, which had been mentioned by the Government representative, should be accelerated because the transitional period of four years before the referendum was far too long. The abduction of women and children and their exploitation, apart from being serious violations of the Convention, were heinous crimes and it was up to the Government to protect its citizens. These unjust and inhuman practices should be brought to an end in the shortest possible time. In view of the extreme seriousness of this case, he appealed to the Government to demonstrate its political will and mobilize all its resources to end forced labour and discrimination. The Government should avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office or alternatively a direct contacts mission in order to remedy the situation.

The Government representative, the Minister of Manpower, stated that he was not at all surprised that the speakers had reacted in the way they had, since they were relying on the observation of the Committee of Experts as their only source of information and the situation, according to that observation, was really bad. He admitted that it was regrettable that his Government had not responded to the WCL's comments, but pointed out that, at the end of the observation, it had been asked to report in detail in 1997, which he assured this Committee it would do. He stressed that, in view of the large size of the country and its poor infrastructure, it was not easy for the Government to collect information. But, as shown by the responses of the authorities during the various visits by the United Nations Special Rapporteur to the country, there were answers that could be supplied. He wished to put on record his opinion that a forum such as this Committee could be misled through reports that had emanated from prestigious bodies but which were politically motivated. He reiterated that a lot of southern Sudanese had been displaced and dispersed throughout northern Sudan, especially children who could be seen on the streets, and therefore there was no market for the slave trade. He appealed to the international community to help his country react to the massive population transfers. He took seriously the concerns expressed in this Committee but questioned the information given — such as that regarding the price of slaves — since those reports came from rebel-held areas where Government authorities or traders could be killed.

The Employer and Workers' members considered that this prolonged debate did not raise any new considerations that would justify a change in their initial position on this case.

The other Government representative stated that the information provided by his Government had shown its willingness to engage in a dialogue and to clarify the situation. The Government-appointed investigation committee would pursue its work and the Committee of Experts and this committee would be kept informed of its results. He noted that some speakers showed a tendency not to share this wish for dialogue which was serious for the future work of this Committee. The Committee should put a stop to this worrying trend. He hoped that it would take account of his Government's efforts to encourage dialogue.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representatives and of the discussion which ensued. For many years the Committee of Experts had been making references to the accusations that forced labour was being frequently imposed with the complicity or indifference of the Government. The same allegations had been made in the various reports of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan and in the comments made by the World Confederation of Labour. The Committee took note of the detailed information supplied by the Government representatives on the different questions raised, regretted that they had not been submitted earlier and considered that this information, especially that relating to the activities of the committee created by the Government, should be examined by the Committee of Experts. It also took note of the historical background and of the situation of armed conflict prevailing in the Sudan, to which one of the Government representatives made reference, as well as his opinion that the allegations were politically motivated. The Committee observed that the Government could not prove the commitment which it declared it had to spare no efforts so as to bring forced labour to an end. In view of the contradictory information received and the continuing denunciations concerning violations of the Convention, the Committee urged the Government to increase its efforts to give full application to this Convention and request the technical assistance of the Office. Given the seriousness of the allegations and the time which had elapsed without any tangible progress being made, the Committee decided to include this case in a special paragraph of its report and to mention it as a case of continued failure to implement.

Convention No. 81: Labour Inspection, 1947

Sri Lanka (ratification: 1956). A Government representative indicated that, regarding the comments of the Jathika Kevaka Sangamaya on working conditions and special risks and hazards faced by workers in export processing zones (EPZs), all labour laws applied to all industrial concerns in these zones. The officers in the Factories Division of the Department of Labour carried out inspections on a regular basis and on the basis of complaints. Moreover, the Department's Safety and Health Division conducted regular inspections regarding matters on occupational health in the EPZs. Some inspections revealed that certain employers had not provided safety equipment to workers, while in other industries the workers had not used the safety equipment provided at the factory. Legal action had been initiated under the provisions of the Factories' Ordinance No. 45 of 1942 against those employers who had not adequately provided for safety measures. Awareness programmes on safety measures and occupational health were being carried out by the Department of Labour for factory managers and worker representatives. The Committee of Experts had requested the Government to provide information on the supervision of the application of the legal provisions to protect children and young persons in terms of the Employment of Young Persons, Women and Children Act, No. 47 of 1956. He stressed that no child labour existed in the organized sector in his country. If at all, child labour could be seen in the unorganized sector, particularly in domestic service. The Women and Children's Affairs Division of the Department of Labour also carried out inspections under this Act. Currently, the Labour Inspectorate comprised 300 labour offices, 57 Assistant Commissioners and 12 Deputy Commissioners, a number that was inadequate to cover all the workplaces regularly. In 1996, the Government had authorized 125 officers previously on probation to carry out inspections in relation to child labour. In 1996 and 1997, 21 cases had been filed against the employment of children in the domestic sector. Regarding the comments made by the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union calling for a national programme to be drawn up on a tripartite basis to give effect to the Convention, he stated that awareness programmes, tripartite seminars and workshops on industrial relations, women's and children's affairs, and safety and health had been held. The Government hoped to accelerate the pace of the training programmes for the labour inspectorate, starting in 1997. Referring to Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention, the details on labour inspections were given in the Annual Administrative Report of the Labour Commissioner. Copies had been sent to the ILO on previous occasions. The 1996 report was being finalized. As for the comments made by the Jathika Kevaka Sangamaya concerning working conditions in government factories employing women, he pointed out that working conditions, including hours of work, were determined by the Wages Boards Ordinance, No. 27 of 1941. The Wage Board on Government Trade had decided the working hours and amount that should be paid as overtime exceeding normal working hours. Any employer contravening these provisions was liable for prosecution under the Ordinance. He listed the number of labour inspections carried out in EPZs and factories, as well as the inspections carried out relating to women and children, in 1995 and 1996, concluding that, since the new Government came to power in August 1994, several steps had been taken to strengthen labour inspection and to give effect to the Convention.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information which he had provided. The Committee of Experts had made comments on the application of the Convention in Sri Lanka in 1992, 1993 and 1995. This year, on the basis of the Government's reply to a trade union organization, its comments covered four points: first, on Article 3, paragraph 1(a), of the Convention which stipulated that the labour inspection system should be responsible inter alia for ensuring the application of the legislation relating to the employment of children and young people, the problem concerned its application in small independent industries, particularly those situated in export processing zones. The Government had indicated that protective provisions existed but, as the Committee of Experts requested, it should specify how their application in these industries and zones was supervised. Secondly, as regards measures to ensure tripartite cooperation in accordance with Article 5 (b) of the Convention, the Government representative had stated that initiatives were being taken in this regard. Thirdly, regarding the measures taken to strengthen the labour inspection system in accordance with Articles 10 and 16 of the Convention, the promise to create 50 new labour inspector posts was insufficient given the expansion in the industrial sector and the number of visits necessary in certain sectors like textiles. The Government representative had described the difficulties facing his Government in this regard, but had indicated that measures would be taken to increase the number and frequency of inspections. That would constitute real progress and the Committee of Experts would have to re-examine the situation. As for the application of Articles 20 and 21, it was hoped that the Government would supply information showing progress in the real protection of workers by efficient inspections. Labour inspection could appear to be a relatively technical subject. If the Workers' members were highlighting it so that this Committee would take an active interest, it was because, while apparently of a technical nature, it was a question that went to the very heart of the standard-setting system. The Committee of Experts had stressed the need for measures to be taken to strengthen labour inspection in order to overcome exploitation in work and more particularly the exploitation of children. These measures were therefore not only necessary; they would have to be taken urgently.

The Employers' members recalled that the report of the Committee of Experts on this case raised four questions relating to the application of the Convention by Sri Lanka. The first of these concerned the comments of the Jathika Kevaka Sangamaya concerning the many risks and hazards faced by workers in various industries and export processing zones (EPZs). The background to these problems was the development of complex modern machinery and the use of hazardous chemicals. The problems also related to long working hours and night work. Although the Employers' members welcomed the news of the economic development in the country and in the jobs created, they acknowledged the emergence of new risks. The Government representative had referred to laws which protected the employment of young persons and women. However, it was the responsibility of the inspection services to ensure that the labour legislation was enforced. In certain cases, workers did not take safety regulations into account. Inspection needed to be concentrated on the implementation of the laws to protect young persons. The Committee of Experts had requested full information on the laws that were in force and the inspections that were carried out. Although the Government representative had provided this type of information verbally to the Committee, it would also need to be provided in greater detail in the next Government report to the Committee of Experts.

The second issue raised by the Committee of Experts concerned the role played by tripartite negotiation in improving compliance with the Convention. In response to the request for information by the Committee of Experts, the Government should supply a detailed report. The Employers' members noted that the Government had ratified the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) in 1984 and it was therefore to be hoped that consultative procedures would be extended to cover all the areas concerned.

With regard to the number of staff employed by the labour inspection services, the report of the Committee of Experts noted that measures had been taken to reinforce the labour inspectorate through the creation of 50 new posts. However, the trade unions in the country did not consider the action taken to be sufficient and the Government representative had said that the situation would be re-examined. Although no specific figures were laid down, the Convention called for the staff of inspection services to be adequate for the discharge of their duties. The application of this general provision would evidently depend on many practical issues. Detailed information on the situation should be provided to the Committee of Experts.

Turning to the question of inspection reports, the Employers' members noted that the Convention contained provisions on their content and form. Such reports were important because they provided an insight into the real situation in the world of work in the country concerned. In reply to the shortcomings noted by the Committee of Experts, the Government representative had provided some information on future policy in this respect. The Employers' members emphasized that the obligations set out in the Convention needed to be complied with at all times in order to give effect to this very important Convention, which had been ratified by a remarkably high number of countries. Indeed, there was even a possibility of increasing the number of ratifications. In conclusion, the Employers' members noted that the Government appeared to be making some effort in the right direction and should continue to do so. In its reports to the Office, it should ensure that all the information required under the Convention was provided so that the Committee of Experts could examine the case again.

The Workers' member of Pakistan expressed concern at the special risks and hazards faced by workers, which had been referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts. The issues at stake were serious matters that concerned human life and health and safety. The trade unions in the country had launched action against these very unsafe working conditions and it was now important to take all possible measures to create awareness, especially among workers' organizations, of the new hazards that were arising, particularly in EPZs, where the use of new chemicals and very sophisticated techniques was giving rise to unsafe working conditions. The transport of such chemicals and the introduction of new technology made it necessary to provide education and training in order to prevent accidents. However, this need was sometimes ignored by multinational enterprises, national employers and governments. Labour inspectors therefore had an important role to play in increasing awareness of the protective measures that were needed, especially for women and young persons. Although the Government representative had expressed the intention of broadening the responsibility of the labour inspection services, the recruitment of a mere 50 additional inspectors would not be sufficient to ensure the enforcement of existing labour legislation. In this respect, he noted with concern a slight decrease in the number of inspections carried out in 1995 and 1996, which illustrated that there was broad room for improvement. The Government should therefore show greater political will to improve the quality of life in EPZs and particularly for women and young persons.

The Workers' member of Greece thanked the Government representative for the information which had been provided and which had revealed a certain amount of progress. None the less, he insisted on the importance of quantifying the real progress precisely. He noted that the Government representative had confirmed that industries situated in export processing zones were covered by the labour inspection system. He asked the Government to indicate whether small industries were also covered and the number of workers which were concerned. In addition, he asked the Government to specify the sanctions that had been taken against employers who had been found guilty. With regard to the protection of young people he asked what measures had been taken to supervise the application of the legal provisions to protect children and young people against exploitation through work. In addition, he observed that several trade union organizations had made observations and wondered whether this might be an indication of a lack of cooperation between labour inspectors, on the one hand, and workers and employers and their organizations on the other. Finally, he insisted labour inspection could only be efficient if the necessary means were made available. All the various levels of government in Sri Lanka should allot the necessary funds for labour inspectors by giving their needs high priority in the allocation of budgets and providing them with sufficient numbers of qualified personnel.

The Workers' member of France emphasized the importance of this Convention in protecting the fundamental rights of workers including the right to life, health and humane working conditions. As stressed by the Workers' and Employers' members, the development of a large number of small industries under subcontract, by arrangements which were often located in export processing zones and in sectors where risks related to products and equipment were high, required the authorities to increase the number of inspections. In this regard, he supported the emphasis placed by previous speakers on the importance of governments taking the necessary steps to train qualified personnel so that they could carry out efficient inspections. Without efficient inspection, it was impossible to obtain a meaningful evaluation of working conditions, the risks to which the workers were subjected and the degree of exploitation of young people. The risks were even more poorly evaluated in the informal sector, where the abuses were generally more common. He insisted on the importance of the Government reinforcing its efforts in this respect. Moreover, the workers and their organizations needed to be closely associated in the elaboration and implementation of labour inspection and safety and health policies in all enterprises without distinction. In this regard he noted that the Government seemed not to have fulfilled its responsibilities. He added that it was essential to recruit and train qualified inspectors in sufficient numbers. In this way, workers' representatives would be in a position to contribute to an efficient labour administration. With regard to the allegations of the Government representative, who had placed a certain responsibility on the workers for not respecting safety regulations, he observed that this only served to highlight administrative deficiencies, which should be a warning to the workers. Moreover, employers needed to be associated with this exercise and measures needed to be taken to encourage employers to ensure that safety regulations were respected in their enterprise. He therefore urged the Government to provide detailed information in the very near future so that an evaluation could be made of the real situation, particularly as regards the number of enterprises covered, annual inspections carried out, and the number of infractions and sanctions imposed, as well as the level of participation of the workers. He hoped that the Government would rapidly take measures adapted to the magnitude of the problem and would take the appropriate decisions to ensure compliance with the provisions of the Convention and the implementation of the recommendations made by the Committee of Experts.

The Government representative thanked all those who had participated in the debate and who had made valuable suggestions. He assured the Workers' members that his Government accepted that the labour inspectorate was not currently adequately staffed. Indeed, the Minister of Labour had recently called for the employment of more professionals in the labour inspectorate. This objective would be fulfilled in stages in accordance with budgetary constraints. Although there was no child labour in the country's three EPZs, he recognized that children worked in the unorganized sector. Following a number of inspections, legal proceedings had been commenced in some cases. The Government had taken the decision to eliminate child labour and a committee had been set up by the President for this purpose. Legislation had been drafted and would soon be submitted to Parliament to make schooling compulsory up to the age of 15. It was hoped that child labour would be arrested by this measure. He noted in this connection that education was provided free in his country for all children from kindergarten up to school-leaving age. Among the measures taken to improve safety at work in a context of the introduction of increasingly sophisticated equipment and hazardous chemicals, he referred to the inspections that had been carried out, the instructions provided to the persons concerned, the introduction of safety awards and, for the first time this year, the organization of an annual safety and health week. In response to the comments made by a number of Workers' members, he indicated that a detailed report would soon be sent to the Office containing data on the number of inspection visits and the other measures taken by the Government on the issues raised by the Committee of Experts. Finally, he reaffirmed the dedication of his Government to giving effect to this Convention.

The Committee noted the detailed information submitted orally by the Government representative. The Committee stated that a certain number of discrepancies existed between the national practice and the provisions of the Convention regarding the number of labour inspectors, the frequency of inspections, and the submission of annual inspection reports. The Committee emphasized the need to verify by inspection that the provisions for protecting children and young persons from labour exploitation were respected, including in export processing zones. The Committee equally stressed the importance of the adoption by the competent authorities of adequate measures to promote collaboration between inspectors on the one hand and workers and employers, or their organizations, on the other. The Committee recalled the essential importance of the Convention and stated that the existence of an effective inspectorate constituted the best guarantee of respect in practice for labour standards. The Committee called on the Government to provide details in its next report on the measures taken or envisaged for the application of the Convention and suggested possible technical assistance from the Office.

Convention No. 87: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948

Bangladesh (ratification: 1972). A Government representative, referring to the observations made by the Committee of Experts, noted that freedom of association in Bangladesh was covered by the Constitution and trade union legislation, the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO), 1969. The trade union law covered only the organized sector, where between five and six million workers were employed. Other economic sectors were covered by the Constitutional provisions relating to freedom of association. Violations of this right could be submitted to the Supreme Court of Bangladesh, which was the highest judicial body in the country.

With reference to the right of association of persons carrying out managerial and administrative functions, he noted that the IRO allowed workers and employers to form trade unions without requesting prior authorization. Union membership was open to persons in factories, business, industries, shops and public sector corporations. Public servants in the Department of Telephone and Telegram and in the Department of Railways were also covered by the law. However, public servants in other government offices were not covered by the IRO. Moreover, persons in industrial and commercial establishments performing managerial and administrative functions could not join workers' trade unions. Such persons — who comprised approximately two per cent of the workforce — could form associations for the advancement of their rights and interests in accordance with Article 38 of the Constitution of Bangladesh, which gave every citizen the right to form an association or union subject to reasonable restrictions imposed by law in the interests of morality or public order. Persons carrying out managerial and administrative functions in the private sector therefore enjoyed the right of association.

On the question of the right of association of public servants, the speaker reiterated the view that the legislation of Bangladesh was in conformity with the requirements of the Convention. As stated in the Conference Committee in 1995, even though public servants were not covered by the IRO, they did have the right to form associations in order to advance their interests. Such associations held meetings, discussed the problems faced by their members and formulated demands for submission to the Government for negotiation. With regard to the exclusion of workers at the Security Printing Press and of public servants from the right to form trade unions, he maintained that the Constitution guaranteed their right to form associations to advance their causes.

The speaker noted that the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning restrictions on the range of persons who could hold office in trade unions had been answered by his Government in the Conference Committee in 1995. He reiterated that, except for workers dismissed for misconduct or convicted of the embezzlement of union funds, moral turpitude or unfair labour practice, every worker had the right to enjoy trade unions of their choice and to hold elected trade union office regardless of their age, sex or creed. Moreover, a worker dismissed for misconduct could seek redress against the management in a court of law. The admission of dismissed workers as either members or officers of trade unions might hinder normal trade union activities, as well as industrial peace and productivity, which might in turn frustrate the underlying purpose of trade unions and collective bargaining. In Bangladesh, dismissed workers were not elected to trade union office. However, section 7-A(1)(b) of the IRO promoted rather than restricted their right to choose their representatives.

In response to the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning external supervision, he stated that the IRO conferred certain quasi-judicial functions on the Registrar of Trade Unions. However, any act of the Registrar could be challenged in a court of law and the Registrar was not permitted by law to revoke the registration of a union without prior permission from the labour court. He did not agree with the observation made by the Committee of Experts that the procedure of supervision by the Registrar of trade union financial affairs should be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording guarantees of impartiality and objectivity, since any act of the Registrar could already be challenged in a court of law. Moreover, the constitution of a union at the time of its union's registration was always respected.

The Government representative added that the requirement that the membership of a trade union should consist of 30 per cent of the total number of workers concerned before it could be registered was necessary in view of the country's level of social, economic and political development. This measure helped to check the multiplicity of trade unions, which would affect adversely the interests of the workers. Under the existing provisions, up to three unions could be registered for each establishment. Moreover, the IRO included provisions governing the determination of collective bargaining agents. He did not consider that the 30 per cent requirement restricted the right of workers to organize. However, measures adapted to the situation might be taken in the near future. In this connection, he pointed out that Convention No. 87 did not address specifically the danger of a multiplicity of trade unions, but was concerned that workers should be free to establish organizations of their own choosing. If they formed too many organizations, they would weaken their position.

On the question of the right to organize of workers in export processing zones (EPZs), he stated that these workers were not deprived of their fundamental right of freedom of association as guaranteed under Article 38 of the Constitution. In the same way as other developing and less developing countries which were establishing EPZs for the purposes of economic development, Bangladesh had suspended the right to form trade unions in EPZs as a purely temporary measure under the Industrial Relations Ordinance 1969. Indeed, workers in EPZs enjoyed better employment and working conditions, higher wages and very congenial labour management relations. The fact that no complaint had yet been received by the Government from any workers' association alleging that workers in EPZs had been deprived of their rights meant that they had accepted the reality of the situation. Any Convention was ratified with some flexibility to suit national conditions and EPZs were being developed in many other Asian countries. Economic development required the establishment of EPZs, but not at the cost of the social and economic welfare of workers. The Government was very much aware of its responsibility towards its citizens.

He added that the Government of Bangladesh had noted the observations of the Committee of Experts concerning restrictions on the right to strike. Although appreciating the observation of the Committee that it was mindful of the difficulties which might arise during an acute national crisis, he recalled that sections 28, 32(2), 32(4), 33(1), 57, 58 and 59 of the IRO had been examined by the National Labour Law Commission (NLLC), whose report was still under study by the Government. He added that the Government of Bangladesh would welcome the technical assistance of the ILO in any field related to the implementation of Convention No. 87.

The Workers' members deplored the fact that, despite the Government's statement in 1995, at the conclusion of which it had undertaken to provide the Committee of Experts with detailed information, little seemed to have been achieved on this subject. The seven questions raised by the Committee of Experts were not new and required the adoption of urgent measures by the Government to bring the situation into greater conformity with the principles of freedom of association. These matters had already been the subject of exhaustive discussion in 1995, in the same way that related problems concerning the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), had been addressed in 1994. In general, the Workers' members regretted that for many years the Committee of Experts had needed to make observations on important matters related to the fundamental principles of freedom of association. In 1994 and 1995, the Government of Bangladesh had referred to the discussions held in its tripartite national commission. It appeared that this body had submitted recommendations on several points, a number of which were contained in a Bill to amend the legislation, which had not yet been adopted. Most of the criticisms of the Committee of Experts in the case of Bangladesh concerned matters that needed to be respected by every country, irrespective of its level of social and economic development. These matters were also related to the campaign of the Director-General to promote the ratification and application of fundamental Conventions. The Workers' members were aware of the economic and social difficulties confronting Bangladesh.

Better collaboration between the public authorities and civil society, including the organizations of workers and employers, would contribute to combating poverty and social exclusion and could promote social justice and peace. Indeed, many of the problems relating to the application of the Convention had their roots in the tension between the public authorities and civil society in Bangladesh. With regard to the specific comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Workers' members regretted that the Government's report contained little relevant information on the right to organize of persons carrying out managerial or administrative functions, or of public servants. The Government referred laconically to the existence of two associations for public servants in the public sector and referred to other associations without mentioning them by name. Furthermore, the report did not contain information on the provisions guaranteeing the right to organize of managerial staff in the private sector. The Workers' members emphasized that this category of worker should be guaranteed the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, including the trade unions that covered other categories of workers. The concept of managerial functions needed to be defined precisely so as not to weaken the trade unions of other workers.

With regard to interference by the public authorities in the establishment and functioning of trade unions, they noted that the problems raised were of a serious nature and related to restrictions on the categories of persons who could hold trade union office, interference by the public authorities in the internal affairs of trade unions and excessive limitations on the establishment and operation of trade unions at the enterprise level.

With regard to external control, they regretted that the information provided to the Committee of Experts was insufficient to establish whether such control was limited to supervising the rules of trade unions and the application of the law, or whether such matters were subject to really impartial judicial control.

On the subject of the requirement for the membership of a trade union to include 30 per cent of the workers in an enterprise before it could be registered, they warned that this threshold raised serious problems in systems for the recognition of trade union organizations which were based in part or in whole on enterprise unions, with the risk that workers in small- and medium-sized enterprises would be excluded. They therefore emphasized the need to establish without delay procedures and provisions which promoted freedom of association, as set out in the Preamble to the ILO Constitution and in the Convention.

On the question of EPZs, they noted that the Government referred to the recommendations of the National Labour Law Commission (NLLC) and to a Bill and the fact that, anticipating certain amendments to the legislation, some workers appeared to be authorized to establish trade unions. Workers in EPZs and their organizations needed guarantees set out in specific legal provisions for the effective exercise of freedom of association. The protection of the rights of these workers was a major concern of national and international trade union movements and of the ILO, which had established a specific programme on this subject.

Furthermore, with regard to the right to strike, the procedures and provisions governing the exercise of the right to strike were such that, in practice, the very principle of the right to strike was jeopardized. They recalled the conclusions of the Conference Committee in 1995, which urged the Government to ensure that the procedures and provisions concerning strikes did not amount to a denial of this fundamental right, and they deplored the fact that the Government's response was confined to stating that it had noted the observations of the Committee of Experts. The powers of the Government to prohibit the right to strike, if it considered it contrary to the national interest, constituted a violation of the principles of freedom of association and were inadmissible in a democratic society. The national legislation reflected the gap between civil society and the public authorities. However, better collaboration between them could promote social peace and the emergence of a more stable industrial relations system.

In conclusion, the Workers' members called for the amendment as soon as possible of the Labour Code and other relevant laws to take into account all of the observations of the Committee of Experts and the recommendations of the national social partners. They urged the Government to provide detailed information to the Committee of Experts on all developments, and particularly on the work of the NLLC and any progress achieved in law and in practice. Finally, the Government should make as much use as possible of ILO technical assistance.

The Employers' members recalled that the application of Convention No. 87 by Bangladesh had been examined on three occasions during the 1990s by the Committee of Experts, and had been discussed by the Conference Committee in 1995. There were a number of important issues involved, which required individual examination.

With regard to the right of association of persons carrying out managerial and administrative functions in the public and private sectors, the important point was the manner in which these categories of persons were delimited. No specific information had been provided on this point by the Government representative. However, the Government's response to the comments of the Committee of Experts had made reference to two associations and the Committee of Experts in its comments had requested the Government to provide specific information on the number and size of any other such associations. The issue which arose in both the private and the public sector was that the persons in question might in practice be the representatives of employers. They could not therefore be members of unions at the same time, as they would then have to negotiate with themselves. The Government representative had stated that the category of persons concerned covered two per cent of all the workers involved, which appeared to be a reasonable number. Although those who were really managerial personnel could be excluded from the right to establish and join workers' unions, any who did not come into this category should be treated as normal workers. The Government should therefore be requested to provide further information on this point in an additional report.

With regard to the right of public servants to organize, the Employers' members noted that the draft Labour Code would appear to continue to deny this right to public servants and to restrict their right to issue publications. The Government representative had not provided very much information in this respect on whether it intended to change the proposed provisions.

On the subject of restrictions on the range of persons who could hold trade union office, the Employers' members noted that, among others, workers who were dismissed for misconduct could not hold such office. The Government representative had stated that this measure was designed to protect the activities of the trade unions. However, the Committee of Experts had pointed out that such legislation entailed a risk of interference by employers. The Committee of Experts had rightly requested the amendment of the relevant provisions to provide for greater flexibility in relation to the membership of trade unions and the holding of trade union office. What was required was a legal examination of the cases which had occurred in this respect, but the Committee of Experts had not requested more complete information on this point.

On the question of external supervision of the activities of trade unions, the Employers' members noted that the Registrar of Trade Unions enjoyed excessively broad powers, which included the right to examine many kinds of documents at any time, and not just on a periodical basis. In such cases there should be proper independent procedures to prevent any undue interference in the activities of trade unions. The Government representative had stated that such machinery existed. The Government should therefore be requested to provide additional information on the applicable provisions which determined and restricted the powers of the Registrar and provided for independent supervision of his activities.

With regard to the 30 per cent requirement, under which no trade union could be registered unless it had a minimum membership of 30 per cent of the total number of workers employed in the establishment or group of establishments concerned, the Employers' members noted that the status of trade unions could be withdrawn when membership fell below that level. This was an exaggerated restriction by the State which placed too great a restriction on freedom of association and prevented the creation of new trade union organizations. It was important to remember that most workers' organizations had started out with few members. Although the Convention did not contain specific provisions in this respect and it was for the State to set the necessary conditions, these conditions should not constitute obstacles to the development of new trade unions.

Turning to the question of export processing zones (EPZs), which existed in many countries, the Committee of Experts had reported that the NLLC had submitted a report on this subject which was being studied by the Government. This report, and a Bill on that matter, would be submitted to Parliament. Although the Government representative had not provided further details on the NLLC's report, he had claimed that workers in EPZs enjoyed better conditions of work than the rest of the country's workforce and were not unhappy with their situation. Although the Convention did not state that the same labour law had to apply throughout a country, or particularly in EPZs, it did require the observance of the principles of freedom of association on a nationwide basis.

Turning to the comments of the Committee of Experts on restrictions on the right to strike in Bangladesh, the Employers' members referred to their own position on this question and noted that there was no basis in the Convention for measuring the extent of any restrictions that were imposed on this right. The provisions of the Convention would be infringed where the right to strike was constrained to such an extent that it no longer existed. The Employers' members recalled that strikes could have serious repercussions on the national economy, particularly in view of the growing interdependence of the productive and service sectors. It was therefore relatively frequent for governments to establish a certain threshold for the proportion of the workers who needed to give prior approval to the calling of a strike in order to prevent disruption of the productive process. In this case, the level was set at three quarters of the workers concerned, which seemed reasonable. The Committee of Experts had also referred to the possibility of prohibiting a strike if it were considered prejudicial to the national interest or where it involved a public utility service. The Employers' members recognized that these expressions were not clear. However, the comments of the Committee of Experts were based on its narrow interpretation of the essential services. The Government should be requested to provide further information on the application of the relevant legal provisions in practice and the cases, and circumstances, in which these provisions had been invoked. However, this had not been done in the report of the Committee of Experts. The Employers' members recalled in this respect that it was the fundamental right of every State to determine the extent to which certain limits should be applied to the right to strike for the public good.

In view of the complexity and large number of issues involved, it was not possible to arrive at conclusions, in this case, easily. Further information should therefore be requested in the form of a written report that covered all of the questions raised in detail. The Government should also specify the areas in which change was seriously being contemplated so that these points could be taken up in future and the changes adopted could be evaluated.

The Workers' member of Burkina Faso recalled that, for many years, the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts had asked Bangladesh to modify its legislation and practice to conform fully to the principles of freedom of association. She regretted that, despite these appeals, numerous and grave violations of these principles had again been committed, including acts of violence against the members and leaders of trade unions. By way of example, she stated that the Independent Union of Textile Workers of Bangladesh and its members, the large majority of which were women, had been the target of acts of aggression on the part of the public authorities. In August 1995, the leaders of this union had filed a complaint with the investigating official, but it had not been received. Following the institution of judicial action in conjunction with the Association of Exporters of Bangladesh, the Dhaka headquarters of this union had been ransacked in November 1995 and the members had been subjected to violence. Furthermore, the members and leaders of a union of a textiles enterprise in Dhaka had been the target of threats and harassments by the public authorities throughout 1995 and 1996. In the month of June 1996, the competent authority had refused, for the second time, to officially register this union. The speaker noted with concern that, generally, when workers registered complaints with the competent public authorities, they were not listened to and did not get any cooperation in finding an acceptable solution for the problems they faced. She regretted that the Government's report did not provide any information on the measures taken in this regard since the last report examined by the Committee in 1995. Finally, concerning export processing zones, she stressed the importance of these workers, the great majority of which were women working in miserable conditions, benefitting from the right to organize without restrictions or discrimination of any kind. She highly doubted that the absence of complaints by these workers effectively signified that they did not have any complaints, as the Government had indicated. Finally, she earnestly requested the Government of Bangladesh to modify without delay its law and practice in order to bring them into full conformity with the principles of freedom of association, and in particular with the provisions of the Convention.

The Workers' member of the United States emphasized the serious nature of the case, which concerned many of the most fundamental provisions of the Convention, including the right of association of public servants, the denial of the right to organize in EPZs, restrictions on persons who could hold trade union office, interference by public authorities in the affairs of trade unions and excessive restrictions on the right to strike. He therefore regretted that the Government representative had said very little that was new since the Committee had last reviewed the case in 1995. With reference to the statement by the Workers' member of Burkina Faso concerning the continued violation of the Convention with regard to workers in the garment industry, he recalled that there were over 800,000 workers in the industry, approximately 80 per cent of whom were women. Many garment factories were located in EPZs, where trade unions were illegal. The Government representative had made no apologies for this fact and indeed appeared to be informing the Committee that the practice would continue. This matter would need to be followed very closely.

The speaker added that during the past few years there had been a courageous effort to organize independent unions in garment factories and to bring those workplace unions into a single industrial federation, the Bangladesh Independent Garment Union (BIGU), which was independent of any political party, employers and the Government. This attempt to organize an independent, democratic industrial federation from the ground up would, if successful, be of truly historic significance for Bangladeshi workers. However, up to now the Government had refused to legally recognize BIGU, in clear violation of the Convention. He noted that this effort to organize the workers had coincided with the negotiation of an agreement with the Bangladesh Garment Manufacturers and Exporters Association (BGMEA) for the elimination of child labour in the garment industry. The ILO had played a role in bringing about the agreement and in its implementation. BIGU was an ardent supporter of the agreement and had established the first schools for the children rescued from the garment factories. However, there were many forces in Bangladesh endeavouring to ensure that BIGU's organizing effort would fail. Some of the many personal sacrifices made by the workers in this respect were recorded in the ICFTU 1997 Annual Survey of Violations of Trade Union Rights. In particular, he pointed out that the garment industry was a major exporter producing largely for well-known multinational companies based in the United States and other countries. This case brought to light the responsibilities, not only of the Bangladeshi Government and factory operators, but also of multinational enterprises to ensure that the fundamental human rights contained in ILO Conventions were respected. Any denial of this responsibility would only strengthen the growing forces that were opposed to the expansion of international trade, economic integration and globalization. Full implementation of the Convention by the Government, with the active support and assistance of multinational enterprises, would play an important role in resisting such protectionist forces and ensuring that these processes benefitted as many people as possible in Bangladesh and elsewhere, and not just the most privileged. Unfortunately, much still needed to be done in this respect, as shown by this case.

The Workers' member of India agreed that the case raised matters of serious concern. As a neighbour of Bangladesh, he received constant reports that trade union rights were not respected in that country. Although the Government representative had stated that trade unions could go to court to protect their rights, this was not always possible in practice. He referred to a case of the dismissal of workers in 1996, in which the workers concerned had endeavoured to take action through the courts. However, the trade union representatives who had assisted them had been told to leave their jobs, been beaten up and offered different jobs on condition that they did not go to court. It was therefore not true to say that workers and their representatives could obtain protection for their rights through the courts in Bangladesh.

Recalling the statement of the Government representative concerning the right of association of public servants, he warned that this statement raised the issue of the difference between trade unions and associations. The latter did not have the same rights as trade unions and it could not therefore be claimed that public servants in Bangladesh enjoyed the right to freedom of association. On the issue of the 30 per cent minimum requirement for membership of a trade union before it could be registered, he pointed out that this level was set much lower in most other countries. Although the Government representative claimed that the reason for the measure was to prevent a multiplicity of unions, its real objective was to raise obstacles to the establishment of trade unions in general. Moreover, the situation in EPZs in Bangladesh was also very serious. The message disseminated to multinational enterprises by the national authority responsible for promoting these zones emphasized the fact that the law prohibited the formation of trade unions. This was proof enough that the Government did not respect the right to freedom of association or collective bargaining in EPZs. Another anti-trade union measure that was not accepted by the trade unions of other countries was the broad powers of the Registrar to interfere with their activities through inspections of trade union offices, documents and staff.

On the question of the range of persons who could hold office in trade unions, he noted that workers could be dismissed for unfair labour practices, without such practices being specified in detail in the legislation. This gave the Government broad powers, for example, to dismiss trade union leaders when it so wished. Other serious constraints on freedom of association were the requirement that 75 per cent of the workers concerned needed to give their consent to a strike and the possibility of prohibiting strikes either which lasted more than 30 days or which were considered prejudicial to the national interest. These measures constituted serious constraints on trade union rights and gave the Government wide powers to prohibit strikes. For example, it had been possible for the Government to prevent a strike by telephone workers by claiming that they worked in an essential service.

Although the Prime Minister of the country had come out in favour of the adoption of changes in these matters, no concrete action had yet been taken. It was necessary to amend the legal provisions and for measures to be taken with the support of workers' organizations. A request should therefore be made to the Government to take the necessary measures to achieve progress in the application of all aspects of the Convention before the Conference Committee met again next year.

The Workers' member of Greece considered that this was an example among others where a ratification of a Convention was of doubtful value as it was forgotten in practice. The content of the Committee of Experts' observation highlighted a strange concern for workers, who were mature adults who should be allowed freely to organize themselves. The explanation according to which workers could be fired for misconduct should be further clarified, as it would be a cause for concern if the right to determine what constituted misconduct rested in the hands of employers or of a governmental institution and not in the hands of the judiciary. In any event, the workers were not so stupid as to elect dishonest leaders. This provision should therefore be repealed. As regards the requirement of a three-quarters consenting majority to declare a strike, it constituted a blatant example of interference. The economic situation was often invoked as a reason for not applying standards, while experience showed that no country could prosper without respecting them. If the Government really was intent on applying the Convention, it should undertake to do so and this Committee would then, next year, be able to take note of any progress made. The dialogue in this Committee should not only be diplomatic in nature, but should give a voice to the workers not present here and who were unable to make themselves heard in their own country.

The Workers' member of Italy was of the opinion that, in spite of the sparse responses provided by the Government, the seven points raised by the Committee of Experts bore witness to a general and persistent violation of freedom of association. The provisions affected the right of the unions freely to choose their leaders and allowed for unjustified forms of intervention by the authorities on trade union premises. A complaint concerning violation of freedom of association submitted by a union of textile workers had resulted in severe conclusions by the Committee on Freedom of Association in this respect. The 30 per cent requirement amounted, in practice, to a bar to recruitment of new trade union members. Furthermore, the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, permitted the firing of trade union leaders. As regards the denial of the right to organize in export processing zones, it should be recalled that, in 1992, the Government undertook to cease this practice. As for the restrictions on the right to strike in essential services, they should be determined through tripartite negotiations and not in an authoritarian way. The elections held last year bore witness to the will of this country to progress towards democracy. No such progress was possible, however, in the absence of respect for fundamental rights. The first stages of the joint programme between textile workers, UNICEF and the ILO to abolish child labour were encouraging; perhaps a similar type of programme could be of assistance to overcoming the obstacles to freedom of association.

The Workers' member of Colombia expressed his concern regarding the lack of information provided by the Government representative, especially since hopes had been raised that the principles of freedom of association would be fully respected. Concerns had been raised regarding the interference of the Government in the internal affairs of trade unions, particularly in the case of workers dismissed on grounds of misconduct who were then prevented from holding office in trade unions. In certain countries being a trade union member in itself can lead to unjust dismissal. Freedom of association and the right to strike had to be guaranteed in export processing zones, as well as in the public sector. These rights had to be respected throughout the world, and especially in developing countries. Despite the observations formulated by the Committee of Experts, there had been little progress and repression continued. He could only hope that next year would bring about genuine progress concerning the respect of workers' rights.

The Workers' member of Pakistan, pointing out that a new Government which had come into power last year had committed itself to respecting freedom of association, called upon the Government representatives to adhere to Convention No. 87. It was not only the ratification of a Convention but its implementation in letter and spirit that mattered. First of all, trade union rights in export processing zones as well as in rural areas needed to be respected. Secondly, the restrictions on trade unions to elect their office-bearers needed to be abolished, since freedom of association dictated that trade unions elect their representatives in full freedom without interference from the Government. As a result, section 7-A(1)(b) of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969 (IRO), needed to be repealed. Finally, the requirement under the IRO that no trade union may be registered unless it had a minimum membership of 30 per cent of the workforce meant that it would be difficult to organize workers in a large establishment, and therefore needed to be removed. He hoped that the Government would take up the offer of technical assistance of the Office.

The Employers' member of India indicated that labour laws in Bangladesh and India were similar. Thus, while the Trade Union Act in India merely required a membership of seven workers to form a union, persons carrying out managerial and supervisory functions preferred to form associations, and be registered under the Societies Act, in view of the nature of their functions. Therefore, in Bangladesh, the restrictions placed on them under the IRO were justified. Similarly, the restrictions on the range of persons who could hold trade union office were justified so that the internal trade union leadership could grow. The 30 per cent requirement under the IRO had to be maintained so as to avoid the proliferation of trade unions which were neither in the interest of the industry, nor the workers. Finally, the right to strike was not an absolute right and should be subject to the interests of the State. The type of over-protective pro-worker regulation promoted in discussions here was eroding employers' rights to manage their enterprises; he hoped that this Committee would have a balanced view and keep in mind the entire industrial relations scenario.

The Employers' members recalled that the seven points which were taken up by the Committee of Experts did not all have the same importance and that new information was required and that the necessary changes should be carried out.

The Committee noted the statement of the Government representative and the debate which had ensued. It observed that, for many years, important and numerous discrepancies, in particular in the export processing zones, existed between, on the one hand, the national legislation and practice and, on the other hand, the provisions of the Convention. The Committee expressed the hope that the National Labour Legislation Commission would rapidly conclude its work on revising the labour legislation and that the new Labour Code would take into account the numerous and repeated observations of the Committee of Experts and also those of the Conference Committee. It reminded the Government of the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office in this regard.

Belarus (ratification: 1956). A Government representative, the Minister of Labour, stressed that his country was resolutely pursuing the course of democratic reform. During recent years practical efforts had been made at all levels — national, local and industry level — to improve interaction between state bodies, trade unions and employers' associations, to strengthen their role in the reform process and to guarantee constitutional rights. It was only through collective efforts based on the relationship of true social partnership that the country could solve its problems of the transitional period. However, the solutions to these acute problems were not always achieved in the manner corresponding to the letter and the spirit of international law, as the present case showed. He considered his task not to defend the necessity of the action which had taken place nearly two years ago, but to show that the ILO's comments on the matter had given rise to appropriate action being taken by those directly responsible for the application of international law. The best proof of this was that no such incidents had occurred subsequently. At present, there were 38 trade unions registered and exercising activities at the central level as well as many other trade unions which were registered and acted at the level of enterprises, all of which considered themselves free, independent and democratic. This proved that freedom of association and trade union rights, as specified by the Convention, were applied fully in legislation and in practice. With respect to the problems raised, all of them were already settled. It only remained to amend the decision of the Council of Ministers No. 158 of 28 March 1995 so as to exclude the transport sector from the list of essential services where strikes were forbidden. The draft of these amendments was currently being considered by the Government and was expected to be adopted during 1997. He stressed that tripartism in Belarus was still very young and prone to conflicts. However, the importance of the social partnership was fully recognized by the Government as demonstrated by its adoption, in consultation with the central level trade unions and employers' associations, of the concept of the system of social partnership, which had been given the status of a constitutional principle by being recognized in article 14 of the national Constitution. He asked the ILO to consider the possibility of providing consultative and technical assistance on a number of questions including the improvement of the social partnership system and on the final draft of the Labour Code which had already been elaborated initially with the assistance of the Office. Expressing his gratitude for this assistance, and for the two technical projects under way, he pointed out that the present case was the first one ever considered by the Committee with respect to Belarus. This procedure would be a good lesson to his Government to ensure that no such situation arose in the future. In conclusion, he promised that the Office would be informed in writing of progress achieved.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his explanations and noted that this was indeed the first time that the Committee had addressed the application of the Convention by Belarus. This might have encouraged understanding toward the Government, but such an approach was not appropriate in this case given the nature of the Committee of Experts' observation and the numerous complaints presented to the Committee on Freedom of Association in 1995 by the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), which could give the impression of a return to the worst totalitarian years. This case demonstrated an intention to prevent the existence of an independent and democratic trade union movement, and deliberate violation of Conventions, constitutional provisions and national laws, with anti-union aims in mind. It therefore called for a firm approach and great scrutiny. Such severity, which might appear excessive, was in fact fully justified by a reading of Case No. 1849, examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association in March 1996. The facts were: suspension by Decree No. 336 of 21 August 1995 of the activities of the Free Trade Union of Belarus (SFB) and its local affiliate; the arrest and detention of union leaders and members; imprisonment of union leaders in violation of the regular judicial procedures; raids on union offices and property; strike-breaking action; dismissal of unionists for participating in strikes; threats to open new court investigations with the imposition of heavy fines or imprisonment; limitations on the participation in union activities abroad. These were the serious violations of Article 4 of the Convention addressed in the Committee of Experts' observation, which highlighted the cynicism with which the Government got around even the spirit of the Convention by turning it into an anti-union weapon and prohibiting the right to strike in the transport sector. None the less, as the Committee of Experts had stated, the transport sector as a whole could not be considered an essential service which would justify banning the right to strike. The Workers' members could only stress the need to modify Decree No. 158 of 28 March 1995 so as to remove the transport sector from the list of essential services. The Minister of Labour had stated that this change to the law was under way: it was necessary for the Government to send a report so that the Committee of Experts could assess the situation. The situation was even more worrying because the Government had limited itself to evasive replies to the concrete violations identified by the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts. A dangerous, anti-democratic logic was at work when the laws were adapted to violations and, through this, power was derived to manipulate institutions so as to obtain desired decisions, as was still the case for the Constitutional Court. It was clear that none of the judicial, institutional or political bodies would be able to provide minimum guarantees for the respect of Conventions. Therefore, it was indispensable that the Government furnish the detailed report requested by the Committee of Experts and that it prove that it was able to guarantee all trade union rights and freedoms in an appropriate political and institutional atmosphere, notably so as to ensure an end to the administrative dissolution of unions, and to remove obstacles to the right of unions freely to formulate their programmes of action without interference from the public authorities.

The Employers' members considered that the case raised a series of problems, in law and in practice. The dissolution of unions by administrative decree clearly violated the Convention. It was essential that the Committee of Experts had information at its disposal on judicial decisions in this regard. The complaint examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association also concerned a serious violation of the Convention. The present case raised the question as to whether the situation could be considered a strike when wages were not payed or were delayed: under civil law it would not be considered a strike to cease work when the other party had not fulfilled the terms of the labour contract because it had stopped paying wages. Concerning the question of the right to strike, the Employers' members' position differed from that of the Committee of Experts. It was excessive to consider that the entire transport sector constituted an essential service, the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the population. The definition of essential services should not be subject to negotiations between the social partners; in a democratic State, it was up to the legislature to define the general interest. Finally, the Employers' members shared the impression of the Committee of Experts and the Workers' members that freedom of association was still poorly protected. Improvements in the law and practice were required and the Government should supply a detailed report so as to permit the Committee to re-examine the situation.

The Workers' member of Belarus stated that his organization, the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB), had an affiliate directly involved in Case No. 1849 before the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning the strike in the Minsk metro system. The dispute had been caused, as in many other similar conflicts, by the massive violation of the labour legislation and the non-payment of wages. This particular strike had been prohibited and declared illegal by Presidential Decree No. 336 on the grounds that transport was listed as an essential service, where the right to strike was prohibited. The trade union premises were closed, its property seized and leaders detained, and all the workers participating in the strike were fired without the right to reinstatement. The judicial procedure concerning the legality of the right to strike had never been initiated. The Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB) had recently adopted a declaration concerning the respect of labour and socio-economic rights and had called upon the President, the Government and the Parliament to remove all limitations on the free exercise of trade union activities, and to repeal Decree No. 336 because it was still being used to justify interference in internal trade union affairs. He proposed that the Committee ask the Government to provide a prompt reply concerning its international obligations to respect human and trade union rights.

The Workers' member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Nordic Workers' members, deeply regretted that the Government had neglected appeals from the international community to bring its legislation into conformity with the obligations arising from ILO membership. He stressed the importance of fulfilling the principles of freedom of association, and noted the Government's statement that changes may occur. He recalled that the Committee on Freedom of Association had determined that a trade union could not be dissolved or suspended by administrative decision, as had happened after the Minsk metro strike, and that the transport sector should be removed from the list of essential services. He called on the Government to grant workers in the transport sector the rights to strike and to join trade unions without Government interference. A great number of the workers who had been dismissed during the 1995 Minsk strike had still not been reinstated due to the long delay in court procedures. He expressed his deepest sympathy with those fighting for fundamental rights in Belarus and urged the Government to accept the technical assistance of the Office so as to bring the legislation into conformity with its requirements of the Convention.

The Workers' member of New Zealand emphasized that this case was a very serious violation of the Convention, both as concerned the suspension of unions following a transport sector strike, and in relation to breaches of the Convention, noted in the examination of Case No. 1885 by the Committee on Freedom of Association. It also raised an issue of credibility in that, notwithstanding the serious allegations in Case No. 1885, the Government had failed to respond, and had apparently not taken any steps to implement the Committee on Freedom of Association's previous recommendations in Case No. 1849. He noted that the Minister of Labour had confirmed that Order No. 158, adopted by the Cabinet of Ministers in 1995, was still in effect. Therefore, it was up to the present Committee to pursue compliance with the Convention. He recalled the facts of the Committee on Freedom of Association case including the administrative suspension by Decree No. 336 of the Free Trade Union of Belarus (SFB) and the Minsk Branch of the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB) following a strike of metro workers which was lawful under the existing law, as well as harassment and media campaigns directed primarily against these unions. The Committee on Freedom of Association and this Committee had repeatedly emphasized that respect for civil liberties, such as freedom of assembly and expression, were essential for the normal exercise of trade union rights. Both had clearly been severely curtailed here. Noting, as the Employers' members had, that one of the issues which had given rise to the transport strikes was late payment of wages, which was in itself a fundamental breach of employment contracts, he questioned whether forcing employees to work without wages was not a contravention of Convention No. 29. It was necessary for the Committee to support the Committee on Freedom of Association, and, noting that the Minister of Labour had asked for technical assistance from the Office, proposed that it accept monitoring of this case.

The Workers' member of Swaziland noted the contradiction between the Government's statements and actions. The suspension of the Free Trade Union of Belarus (SFB) by Decree No. 336 was contrary to Article 4 of the Convention and undermined the democratic right to bargain collectively. Furthermore, the Government flouted the rule of law when it ignored the Constitutional Court ruling that Decree No. 336 was unconstitutional. The denial of the right to strike, the interference in the right to organize and register unions, the denial of the right of assembly, the sending of members of the armed forces to trade union meetings, mass dismissals and interference in shop floor matters all constituted tyranny of the highest order. Consequently, he supported the proposal of the Workers' members regarding the conditions in this case.

The Workers' member of Kazakstan stated that trade unions in all the countries which had emerged from the territories of the ex-USSR hoped that the transition to a market economy would bring with it the establishment of new labour relations between workers and employers, guaranteed by the constitutions and labour legislation in conformity with international labour standards. However, the situation had turned out to be the opposite, with the prohibition of the rights to organize and to strike, the persecution of trade union activists, the violation of their civil liberties and the non-payment of wages. The Government, in violation of the Convention, had tried in this case to suppress the free trade union movement. He considered that the present Committee should express great concern over their situation and the fate facing their leaders, and request the Government to provide in the very near future full information on the measures taken to eliminate all violations of trade union rights.

The Workers' member of Germany noted with deep concern the developments concerning the law and practice in this case. The available information proved the serious violation of basic workers' rights, including the right to strike. It was therefore essential that the Committee of Experts pay particular attention to this case. Significantly, this case showed the importance of defining essential services as narrowly as possible so as to avoid the risk of arbitrariness, in conformity with the jurisprudence of the ILO supervisory bodies. If the Government was really committed to the principle of social partnership, it should not, in practice, threaten the existence of autonomous organizations or the right to strike. It was necessary to insist that the Government amend its law and effectively guarantee freedom of association and the right to strike, in conformity with international law.

The Minister of Labour stated that his Government would draw serious conclusions from this discussion, leading to concrete measures in legislation and practice with a view to ensuring that no such violations of trade union rights could ever be repeated. He recalled, however, that the incidents in question had occurred nearly two years ago and that, since then, there had been no recurrence of such incidents: the trade union concerned had been re-established, registered and was functioning freely. The Government would inform the Committee of Experts in writing of all progress achieved.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Minister of Labour, as well as the discussion which ensued. The Committee observed with concern that the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts had referred to serious violations of freedom of association, both in practice and in the law concerning the suspension of unions by administrative authority. The Committee urged the Government to urgently repeal the provisions which established excessive limitations on the right of workers' organizations to formulate their programmes of action without interference by the public authorities. The Committee asked the Government to send a detailed report, indicating the measures taken to bring its law and practice into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee hoped to be able to note substantial progress when the case was next examined.

Bolivia (ratification: 1965). A Government representative stated that, in effect, a problem of interpretation existed between the Convention and the labour legislation in his country. To overcome this problem, an agreement with the Bolivian Central of Workers (COB) had been signed in May 1997 to form a committee to study the correct interpretation concerning freedom of association. The Government requested the presence of ILO technical experts to assist in overcoming the problems concerning freedom of association.

The political Constitution of the State guaranteed freedom of association. The existing problems raised could be solved within the existing legal framework through the Ministry of Labour. In certain cases, the Bolivian Central of Workers had refused to recognize the freedom of a worker to participate or not participate in a union or to have more than one union per enterprise. In any case, it was hoped that the assistance and cooperation of the ILO would help arrive at a single and correct interpretation and application of the Convention within the framework of the agreement with the COB.

The Workers' members recalled that since 1967 the Committee of Experts had revealed frequent and serious divergencies between the national legislation and the Convention. In 1993 and in 1995, the present Committee had discussed this case in depth. The 11 points set out in the observation of the Committee of Experts demonstrated a manifest interference by the public authorities in the internal affairs and functioning of trade unions. Rather than establishing a framework for the proper functioning of a system of industrial relations, national legislation and practice aimed at hindering its creation. In 1993, the Employers' members had expressed certain hesitations concerning points 8 to 11 concerning the right to strike. The Workers' members were, for their part, convinced that the restrictions imposed relating to the right to strike and the general structure of the legislation violated freedom of association and the right to organize. The Workers' members shared the view of the Committee of Experts as expressed in points 8 to 11 of their observation.

During the emergency in 1995, the authorities proceeded to arrest trade unionists. These events led to the lodging of a complaint to the Committee on Freedom of Association. That Committee deplored the action taken by the Government against the trade union movement and requested it to reinstate the rights of all those concerned and to eliminate all effects of the state of emergency for the workers concerned. However, the Government had not submitted a report for examination by the Committee of Experts. It had not honoured the undertakings it had made in 1995 to bring national legislation into conformity with the Convention, in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations. In 1993, the Government had announced the imminent adoption of a new labour law which would satisfy some of the remarks made by the Committee of Experts. But those commitments had not been honoured. This inertia was unacceptable. The Government had not shown cooperation and the Committee on Freedom of Association had to examine this case in the absence of any clarification from the Government.

The total absence of any progress in this case was deeply disturbing. The Government had not honoured any of the undertakings it had made to the Conference Committee; it had not cooperated with the ILO in spite of having had the possibility to receive technical cooperation; as concerned those sanctioned during the state of emergency, it had not provided any information as to whether they had been reinstated in their jobs and in their trade union activities. These elements justified the sending of a direct contacts mission. If the Government was not in a position to request such a mission, this would be yet another demonstration of the total lack of any will to cooperate, and would call for this Committee to mention the case in a special paragraph of its report.

The Employers' members referred to the Government representative's statement on arrangements reached with the trade union concerning the interpretation of the Convention and found this to be very surprising since this case had been discussed several times on previous occasions. The Government representative had added that certain provisions commented on by the Experts were not applied in practice. There was no real new information. Out of the 11 points enumerated by the Committee of Experts in its observation, the first seven constituted clear violations of the Convention. The Employers' members could not come to the same conclusions as the Committee of Experts with regard to the other four points. The legislative requirement for a majority of three-quarters of the workers to declare a strike was reasonable and democratic. The prohibition on strike action in certain public services and the ban on general strikes showed that the public good prevailed over individual interests. However, urgent action needed to be taken by the Government on the former points. Since the Government was not taking any initiative in this matter, ILO technical assistance or even a direct contacts mission was desirable.

The Workers' member of Argentina stated that this was a serious case that should be viewed in the context of the previous examinations made of the matter by the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts. The Government had made promises which it did not keep, and compounded the problem with the failure to send a report for examination by the Committee of Experts. The Government of Bolivia resorted to a state of emergency, to the negation of social dialogue, and to the mass detention and confinement of union leaders. In an era of globalization, such anti-union action could spread to other countries, as was already happening in Latin America. In Bolivia, there was a regression of social and union rights: workers and their organizations faced policies which sought to eliminate acquired rights, until workers' organizations disappeared. He considered this a violation of democracy and thought that the Committee should request the Government to commit to improving the application of this fundamental ILO Convention. Such progress would benefit the workers of Bolivia as well as those in MERCOSUR.

The Workers' member of Colombia stated that the Convention, ratified 34 years ago, was a dead letter in Bolivia. The international community and the ILO were aware of the difficulties which the Bolivian unions faced. The Government should adopt pertinent measures to harmonize its legislation with the Convention. In the current situation, it appeared that even an elected government would not solve the persistent problems of freedom of association. The speaker expressed his hope that the request for the technical assistance of the ILO would attain concrete results.

The Workers' member of Iceland, who spoke on behalf of the Workers' members of the Nordic countries, asserted that although Bolivia had been a Member of the ILO from the beginning, this case was by no means a new one. During the 1980s, this case had been addressed by the Committee of Experts in 1981, 1982, 1983 and 1985. In 1985, the Government had stated in its report that in preparing and drafting the General Labour Bill, it had taken account of the discrepancies existing between the national legislation and the Convention. However, since 1985 this case had been examined by the Committee of Experts every other year and the Government still had done nothing.

While individual States did have the right to establish a minimum number of regulations to ensure that trade unions functioned normally, this did not mean, as had been pointed out by the Committee of Experts, that the Government could place excessive restrictions on their establishment and functioning through detailed legislation. The purpose of Convention No. 87 was to protect trade unions against undue government intervention.

In view of the numerous comments by the Committee of Experts on the various violations of the Convention, he wondered why Bolivia had ratified Convention No. 87 in the first place. The Committee did not seem to be able to note any progress, despite its longstanding and extensive handling of the case and its repeated requests to the Government for change. Recent information showed that violations of the Convention vis-à-vis the Bolivian trade union movement continued. These included the violent repression of demonstrations by the security forces, as well as the arrest, detention without trial and torture of trade unionists. However, the Government did not see these and other violations of the Convention as a serious problem, as it appeared from the Government representative's statement. In view of the fact that the Government had shown such a lack of respect for the obligations that it had undertaken voluntarily, the speaker insisted that the Government receive a direct contacts mission so that it could obtain the assistance clearly needed in order to ensure compliance with the provisions of Convention No. 87.

The Employers' member of Bolivia recognized, as the Committee of Experts' report noted, that a certain formal basis existed to question the relationship of the legislation to the Convention. None the less, it was important to dispel the impression that a sinister oppression of unions existed in Bolivia. The truth was that the majority of legal provisions examined by the Experts — like many others — were obsolete and too caustic and rigid. These obsolete standards were not applied, which ensured in practice freedom of association. Certain of these provisions noted by the Experts were in force due to the desire of the workers, for example, the impossibility that existed for more than one union per enterprise. He referred to some provisions that were obsolete. The national legislation provided for the existence of a union protection (which required judicial approval prior to dismissal of a union leader). He added that, in practice, general or solidarity strikes did not result in the confinement of the leaders. Also, there were cases of enterprises with more than one union.

The speaker recalled the efforts of 1985 and 1986 to reform the General Labour Law, with the technical assistance of the ILO. None the less, the lack of tripartite consensus prevented the Government from promulgating new legislation. In reality, the employers hoped that modern reforms would be adopted which would be in full conformity with the Convention and would eliminate the existing rigidities.

The Government representative stated that he had taken note of the previous interventions and reiterated his previous statements. He was obliged to cast aside the over-exaggerated impression of the violations of social peace in his country. On the contrary, the Government intended to promote a reform of the labour legislation, in agreement with the social partners. The labour legislation dated from 1939, and since then more than 4,200 resolutions and modifications had been adopted, which had created significant inconsistencies. It was due only to a lack of resolve of the Bolivian Central of Workers that the reform of the labour legislation had not been achieved.

The speaker recalled that in 1996, with the assistance of the ILO Regional Office and the Inter-American Development Bank, a social dialogue was begun with the participation of workers' and employers' representatives. The Bolivian Central of Workers attended only one session. It should be recalled that no union leaders remained in detention or confinement, and that all had been reinstated in their jobs. Furthermore, the state of emergency ended in 1995, but such measures were necessary to counter subversive activity which threatened civil order and were within the constitutional framework. It was appropriate to urge the COB to work with the Government to improve the current situation. The existence of 257 strikes, 425 shut-downs, and three general strikes during 1996 testified to the functioning of freedom of association in his country.

The Workers' members recalled, in order to avoid any misunderstanding, that it was correct that in 1993 the Government representative had made reference to a draft law under preparation with the technical assistance of the ILO. Two years later, however, the Committee of Experts noted that it was "not able to note any progress with regard to the application of the Convention". Now, another two years later, the Committee noted that "it has not received the Government's report". One can only conclude that there was no will to collaborate with the ILO. At the same time, cases had been brought before the Committee on Freedom of Association. The suggestion to have recourse to a direct contacts mission was specifically intended to be able to clarify the situation. It was therefore even more regrettable that the Government representative had not responded specifically to this suggestion.

The Government representative indicated that the Government had already requested a high-level committee to assist in solving the pending problems.

The Employers' members indicated that they had taken note of the most recent statement made by the Government representative which was very new to them. But the progress made appeared not to be sufficient yet. The tripartite committee referred to by the Government representative did not seem to be working. The Government did not seem to know exactly what the requirements of the Convention were. Its lack of cooperation was highlighted by the absence of a report. Therefore the Government needed to receive a direct contacts mission at least in respect of the first seven points enumerated in the observation of the Committee of Experts.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as the debate which followed. The Committee regretted that, despite the discussions in the Committee in 1993 and 1995, and the assurances which had been given by the Government that a draft law formulated with ILO technical assistance would be enacted in the near future, it had not been enacted. The Committee regretted that the Government had not sent the requested report. The Committee recalled that the restrictions on the right to unionize, including for public officials, should be removed, and urged the Government, as had the Committee on Freedom of Association, to take all necessary measures to eliminate acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee noted that the Government had declared its intention to request a direct contacts mission to secure concrete advances in harmonizing the national legislation and practice with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee trusted that this mission would take place in the near future and that in the next report the Government would be able to show substantial progress in regard to this fundamental Convention.

Colombia (ratification: 1976). A Government representative stated that he would address two topics which had been raised by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of the Convention by Colombia. First, he would refer to the existence of an "initial draft of a Bill" on essential public services and regulation of the right to strike in those service sectors. Second, he would explain how the Bill modified and derogated certain provisions of the Substantive Labour Code.

In regard to the first point, it should be reiterated that the Government of Colombia had the will to harmonize a text, with participation of the employers' and workers' parties. The Government was aware of the complexity of the topic, especially the legal aspects, which signified a reconsideration of criteria with a long tradition in the legal order of the country. The Government was ready to recommence a participatory process of analysis and debate.

In respect of the second topic, in November 1996, the Government presented to the Congress of the Republic for consideration the above-mentioned Bill, No. 190/96, ratified by the Senate, which modified and derogated approximately ten sections of the Substantive Labour Code. In this manner, the observations of the Committee of Experts had been acknowledged.

One might note that the Committee of Experts had noted with interest the Bill and had expressed its hope that the Government would present it to Congress, which had been done.

The Bill was not an isolated act of the Government, much less a simple announcement for a way to escape criticism in this forum. On the contrary, it was an indication of a government policy oriented toward the promotion and respect of human rights, with special emphasis on the international labour Conventions which Colombia would fulfil.

The speaker also referred to the punishment of social protest and indicated that a committee had been created for the revision of the penal laws and the lifting of summary discretion concerning certain penal processes related to workers. As well, he referred to a Bill on collective bargaining and collective contracts in the public sector, 18 articles of which had been agreed upon by the social partners.

Progress by Colombia on this issue had been notable. It had made advances in fulfilment of its obligations with respect to the ILO. It was worth recalling that Colombia's reports over the years had been subject to the scrutiny of the Organization and the Conventions had been sent for approval to the Congress of the Republic. The Committee of Experts had already cited Colombia in its General Survey on Freedom of Association as a "case of progress" for its advances regarding the Convention.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information provided orally, and recalled that the case of Colombia had been discussed on several occasions by the Committee, in 1989, 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993 and 1995, and that it had even been mentioned in a special paragraph in 1990. The enhancement of social dialogue announced by the Government at the 1995 session, which had been favourably received, had apparently produced positive results. Based on the report of the freedom of association mission undertaken in October 1996, following the Government's request to the Conference Committee in 1996, and on the report of the Government, the Committee of Experts was able to note with interest that a Bill, prepared with the assistance of the ILO, had been submitted to the Congress of the Republic for approval, which seemed to constitute a positive response to several of the questions raised by the Committee. Furthermore, a preliminary draft of a Bill, on which the Office had made comment, defined the concept of essential public services and regulated the exercise of the right to strike. The Workers' members emphasized that these legislative amendments should be in full conformity with the requirements of the Convention and with the principles of freedom of association, and referred to the observation by the Committee of Experts which specified in detail all the legislative provisions which were being repealed or amended. They expressed their firm hope, as had the Committee of Experts, that the proposed Bills would be submitted to the Congress of the Republic as soon as possible and that the corresponding Acts would be adopted in order to bring the whole legislation into conformity with the Convention and the principles of freedom of association.

In spite of these legislative developments, however, the Workers' members lamented the serious situation in Colombia, notably the prevailing conditions of extreme violence. The testimonies were overwhelming and the list of violations of the principle of freedom of association, in particular of the provisions of the Convention, was endless. According to information obtained from Workers' members, extreme violence was used against persons acting as trade union leaders. They were subjected to attacks on their personal freedom and physical integrity, including assassinations. The assassination of the trade unionist José Leitos, chairman of the CGTD, was a clear example. The report of the mission emphasized that "there is reason to be most concerned by the climate of violence prevailing in the country which affects all sectors but which has grave consequences for trade union leaders and members [...] the number of victims continues to be extraordinarily high and the legal proceedings to examine the facts result in extreme levels of impunity". The Workers' members requested that the Government instantly take the measures necessary for the effective implementation of the legislation under preparation, as the best of laws would remain a dead letter as long as such violent conditions persisted. They concluded by stressing the importance of viewing the instruments of the ILO and the principles contained in the Constitution not as isolated or limited instruments, but rather as components of a necessary and essential interaction. Restating the conclusion of the mission, they underscored that "it was clear that the problem of violence, together with new measures and new financial assistance, could only be efficiently tackled in a larger context of instituting social peace. Social peace must be based on social justice and the progressive elimination of the social conditions which cause injustice, misery and deprivation". They asked the Government to continue to indicate progress on the projected legislative amendments, and to state in detail the measures it envisaged to undertake in order to contain the escalating levels of violence and to create a political and social environment which favoured an effective application of the principles and Conventions of the ILO to which it had subscribed.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the general statement and the important news that he had provided. The Committee had discussed this case on seven occasions since the mid-1980s and had had cause to note the complexity and problematic nature of the situation in Colombia. The observation of the Committee of Experts referred to 11 different points, which showed that up to now there had been a very large degree of state interference in freedom of association and the right to organize. The legal provisions in question had permitted interference in the affairs of trade unions and had placed major restrictions on strikes. Although the Employers' members did not consider that all of the restrictions in question violated the Convention, its principles would undoubtedly be violated if no strikes were possible in practice. The Government representative had referred to a draft Bill amending the Labour Code which appeared to respond to many criticisms that had been made up to now. Although it was for the Committee of Experts to give its view on the final version of the text, the indications were that many of the provisions that had been criticized would be either repealed or amended, with the result that the legislation would be brought either partially or entirely into conformity with the Convention. The Government representative had also stated that further amendments were planned and had provided information on other Bills which were under preparation or had been submitted to Parliament. It was important that any of the draft texts which had not been transmitted to the Office should be sent as soon as possible with a complete report so that the Committee of Experts could give its opinion rapidly.

The Employers' members recalled that, on the occasions that the Conference Committee had examined the case in the past, the response that had always been given focused on the violent situation in Colombia, which pervaded all spheres of life in the country. In this climate of violence, violent acts were perpetrated against individuals and trade unionists, as well as against other categories of the population and against the whole of society. The amendments that had now been submitted, as well as those which were under preparation, would provide a good basis for influencing the climate of violence in a positive manner so as to avoid the circumstances which had been a cause of concern for some time. The Government should report on the latest developments and complete the proposed reforms as soon as possible in order to give effect to the considerable changes that had been announced.

The Workers' member of Colombia stated that there was no doubt about the Government's intentions to harmonize the legislation with the ILO Conventions; but, in this case, a real commitment was needed to fulfil the pledges made. The more open attitude of the Minister of Labour towards solving conflicts in the country should be recognized, but these conflicts were generated by government policies. He emphasized that his main concern was the climate of violence and impunity in which the country struggled. In this context, he condemned the various forms of violence, which involved state terrorism, the repression and violation of human rights by the security forces, and the violent and criminal work of paramilitary organizations, which operated in some places with the tacit approval of the authorities as private militas. In the same manner and with equal emphasis, he condemned the kidnappings, ambushes, and attempts perpetrated by guerrilla groups.

The Government had undertaken, with assistance from the ILO, to harmonize all of the laws with the Convention. None the less, it was near the end of the current legislative session, and the rights to organize, to bargain collectively, and to strike remained limited by law.

He denounced the current imprisonment of the Union of Petrol Workers (USO) on charges of terrorism, based on accusations made by military intelligence bodies. The situation had reached the limits of irregularities, and the Attorney General had initiated investigations against the faceless officers with assumed names who provided the same testimony many times against the petrol union leaders.

The violence which continued affected freedom of association in Colombia in various ways. In 1996, there were 256 assassinations of trade unionists; in 1997, approximately 50 deaths, including the President of the CGTD in Tolima, Mr. José Isidoro Leyton, and trade unionist Victor Julio Garzón, who had participated in the ILO direct contacts mission in October 1996. In 1997, 16 trade unionists had disappeared and several hundred others had been forcibly displaced because of their trade union activities. Threats and intimidation were constant practices, about which the ILO should be concerned.

From 11 to 18 February 1997, a work stoppage was held by public sector workers and, as a result, an agreement was signed with the Government. None the less, due to non-compliance on the part of the Government, the workers were obliged to stop work for 24 hours on 11 June to obtain compliance with the agreement. The Government's response was to deny signing the agreement, which would complicate the situation in the immediate future.

He called on the Government to set out before the Committee the commitments the Government would assume to resolve these problems and suggested it receive an ILO mission, with the goal of closing the cases mentioned.

The Workers' member of Spain deplored the fact that, despite the promises made to the ILO, none of the Bills which had been elaborated had been enacted. He was concerned that the present law permitted the administrative authorities to declare a strike illegal (section 450 of the Substantive Labour Code), in grave violation of the Conventions, and that power to issue such declarations ought to be placed with the judiciary as the clearest expression of freedom of association. He was also concerned by the interference of authorities in the internal affairs of the unions. For example, out of a total of 143 requested modifications of statutes concerning essential issues of freedom of association, 99 were rejected by the administrative authorities. The most grave issue was, none the less, the number of assassinations of union activists: from 1 January to 22 May 1997, 30 union activists were killed, including Victor Julio Garzón and José Giraldo. He observed that in reality, between the guerrillas and the paramilitary forces, trade unionists were fighting for peace.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom described the unhealthy working conditions endured by Colombian workers, as illustrated by an ICFTU video showing women, including pregnant women, working in greenhouses to produce flowers in the presence of noxious sprays which caused blindness, miscarriages and premature births. Also terrible was the daily loss of life in Colombia, and particularly of the men and women who were active in the trade union movement, who risked their lives to fight for better conditions of work in the country including improved health and safety conditions. The Committee on Freedom of Association had noted that many cases of acts of violence remained unsolved, largely due to the fact that few cases were heard, proceedings were slow and prosecutors could not or dared not carry out investigations because their lives were endangered. Freedom of association could only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental human rights, and particularly those related to human life and personal safety, were fully respected and guaranteed. The killing, disappearance or serious injury of trade union leaders and activists required the institution of independent judicial inquiries and the punishment of the guilty parties. Failure to bring the guilty parties to judgement created a situation of impunity which reinforced the climate of violence and was extremely damaging to the exercise of trade union rights.

She called upon the Government to take urgent action to strengthen the judicial system and hoped that the Commission for the Revision of Penal Standards would set a dynamic pace in addressing the massive problems that it faced. She urged the Government to take the necessary measures to dismantle the paramilitary groups which prevented the normal development of trade union activities in the country. In this respect, the Government could give an important lead by recognizing and protecting the legitimate right of workers to organize in trade unions, which would act as vehicles for the promotion of dialogue and understanding between employers and workers and for the development of a new culture of labour relations. Urgent action was needed to put an end to the killings, which had already cost the lives of too many people.

The Workers' member of Swaziland reminded the Committee that the Government was in serious violation of the Convention and did not appear to place value on the right to life of trade unionists or civilians in general. The case before the Committee showed a very high level of neglect of human and civil rights. Eliminations, assassinations and disappearances were the order of the day and constituted a serious degradation of human values and disrespect for justice, let alone social justice. Fundamental rights, ranging from discrimination on grounds of race and denial of the rights to strike and to free collective bargaining, were being denied. The legal system had become deeply criminalized with those engaging in illegal strikes risking imprisonment for between two and 20 years. In order to prevent strikes, the Government could classify services as essential, at will. Government interference in trade union activities and its arbitrary powers to dissolve trade unions were a gross violation of Article 3 of the Convention. The killing by police-backed death squads of so-called "disposable" persons, who included vagrants, street children and homosexuals, was a further serious contravention of civil and human rights. Social protest was classified as subversive and the response to such acts was usually the use of violence and sometimes the assassination of unarmed civilians. The right of rural workers to shelter had also been violated by the burning down of their houses. Justice and respect for human rights had been undermined with impunity for the arbitrary arrest of trade union leaders, who were brought before military courts. All the measures adopted to remedy the situation needed to guarantee the full protection of the trade union rights set out in the Convention and efforts should be made to improve respect for human and civil rights. He endorsed the call by the Workers' members for the speedy adoption of the proposed legislative changes.

The Government representative expressed his gratitude to all those who were sincerely concerned about the situation of human rights in Colombia. He accepted constructive criticisms and impartial proposals from international bodies, non-governmental organizations, trade unions and employers' associations, which wanted to cooperate with his country in the eradication of these problems. He commended the objective and impartial approach taken by these bodies to raise national and international awareness, as well as those of the human rights bodies of the UN and the ILO; he requested international cooperation, such as had happened last year when a high-level mission of the ILO visited his country in October and when an office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights was opened in Colombia.

Regarding violence, his Government condemned the assassination of trade unionists, and any other people, kidnappings, torture and terrorism. He acknowledged that some agents of the State and the military were accused of committing such violations of human rights, but these were exceptions, and not the expression of any Government policy in this respect.

This grave problem of the violation of human rights and international humanitarian law in Colombia was closely related to the internal armed conflict which ravaged the country. This conflict was going on outside the conventional norms and, apart from the guerillas, an important role was played by the criminal circles such as drug traffickers and paramilitary forces. These phenomena were very real, notwithstanding the commitment to the protection and promotion of human rights, which was basic to the state of law and the democratic tradition in his country. His Government had developed a policy aimed at: the humanization of the armed conflict; the strengthening of justice; the elimination of groups of private justice; the consolidation of mechanisms promoting the application of the law; the expansion of the communication network to receive accusations and complaints; the scheme of compensation to the victims whose human rights had been violated (Act No. 288 of 1996); the policy of assistance, with the help of the International Red Cross, to those displaced by violence; the strategy of teaching and sensitizing the community concerning human rights; the creation of a special authority on human rights in the Ministry of the Interior; the opening in Colombia of the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights which became operative in April 1997.

With respect to the human rights of workers, the Government had created an inter-institutional committee for the promotion and protection of the human rights of workers, composed of five representatives of the central workers' organizations, the chairman of the episcopal conference and the presidents of the two most important non-governmental organizations in Colombia (the Association of Barristers and the Colombian Commission of Jurists). This Committee might eventually invite representatives of the ILO and the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights to participate. It had vast competence and powers to confront the difficult tasks which it had been assigned. For example, it was charged with collecting information and studying the inquiries on the kidnappings, assassinations, tortures, threats and forced displacement of trade unionists and other workers, to recommend the necessary measures to punish such acts and prevent them from being repeated. It was responsible for presenting to the competent authorities recommendations on investigations to define penal, disciplinary and pecuniary responsibilities. It also had the function to develop an integral programme for protecting the human rights of workers and to carry out a policy to implement, monitor and supervise those rights. To avoid standards becoming a dead letter, the Decree obliged public and private bodies to supply information required for the compliance of the functions mentioned in the Decree. A copy of the Decree would be provided to the Committee.

With respect to some previous interventions which raised issues of impunity and state terrorism, he stated that in Colombia the three powers of the State were independent and that the executive authorities could not order preventive detention as it would violate the Constitution of Colombia. With respect to faceless witnesses, he stated that it was an exceptional measure due to the high level of violence imposed by narc-terrorism and that these faceless witnesses were also used to investigate serious violations against trade unions. As to the allegations concerning abuses committed by faceless witnesses in the judicial processes against the members of the Union Sindical Obrera, he stated that these processes were drawing to a close. In the case of assassination of trade union leaders Messrs. Leyton and Garzón, the ILO's intervention to put pressure on the authorities proved to be very useful in helping to speed up the investigations. With respect to section 450 of the Labour Code, its revision was studied with the ILO mission which visited his country and the text of the modifications would be transmitted in due course. With respect to the registration of trade unions, 83 organizations had been registered as of May 1997. Finally, concerning allegations of violation of freedom of association in the flower-growing sector, the speaker pointed out that there were no complaints in this respect before the supervisory bodies of the ILO.

The Committee noted the information communicated by the Government representative and the debate which followed. The Committee noted the direct contacts mission which had taken place in 1996 and observed that the Government had indicated to the Committee of Experts that it had elaborated a Bill to repeal or modify various dispositions of the Substantive Labour Code which had been criticized by various supervisory bodies. The Committee also observed that the authorities had presented the Bill to the Congress of the Republic during the legislative session. The Committee trusted that the necessary measures to eliminate the discrepancies between the national legislation and Articles 23 and 24 of the Convention would be urgently adopted. The Committee profoundly regretted the climate of violence which affected the life and physical safety of the trade unionists. The Committee expressed the firm hope that, in its next examination of the case, the Committee of Experts would be able to note substantial progress concerning the civil liberties essential for the exercise of union rights, and concerning the full application of the Convention in law and in practice.

Costa Rica (ratification: 1960). The Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, emphasized that his country fully applied the rule of law and allowed the law courts to decide on any discrepancies which might emerge in its society. The right to strike in Costa Rica had been set out in 1949 in article 61 of the Political Constitution. The provisions of this article showed clearly that the legislator envisaged that the right to strike would be set out in law, in this case in the Labour Code, and that it would have two limitations: in the first place, as to the sectors in which it could be exercised, with the indication that it was prohibited in the public services, the definition of which would be determined by law; and, in the second place, as regards the manner in which it was exercised, with the prohibition of any acts of coercion or violence. Section 364 of the Labour Code provided that a strike was the temporary stoppage of work in an enterprise, establishment or business, agreed upon and executed peacefully by a group of three or more workers, with the exclusive purpose of improving or defending their mutual economic and social interests. This provision was supplemented by section 366 of the Labour Code (first part), which set out the requirements to be met in order to call a legal strike. These included strict compliance with section 364, exhaustion of the conciliation procedure set out in Chapter III, Title VII, Sections 500 and following, of the Labour Code, and the requirement of being at least 60 per cent of the workers in the enterprise, workplace or business concerned. It could therefore be concluded that any strike which did not meet the requirements of section 366 (first part) was illegal. The strike by workers in Linéas Aéras Costaricenses SA (LACSA), which was referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts, did not fulfil the above requirements and was therefore illegal. This was not because it had taken place in a public service, but because when calling the strike the workers had not fulfilled the requirements established by law.

With regard to the right to strike in the public sector in general, article 61 of the Constitution excluded workers employed in the public service from its protection and left the determination of public services to the discretion of the legislator. The constitutional provision was reflected in section 368 (first part) of the Labour Code, which stated that strikes were not permitted in the public services. In this respect, it was important to note that section 368(2), which provided that disputes occurring in these services between employers and workers, and in any other cases in which strikes are prohibited, shall be submitted for settlement by the labour courts, had been found unconstitutional by the Constitutional Council on 23 August 1992. Sections 467 to 535 of the Labour Code had also been declared unconstitutional with regard to public servants and to public administrations not subject to a private employment regime, as well as sections 398 to 404 and section 535, without prejudice to the rights acquired in good faith through the labour courts for the specified duration of such rights. The ruling by the Constitutional Court stated that there were two different types of employment relations in the public service. One of these was the relationship of employees in the public sector who were bound to public administrations by a "public employment regime", under the terms of the state regime set out in articles 190 and 191 of the Political Constitution. The other type of employment relationship was not legally subject to a public employment regime, principally in state enterprises in which the State owned all or most of the shares, with the result that the employees concerned were not governed by the concept of a public employment relationship, but rather a private employment relationship. In one of the grounds for its judgment, the Constitutional Court made reference to these administrations by asserting that the declaration contained in this decision covered the employment relationship between the public administration (or administrations) and its employees but as concerned sectors in which there existed a national regulation referring to the private sector, the solution should be different. These cases would be submitted to arbitration procedures if they were based on laws, regulations or governmental decisions in force. In addition, they could not be the object of arbitration decisions taken in good faith nor decisions made by tribunals composed of persons who were not sworn officials. He recalled in this respect that, by conviction and legal obligation, the Government respected the rulings of the courts and the Constitutional Council, which were universally binding.

The definition of the public service according to Costa Rican law was contained in section 369 of the Labour Code, which stated that, for the purposes of the above section, public service means: (a) all services provided by state workers or institutions, where their activities are not also provided by individual profit-making enterprises; (b) services provided by workers engaged in sowing, cultivating and harvesting agricultural products, raising stock and producing forestry products, as well as their processing when such products would deteriorate if such processing were not carried out immediately. Nevertheless, the above services excluded the services provided by agricultural workers in enterprises which have concluded contracts with the State, which have been converted into laws of the Republic, in which it has been specified that the enterprises and their workers may submit disputes to arbitration for settlement only when they have voluntarily agreed to do so; (c) the services provided by employees of railway, sea and air transport enterprises, and the services provided by transport employees in any specific transport enterprise until its closure; (d) services provided by employees which were absolutely indispensable to maintain the operation of specific enterprises which could not interrupt their services without causing serious and immediate harm to health or the public economy, such as clinics and hospitals, hygiene services and lighting; and (e) services declared to be such by the Executive Authority throughout the territory of the Republic or in part of its territory, where the Legislative Assembly has availed itself of its constitutional powers to suspend certain individual guarantees.

The Government representative informed the Committee that, since the adoption of the Labour Code, various attempts had been made to make changes relating to the concept of public service. One of the measures adopted was contained in the Public Employment Bill No. 11,888 which was currently before the Legislative Assembly. The above Bill, in Title VI (single chapter, sections 110 to 119), contained regulations governing strikes in public services which recognized the right to strike in non-essential services and placed limits upon it, as well as establishing sanctions for non-compliance, and general prohibitions and the manner in which it could be exercised. With regard to the right to strike in transport enterprises, with reference to the Committee of Experts' comment on the dispute in the LACSA company, he indicated that section 113(f) of the Bill stated that: (general conditions of legality) in order for a strike in the public administration to be legal, employees and their organizations must meet the following requirements: (...)(f) in the case of vessels, aircraft, trains, buses and other public means of transport, such vehicles must be taken to their point of departure before the commencement of the strike.

The above information showed the openness of the legal system to permitting workers in transport enterprises, such as LACSA, to take part in strikes, provided that they complied with certain conditions in order to be classified as "legal strikes". In this way, the Government of Costa Rica was demonstrating its will to comply with the recommendations of the Committee of Experts concerning strikes in the sectors in question. There could be no doubt that through the new legislation, which was awaiting adoption by the Legislative Assembly, the Government of Costa Rica guaranteed minimum services and recognized the right to strike in non-essential services in public institutions, thereby endeavouring to find a new balance between the rights of society and the users of public services, on the one hand, and of public employees, on the other.

The rights which were formally set out in Costa Rican legislation and in the proposed legislation formulated by the Government, which was now before Parliament, were also becoming broader in practice. A little more than one year ago, teachers in the country, whose trade union organization was the strongest and best organized, had held a general strike to show their disagreement with the reforms to their special pension scheme introduced by the Government. The strike had lasted six weeks and finished when an ending to the strike was negotiated with the Magistrate. Despite being an illegal strike because it had taken place in a public service and did not meet the requirements set out by law, none of the strikers had been subject to dismissal or reprisals. A few days previously, a strike by telecommunications workers had been ended by decision of the workers themselves, but not due to government pressure. Even though the strike had been illegal, no sanctions had been taken against the strikers. The same had occurred in a strike called a few months previously in a hospital where the workers were calling for an increase in their food subsidy. The strike had been ended by decision of the workers and no sanctions had been taken against those who were involved in this illegal action. The Government representative emphasized that these cases demonstrated once again that, irrespective of whether or not strikes were legal, and unless they involved the violent expression of a point of view, they were respected even where they were in contravention of the law of the country. Strikes were neither prevented nor terminated by force. Nor were reprisals taken against the strikers.

With regard to the recommendation by the Committee of Experts that foreigners should be able to hold trade union office, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country, the Government representative explained that the prohibition was a result of a principle set forth in the Political Constitution. Article 60(2) provided that foreigners were prohibited from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions. The legal basis of the above provision had its roots in the question of national sovereignty. In accordance with the country's constitutional provisions, sovereignty was vested exclusively in the nation. The Constitution reserved to nationals of the country the exercise of political rights on the basis that these were intrinsically derived from the exercise of the people's sovereignty. Indeed, since sovereignty was vested in the people, in accordance with articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Political Constitution, it was evident that the various ways in which the will of the people could be expressed, including the holding of office and the exercise of authority in trade unions, was confined to those who were members of the people. Nevertheless, the Government of Costa Rica was always ready to bring its legal provisions into conformity with the principles of the ILO and had decided to request technical assistance from the ILO in order to find a legal solution that was in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of Experts.

On the question of strikes in the agricultural, stock-raising and forestry sectors, he noted that the concept of agricultural activity as a public service was not set out in jurisprudence or in very many legal texts. It was therefore interesting to examine the basis upon which the legislator had developed this concept. The explanation was to be found in the statement transmitted to Congress by the President of the Republic when submitting the draft Labour Code. He had stated that he was aware that the ILO had adopted a Convention in Geneva on 12 November 1921 obliging its signatories to guarantee to all persons working in agriculture the same rights of association as urban workers and to repeal any legislative or other measures which restricted those rights as they related to agricultural workers. However, he had emphasized his intimate conviction that agriculture and its related activities, in a country such as theirs, which depended exclusively on the produce of its fields, constituted a real public service which, for reasons of common interest, could not and should not be paralysed by a strike or work stoppage. Nevertheless, it was probable that the underlying reasons for the provision in question were more of a political nature. Indeed, the prohibition upon strikes by agricultural workers was not an isolated provision, but formed part of a legislative policy that resulted in the Labour Code containing a whole series of provisions containing exceptions for rural workers. Despite the fact that they were dispersed throughout the Labour Code, they amounted to specific legal treatment that was less favourable for these workers. A number of these provisions had been repealed or amended, but there was no doubt that the intention was for the Labour Code not to apply in real terms to the agricultural sector.

It could therefore be deduced that the provisions in question covered two types of situations and one exception. The first was the most general and included all the work of sowing, cultivating and harvesting agricultural products, raising stock and producing forestry goods. The second case consisted of the processing of such products, and only covered cases in which they needed to be processed immediately in order to prevent them from perishing. The exception concerned agricultural workers in enterprises that had concluded so-called "legislative contracts" with the State in which they agreed to have recourse to voluntary arbitration. Subsequently, in view of the fact that in the cases under examination strikes were not permitted and arbitration was compulsory, and in view of the consideration that a legislative contract could not be modified by a law, the legislator had to enshrine this provision in the law for the sake of coherence. The Government was aware of the less favourable treatment accorded to freedom of association for agricultural workers, particularly with regard to the right to strike, since the adoption of the Labour Code and on various occasions had endeavoured to introduce reforms relating to the concept of public service. One of the measures adopted was contained in the Public Employment Bill No. 11,888 which was currently before the Legislative Assembly. The above Bill, in Title VI (single chapter, sections 110 to 119), contained regulations governing strikes in public services which recognized the right to strike in non-essential services and placed limits upon it, as well as establishing sanctions for non-compliance and general prohibitions. In accordance with the proposed provisions of section 110 of the above Bill, strikes would be permitted in the agricultural, stock-raising and forestry sectors. The Government representative was of the opinion that the prohibition of the right to strike for these workers was discriminatory and violated the principle of legal equality. He therefore undertook to request the technical assistance of the ILO with a view to formulating draft legislation to eliminate this restriction. The above information once again demonstrated the commitment of the Government to complying with the recommendations of the Committee.

The Workers' members recalled that the Committee had examined in detail the application of the Convention by Costa Rica in 1993. One of the major concerns of the Committee, apart from the right to strike and several violations of the principles of freedom of association, had concerned the solidarist movement. They noted that the Government had taken into account the observations and comments of the Committee of Experts, as well as of this Committee, in the establishment of the relevant draft legislation. However, they regretted that serious problems remained in practice. According to some information, a growing number of employers were using these non-representative associations to free themselves from the obligations contained in the collective agreement. They insisted that the draft legislation, which had been formulated more than two years ago with the technical assistance of the ILO concerning a pension fund for workers and the democratization of the economy, be adopted without any delay in order to ensure that all trade unions could enjoy the right to manage the unemployment compensation fund.

As regards the prohibition on foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions contained in section 60 (2) of the Constitution, the Workers' members reiterated the position that they had adopted in 1993 and once again requested the Government to re-examine the question so that workers could freely elect their representatives, in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

As regards the limitations on the right to strike, they recalled the conclusions adopted by the Committee of Experts in paragraphs 158 and 159 of the 1994 General Survey on Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining, in which it was stated that the right to strike should not be subject to any restrictions or prohibitions in the public sector, with the exception of civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services, in the strict sense of the term, namely services that could endanger the life, safety or health of the population if they were disrupted. As the Committee had stated, they considered that transport services in general were not essential services in the strict sense of the term. They stressed that the Government should take all necessary measures to eliminate all limitations on the right to strike in the public sector, as well as in the agricultural, stock-raising and forestry sectors. They hoped that the Government would in the near future adopt draft legislation on public services which contained limitations on the right to strike in accordance with the observations formulated by the Committee of Experts and this Committee.

Finally, while they noted that several draft legislations covering a number of issues raised by this Committee in 1993 had been prepared with the technical assistance of the ILO, they were very concerned about the delays encountered, as well as the contradictory practices, which could hinder the effective implementation of the Convention. They emphasized the fact that the Government should take the necessary measures in order to solve the problems raised by the Committee of Experts. In this context, it was essential that the new information provided by the Government's representative be transmitted to the Committee of Experts for complete analysis. The Conference Committee should consider re-examining this case at its next session.

The Employers' members thanked the Minister of Labour of Costa Rica for his extensive and clear comments. When the case had been considered by the Conference Committee in 1993, it had had to deal with a larger number of individual points raised by the Committee of Experts. The fact that this list had shortened gave grounds for believing that there was less to be criticized. Indeed, in 1994, the Committee of Experts had placed Costa Rica on the list of cases of progress in relation to the Convention.

With regard to the prohibition upon foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions, the Employers' members acknowledged that this constituted a restriction of the freedom of workers and trade unions to organize their own activities. Although the Minister had described the historical reasons for the measure, he had also indicated a readiness to adopt reforms and to request technical assistance from the ILO. It could therefore be assumed that changes would be made in this respect.

Concerning the prohibition upon exercising the right to strike in the public sector and in the agricultural, stock-raising and forestry sectors, the Minister had also provided extensive explanations. The Employers' members noted in this respect that certain changes had been introduced in practice and had been examined by the Constitutional Court to determine their conformity with relevant provisions of the Constitution. However, the country did not have uniform regulations applying to all cases of strikes and lockouts. On the question of whether the transport sector was an essential service, the Employers' members emphasized the differences between the various member States, with their varying structures, levels of development and types of economy. The situation could not therefore be judged in a uniform manner. With regard to the question of strikes in the public sector, they noted that the employer in such cases was the State, which normally appeared to be the stronger party. However, in many cases the State was in practice the weaker party. The category most affected by strikes in the public sector was the population as a whole, which could be held hostage by public sector workers. It was for individual States to draw up the necessary limitations in order to achieve a good balance as regards strikes. Since the Convention and other related international instruments set out only general principles, without any detailed provisions, the principles in question had to be applied by each State according to its national situation. The Employers' members were encouraged by the readiness expressed by the Minister to adopt changes and adjust to the criticisms of the Committee of Experts. Further improvements could therefore be expected. Much of what had been criticized in this case could be explained by the historical background of Costa Rica, with the State holding particularly widespread monopolies in many areas. This had been changed gradually, but in some areas the labour legislation had not been fully adapted. It would appear that Costa Rica was set on the right path and realized that the internal discrepancies in its regulations relating to freedom of association needed to be resolved. In this respect, the Employers' members noted that it was the practice of the Conference Committee to re-examine the cases on which it reached its own conclusions. This had the effect that many cases came up before the Committee year after year. However, the Employers' members believed that cases such as the present one would not require re-examination at the next session of the Conference Committee and that further action should depend on the comments of the Committee of Experts in its next regular report on the case.

The Workers' member of Costa Rica supported the statements of the Workers' members. In Costa Rica, strikes were forbidden in the public sector and collective bargaining did not exist. In the last 50 years, only twice had strikes been declared legal in sectors in which strikes were permitted by the legislation. Even where a strike was legal, such as in the case of LACSA, situations were reached in which workers were dismissed, collective agreements abrogated and legal proceedings were still pending five years after the event. The Government had not followed the recommendations of the direct contacts mission or of this Committee, which had requested it to let trade unions manage their pension funds themselves (forbidden by Act No. 7360). The few concessions which had been granted to the trade unions were the result of the action of the AFL-CIO, which had requested the United States authorities not to grant trade benefits to Costa Rica. Finally, he referred to Report No. 305 of the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning the case of FERTICA SA Workers' Association, which involved anti-trade union dismissals of hundreds of workers. The Committee on Freedom of Association had expressed its concern at the delays and lack of effectiveness of procedures in a considerable number of cases. These deplorable delays in so many cases had to be reduced. He wondered whether the future would bring about the disappearance of the trade union movement in view of the fact that neither direct contacts missions nor ILO technical assistance had succeeded in changing the attitude of the national authorities.

The Workers' member of Argentina recalled that the Government of Costa Rica had undertaken to bring its legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Labour Code prohibited the exercise of the right to strike in the public sector, as well as in the agricultural, stock-raising and forestry sectors. The Government had indicated the existence of draft legislation to modify the current legislation. However, it was regrettable that the statements of the Government showed its intention to maintain these legal restrictions. Strikes were the most legitimate weapon available to workers. It was for this reason that the concept of "essential services" needed to be structured and limitative. The ending of discrimination against public sector workers had been difficult for the ILO to achieve in view of the reluctance of governments to accept freedom of association and collective bargaining. Conventions Nos. 151 and 154 clearly illustrated the workers' struggle to obtain equal treatment in the field of fundamental rights. These Conventions, with few exceptions, were applicable to all workers in the public sector. It was for this reason that the Government of Costa Rica needed to abrogate all provisions which restricted the right to strike, and which limited the full application of the principles of freedom of association and collective bargaining. Nevertheless, the existence of legislation was not sufficient: practical agreements were needed for the effective exercise of trade union rights. The Government should provide information on the issues raised and demonstrate as soon as possible that the rights contained in the Convention were guaranteed in the country. He noted that the statement of the Employers' members on the right to strike in general was out of place. The value and legitimacy of the right to strike as a means of defending and promoting workers' rights could no longer be questioned. In certain situations, strikes were the only means available to workers to defend their rights. Experience from the world over showed that workers knew when and how to use this right. Of course, there had been periods when this right had been repressed, but it was useless today to try to restrict it, despite the current trend towards globalization. He stressed the fact that the workers of the European Union and of MERCOSUR had clearly shown over the past few years that the exercise of the right to strike was the only way for them to make their voice heard.

The Workers' member of the United States reminded delegates that those who did not learn from history were doomed to repeat it. In the case of Costa Rica, it was the Government which had not learned from history, but the Costa Rican labour movement and the workers that it represented who had been doomed to the repetition. Costa Rica had been no stranger to the Committee on Freedom of Association, with over 40 complaints filed against it since 1967. Ironically, Costa Rican labour law had undergone certain reforms, although much of the long-standing law had been interpreted and enforced in an even broader manner, rendering the violations of the Convention even more chronic. With regard to the prohibition upon the right to strike in the public sector, the Committee of Experts made particular reference to the air transport sector and had called for the prohibition to be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee of Experts had hoped that the Costa Rican Government would take steps to eliminate the broad prohibition placed on the trade union leadership role of foreigners and the prohibition of strikes in the public sector, and in the agricultural, stock-raising and forestry sectors. However, the matters covered by the Committee of Experts only constituted a fraction of the problems related to freedom of association in the country. It remained virtually impossible to create a trade union in the private sector, including the nine export processing zones in the country, because trade union activists were constantly dismissed and blacklisted without any effective protection. As a result, collective bargaining was becoming almost non-existent in the private sector. The prohibition of the right to strike in the public sector only therefore formed one part of a much broader problem. In practice, strikes were banned in about 65 per cent of the manufacturing and service sectors which were designated as being of public interest. In addition to the sectors mentioned by the Committee of Experts, the ban on strikes effectively included insurance, banking, oil and related industries, electricity, water, communications, cement, education and health care. Not surprisingly, only two strikes had been declared legal in the country over the last 50 years. It was no secret that the Costa Rican Government had actively opposed any linkage and conditionality as regards labour rights in the trade integration process. The question therefore arose as to whether Costa Rica would respect the ILO and its supervision process. He hoped that the Government could learn from history and begin to take seriously the conclusions contained in the report of the Committee of Experts, despite the fact that these conclusions did not address the entire crisis as regards freedom of association in the country. He therefore implored the Government to stop the victimization of Costa Rican workers and to ensure that a sad history did not repeat itself.

The Workers' member of Colombia noted that the Committee was confronted with a very clear case of the violation of the Convention by the Government. He recalled that it was a common feature in Latin America to prohibit non-national workers from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions, as well as to prohibit strikes in the public sector. He noted that the trade union movement had always criticized policies which seriously infringed freedom of association. In the present case, however, the violation of the Convention was more serious, since strikes were also prohibited in the agricultural, stock-raising and forestry sectors, and in air transport. Workers could not remain passive with regard to such provisions, which seriously violated trade union rights. He recalled that strikes were never an end in themselves, but rather the ultimate means available to workers when confronted with the intransigence of governments or employers. Finally, he emphasized that the Committee on Freedom of Association had, on numerous occasions, reiterated that the right to strike was an inherent element of freedom of association and that it had developed the concept of essential services with a view to determining the cases in which the right to strike could be restricted or prohibited. International Conventions should be applied in good faith and national law should not be invoked, as the Government of Costa Rica had done, to justify a prohibition which covered all public services.

The Workers' member of Greece shared the opinion expressed by some speakers that some legal progress had been made since 1993. However, these interventions, as well as the observations of the Committee of Experts, also highlighted serious problems of application of the provisions of the Convention. He was of the opinion that this case should be evaluated in the next report of the Committee of Experts in order to decide whether it should be re-examined by the present Committee. As regards the restrictions on the right to strike, he noted that the Government representative had stated that this right applied to all workers employed in non-essential services. He considered, however, that the right to strike should be universally recognized and that, on the question of the services to be maintained, the trade unions always displayed a sense of responsibility, as they were fully aware of the importance of public support for the success of any strike action. The services that were essential should not be determined unilaterally by the Government, but through negotiations with the trade unions concerned.

With regard to the prohibition upon foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions, under article 60 (2) of the Constitution, it was difficult to comprehend the attitude of governments, including that of the Government of Costa Rica, many of whose populations lived and worked abroad. He recalled that Europe had experienced a significant level of migration in the aftermath of the Second World War and that several immigrants now held key positions in the trade unions of their countries of residence. This involvement facilitated their integration and permitted them to take part fully in the economic and social development of their new country. He expressed the firm hope that the Government would take all necessary measures to abolish the prohibition upon foreigners from exercising authority in trade unions.

The Workers' member of Germany noted that some progress could be discerned in this case. However, he still entertained great doubts as to whether the situation in Costa Rica was in conformity with international public law. Just as in the past, there continued to be serious violations of the Convention, with a core group of workers denied one of their fundamental rights. In particular, the concept of essential services in the country was interpreted in a very broad and arbitrary manner by the Government, resulting in a misleading and abusive interpretation of the categories of workers covered by this term. The facts of this case made it clear that it could not be left to each individual State to set its own limits in this respect. If the approach referred to by the Employers' members, under which the concept of essential services would be interpreted differently from country to country, were to be applied in practice, this would amount to a denial of this core Convention. The Convention should be interpreted in a uniform manner in accordance with the usual jurisprudence. He therefore supported the interpretations of the Committee of Experts, and their references to the work of the Committee on Freedom of Association, which had been extremely helpful in developing a definition of essential services. Care would need to be taken in future to ensure that such services were interpreted in a restrictive manner. He therefore appealed to the Government to apply the spirit and letter of the Convention in its law and practice. He recalled in this respect that the right to strike was a universal right and should not be limited in the case of categories of workers who were employed by the State.

The Government representative of Costa Rica distinguished between the remarks made during the discussion by the Employers' and Workers' members, and those made by individual Workers' members. He thanked the Employers' members for the considered manner in which they had discussed his intervention. They were the true guarantee of how the work of the Organization should be handled if it were to be successful. The strength of the Organization lay in tolerance and respect for the points of view expressed by all parties. He hoped that such respect would continue and would constantly strengthen the ILO.

However, certain Workers' members of Costa Rica did not appear to understand what was meant by the rule of law. He specified that the rule of law guaranteed what was known in legal commentary as due process, which meant the possibility for all the parties to fully state their case before a decision was reached. If matters were not resolved with the rapidity desired by many, this was due to the fact that the various parties, but not the Government, raised preliminary motions which delayed the proceedings. This so-called delay was necessary for reasons of due process. If due process were not observed, the parties would subsequently be able to complain that their right of defence had been violated. Both workers and employers benefited from the guarantees provided by due process that their points of view, evidence and propositions would be taken into account in all the solutions that were reached. In this respect, he noted that, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Report No. 305, an expression of his concern at the time taken to resolve matters before the labour courts had been transmitted to the President of the Supreme Court. The President of the Supreme Court had in turn transmitted that concern to the labour courts, which would take the necessary measures. However, it was not for the Executive Authority to instruct the President of the Supreme Court or the Judicial Authority as to the action that should be taken. He respected the independence of the different powers in the Republic, which was another basic element of democracy.

He informed the Committee that one of the Workers' members of Costa Rica had described a situation that did not exist in his country, thereby giving an erroneous impression of the real situation. His country was about to complete three years of absolute industrial peace, based on constant dialogue with the representatives of workers and employers. Just last week a wage increase of between two and three points above the level of inflation for all workers in the private sector had been negotiated with the trade union federation presided over by the same Workers' member. This was a good illustration of the industrial climate in his country. He added that the trade union movement had the right to bring all of its concerns before the Supreme Labour Council, which was composed of three trade union representatives, three representatives of employers and three Ministers. The Workers' member in question and his representative on the Supreme Labour Council had never referred to the matters that he had raised in this Committee.

On the question of the rapidity with which draft legislation was examined, he stated that the political situation of the country and its democratic system made it obligatory to submit draft legislation to Parliament, which was composed of representatives of the various sectors of society. The legislation was then discussed in Parliament in order to reach an agreement. Matters would not be resolved in his country by means of force. By way of illustration, in the case of the Bill to transform the subsidy for termination of employment, the stimulus had come from the political movement that was currently in power. There had been almost no participation by the trade union movement. The fact the Bill had not yet been adopted had not been due to the lack of political will by the Government, but to matters related to the internal workings of Parliament, which was sovereign in this respect. The Government's influence had been important, but not decisive. Being misinformed about this process meant that those concerned were not aware of how a fundamental institution of a democratic system functioned.

As regards the restrictions placed on foreigners, he stated that Costa Rica had shown its solidarity by receiving non-nationals who accounted for over 15 per cent of its economically active population. In accordance with the Political Constitution of Costa Rica, non-nationals had to be given housing, education and free health, even if they were not legally resident. The Government had given migrants the opportunity to obtain a work permit in order to regularize their work situation, even if their migratory status were not resolved. The Costa Rican people had given ample proof of its solidarity towards foreigners throughout its history. Its legislation would be brought up to date, as stated in this Committee today.

In conclusion, he supported the concept of international labour law covering labour matters, even within the countries of the region, as he had stated in interventions on the Report of the Director-General.

The Workers' members endorsed the opinion expressed by the Employers' members that some prudence was required in determining the cases to be examined next year. However, they recalled that, in the case of Costa Rica, their proposal was limited to the Committee envisaging such an examination if it considered it appropriate. They also agreed with the evaluation of the Employers' members that some progress could be observed on a number of issues which had already been discussed by this Committee. However, they expressed serious reservations as regards the two issues raised by the Committee of Experts in its observation. The additional information provided by the Government representative might indeed reveal positive developments, as indicated by the Employers' members. But this case required detailed and in-depth examination by the Committee of Experts. Finally, they urged the Conference Committee to request the Government to adopt draft legislation as soon as possible that was in conformity with the Convention, as well as the necessary measures to ensure its implementation in practice.

The Committee took note of the detailed information provided by the Minister of Labour and observed that, in spite of the direct contact missions to the country which had taken place in 1991 and 1993, the Committee of Experts observed that significant differences still remained between, on the one hand, legislation and national practices, and the provisions of the Convention on the other. The Committee hoped that the Government would adopt the necessary measures so that the prohibition on foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions would be eliminated, as well as the serious limitations imposed on the right to organize in the public sector, and in the agricultural, stock-raising and forestry sectors. The Committee took special note of the statement made by the Minister of Labour of Costa Rica who requested technical assistance from the ILO. It hoped that this technical assistance would be given rapidly so that the Committee of Experts would be able to verify that substantial progress had been made in the application of this fundamental Convention.

Guatemala (ratification: 1952). A Government representative, Minister of Labour and Social Protection, recalled that on 29 December 1996 the Accords on a Firm and Lasting Peace had been signed by the President of the Republic and the National United Guatemalan Revolutionary Front (URNG). The Peace Accords, which were brought about under the auspices of the United Nations and the ILO, permitted an improvement in relations between workers and employers. The dialogue which had developed had helped to resolve differences, and was at the heart of the creation of the tripartite Committee of International Labour Relations which operated in the country. The speaker was grateful for the role that the United Nations and the ILO had played in negotiating the Peace Accords. The commitments contained within the framework of the Accords allowed the Ministry of Labour to modernize, strengthen, and decentralize the General Inspectorate of Labour and Social Protection Directorate, particularly in the areas of health and social security in work, and of labour relations. These commitments included the translation of the labour laws into the Mayan languages, amendment of the labour legislation, training of 200,000 workers, and the use of dialogue to resolve conflicts between workers and employers. The tripartite committee raised awareness, resolved many conflicts, and promoted bipartism. Within the framework of this Committee, draft legislation was being examined which would be sent at the appropriate time to the Congress for consideration. The workers and employers played an outstanding role in consolidating tripartism, brought about with the assistance and collaboration of the ILO's multidisciplinary team based in Costa Rica. The Government proposed to the Committee of Experts that it elaborate and adopt draft legislation, which had been submitted for approval to the tripartite committee, to harmonize the national legislation with the Conventions. In order to reform sections 211, 220, 223 and 243 of the Labour Code, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee of Experts, draft legislation would be submitted for adoption at the next meeting on 26 June 1997. The Peace Commission and the ILO Standards Department had been informed of these developments. The speaker expressed his appreciation for the technical assistance of the ILO multidisciplinary team's specialists and the support of the Director of the ILO Area Office, and foresaw that such assistance would continue in the construction of a new Guatemala.

The Employers' members noted that this was a long-standing case which was being discussed for the 12th time since 1980 and had been the subject of three special paragraphs. In the late 1980s, the Committee of Experts had noted it once as a case of progress and a direct contacts mission had taken place in 1995. The protracted civil war had played a role, and they were pleased to note that the Peace Accords had created the possibility for constructive dialogue. They highlighted their concern over the restrictions placed on union activities: nationality requirements, the exclusion of candidates with criminal records, and the requirement that candidates be active in the enterprise at the time of the union election. The Employers' members noted that, according to the Minister of Labour, the Government would be ready to submit draft legislation at the end of June 1997. However, they could not share the views of the Committee of Experts concerning the right to strike, as they considered that this right did not flow from Convention No. 87. They noted the agreements reached by the tripartite committee, and expressed the hope that they would yield positive results. Lastly, the Employers' members asked the Government to send a detailed report to the Committee of Experts and hoped that they would be able to note full compliance with the Convention.

The Workers' members recalled that the case had been categorized as a very serious one during the discussion held in the Committee last year. It was very serious because of the facts described by the Committee of Experts, which pointed to a profound divergence between the legislation and the Convention. It was very serious also because of the total absence of cooperation on the part of the Government which boasted of having ratified a large number of Conventions. Finally, its seriousness was proved by the violence and generalized repression revealed by the numerous complaints before the Committee on Freedom of Association. The recent Peace Accords might open the way to reconciliation in the country and permit progress in the application of the Convention, in law and in practice. However, the situation was still at the stage of promises, while its gravity required urgent and significant action. While the Government could be commended on its willingness to adopt a new labour code, as it had announced before this Committee last year, no satisfaction could be drawn from the unsubstantiated reforms. In this respect, it was important to have information on the precise work of the numerous tripartite committees which had been mentioned and, in particular, on that of the tripartite committee on international labour questions, because the existence of purely formal structures was not only insufficient, but could lead to delays perpetuating abuses and impunity. Therefore, the Workers' members could not but share the strong hope expressed by the Committee of Experts that this tripartite committee would take into consideration, in the near future, all of the comments formulated with the view to the elaboration of the draft Code. This was particularly necessary in view of the very fragile political and social context characterized by the general climate of violence and deep anti-union attitudes. The numerous complaints concerning violations of freedom of association attested to the difficulties confronting workers in the exercise of their trade union rights: they were very often threatened, dismissed, attacked or even assassinated, while the anti-trade union practices of the national and foreign enterprises very often went unpunished. The involvement of the police authorities in these practices remained very worrying. It was therefore necessary to be extremely vigilant to ensure that the hope which had arisen from the Peace Accords would not be dashed by paper reforms which veiled violent anti-union practices. The Government should proceed rapidly, with the help of the Office, if necessary, to implement the proposed reforms and should provide a detailed report containing full information on the measures taken to bring the legislation and practice into conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Guatemala stated that the Government and employers violated national and international labour standards. The Peace Accords had masked the serious crisis which existed in his country and the loss of moral values. The Government's report contained unilateral information, since the workers' and employers' organizations had not been consulted. The Government had not made any effort to comply with the Committee's requests. An ILO direct contacts mission would confirm his assertions. The tripartite committee, mentioned by the Minister of Labour and of which the speaker was a member, did not promote dialogue and the search for consensus on trade union rights. In Guatemala, the freedom to organize and bargain collectively were restricted, as was evidenced by the destruction of several workers' organizations. Certain enterprises had filed court actions against unions and certain judges had fined the unions considerable amounts. The Government continued to issue standards contrary to freedom of association.

The Workers' member of Argentina recalled that the Workers' members had made specific criticisms on the discrepancies between the position described by the Government and the daily reality concerning trade union rights. Even though one should not forget the context of internal conflict in Guatemala, efforts should be made to secure the effective exercise of freedom of association. The Government should not create situations of anti-union violence, limit the right to strike or discriminate against agricultural workers in the exercise of their rights. Many Latin American countries had ratified ILO Conventions but their legislation did not recognize the rights those instruments established. The full exercise of democratic trade union activity could take place only in a country which favoured the protection of personal and union freedom in daily practice.

The Workers' member of Costa Rica recalled the statement made by the Government representative during last year's Committee which indicated that new legislation had been tabled before Congress and that a decision was awaited. In the present session, the Minister of Labour had indicated that draft legislation was before a tripartite committee. It was apparent that there was no political will to resolve the questions raised by the Committee of Experts. The conciliation tribunals created in Guatemala impeded collective bargaining, and the observation of the Committee of Experts had referred to government interference with unions. Union leaders should benefit from the rights established by the ILO core Conventions and should not be viewed as obstacles to consolidating social peace.

The Workers' member of Greece thanked the Minister of Labour for having taken part in the Committee's dialogue. He was particularly pleased that the Workers' member of Guatemala had spoken because the present Committee frequently discussed violations of freedom of association in the absence of the true representatives of the workers of the country in question. It was now indispensable that the Government repeal sections 220 and 223(b) of the Labour Code which legitimized discrimination of foreign workers, as well as section 241(c): workers knew very well that the success of a strike implied that it was supported by more than a simple majority of the workers involved. The judicial and other formalities to which workers were subjected in the election of their trade union leaders should also be removed, as well as other provisions mentioned by the Committee of Experts, such as section 255 which authorized the possibility of calling upon the national police to ensure the continuation of work, or the series of sections defining legal or illegal strikes. It was also necessary to repeal section 257 and section 390 of the Penal Code which threatened the workers engaged in a legal protest action with very severe penalties.

The Employers' member of Guatemala declared that progress had undoubtedly been achieved in the labour field in Guatemala, as illustrated by this year's revised list concerning the Generalized System of Preferences. Furthermore, the functioning of the Bipartite and Tripartite Committees was very satisfactory. The Government had shown tolerance towards strikes and peaceful takeovers of workplaces, and had even on occasions set aside the claims of employers. The Government's policy had made it possible to establish a large number of trade unions, including independent trade unions at the village level. Contrary to the claims made in certain statements, the trade unions of flour mill workers and bank employees referred to in the discussion were still active. In the case of the former, the dismissals had been a result of the acquisition by the enterprise of automated machines aimed at enhancing competitiveness and in the other case, the Los Cerros matter, a trade unionist had illegally confined the administrative personnel.

The Workers' member of Colombia expressed satisfaction at the signature of the peace accords. However, he emphasized that 45 years after the ratification of the Convention, the Government and the legislation continued to violate such basic rights as the right to organize, the right to collective bargaining and the right to strike. A direct contacts mission should be sent to Colombia as long as the Government had not shown a genuine commitment to apply the Convention.

The Workers' member of France understood from the statement of the Minister of Labour that the serious problems previously noted in Guatemala were to a large extent caused by the climate of tension. In view of the present situation, substantive changes, including a complete review of the legislation, could be hoped for in the near future. However, he emphasized that, while such reforms would take some time, certain immediate measures should be undertaken in order to ensure the full development of the trade union movement in a climate that was free of violence. Recalling that the case of Guatemala had been examined last year by the present Committee and that few changes had been observed, he insisted that it be subjected to continued examination in order to monitor whether any substantive progress had been made.

The Minister of Labour reaffirmed his earlier statement that the Tripartite Committee had reached agreement on 90 per cent of the points criticized by the Committee of Experts and the remaining issues would be discussed again on 26 June. A draft Bill would then be submitted to Congress. The Government wanted the reform of the labour law to be endorsed by workers and employers. The Bipartite Committee, in which the Government did not participate, was examining the reforms to the procedural part of the Labour Code, and was benefiting from ILO assistance. The revised list for the Generalized System of Preferences illustrated the improvement and progress in the situation in Guatemala, as recognized by the Government of the United States. The United Nations had recognized that the human rights situation had improved and that there was now no state terrorism. According to the reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association, denunciations of acts of violence against trade unionists had decreased in number. Violent acts were no longer perpetrated against trade unionists. If it were appropriate, the Minister of Labour would be ready to accept an ILO mission concerning the application of the Convention.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Ministry of Labour of Guatemala and the debate that followed. The Committee regretted to note that, despite the direct contacts mission carried out in February 1995 and the many debates that had been held in the present Committee in 1991, 1993, 1995 and 1996, the Committee of Experts continued to note serious divergencies between the legislation and the Convention. The Committee noted that a firm and lasting Peace Accord had been concluded under the auspices of the United Nations and with the participation of the ILO Office in San José, Costa Rica. The Committee expressed the sincere hope that this agreement would result in a new period of peace, social dialogue and industrial relations and would make it possible to give full effect in law and practice to this fundamental Convention, which had been ratified by Guatemala 45 years ago. The Committee also noted with interest the Government's intention to request the technical assistance of the Office once again. The Committee urged the Government urgently to adopt the necessary measures as soon as possible to eliminate in law and practice the control of the public authorities over trade union activities, the restrictions on persons who were not nationals of Guatemala from holding trade union office and the other restrictions on the exercise of the right to organize. The Committee urged the Government to transmit a detailed report to the Committee of Experts on the measures adopted to give full effect to the Convention.

Myanmar (ratification: 1955). A Government representative recalled that, in previous sessions of the International Labour Conference, information relating to the application of Convention No. 87 had been provided to the Conference Committee, some members of which had commented on the continued efforts of his Government to enact a new trade union law. He reaffirmed the interest of his Government in promoting and protecting the legitimate rights of all workers. A total of 17 labour-related laws were still in force in his country. Half of those laws had been enacted during the British colonial days, while the remaining half had been adopted after the attainment of independence nearly five decades ago. The Department of Labour under the Ministry of Labour was mainly responsible for reviewing and redrafting all laws to ensure that they were in conformity with changing circumstances. In the process of reviewing and redrafting laws, priority had been given to the Trade Union Law, the Workman's Compensation Law, the Factories Law, the Leave and Holiday Law, the Minimum Wages Law and the Employment and Training Law. Other labour laws were also scheduled to undergo the same process.

Focusing on the draft trade union law, he stated that the Department of Labour and the Office of the Attorney-General had approved the draft and submitted it to the Central Laws Scrutiny Body. After scrutinizing the draft, the Central Body had returned it to the Labour Ministry with remarks and recommendations for modifications and redrafting. One important recommendation by the Central Body was that, following the necessary drafting, the revised text should be tabled and subjected to extensive consultation with all the parties concerned, namely employers' organizations, such as the Union of Myanmar Chamber of Commerce and Industry, representatives of public and private enterprises and workers' welfare associations. Taking into consideration the recommendation of the Central Laws Scrutiny Body, which was to be implemented this year, it was hoped that it would be possible to submit the revised draft to the respective supervisory body at an appropriate time.

The Workers' members recalled that Myanmar was a persistent violator of the Convention and had therefore frequently come before the Committee. The case had been discussed in 1987, 1989, 1993, 1994, 1995 and 1996. For over 40 years, the ILO had been requesting the Government to respect the fundamental principles of freedom of association. The Committee had requested it to ensure the right of workers to freely establish and to join first-level unions, federations and confederations, without previous authorization, subject only to the rules of the organization concerned, and to freely affiliate to international workers' organizations, in accordance with Articles 2, 5 and 6 of the Convention.

Over the years, the Government had bluntly refused to cooperate with the Committee and had once again failed to supply the report requested, despite the inclusion of the case in a special paragraph last year. The case had been mentioned by the Committee in a special paragraph in 1993, 1995 and 1996 and deserved to be placed in a special paragraph once again this year. The message from the Government of Myanmar was clearly that it considered it more important to deny the workers in the country freedom of association than to live up to the obligations deriving from the Convention. This amounted to an insult to all ILO constituents and the Government rightfully deserved worldwide condemnation for its behaviour.

In 1996, the Government representative had reaffirmed his Government's firm commitment to the principles of freedom of association and to a multi-party democratic system, a free market economy, justice and human rights for all. However, the Government's conception of what this implied appeared to differ enormously from that of the Workers' members. The continued repression and violation of human rights, including the right to freedom of association and democracy, by a military regime showed that the Government had no intention whatsoever of complying with its obligations or the requests of the Committee. The Workers' members recalled that a Commission of Inquiry had been set up to investigate a complaint under article 26 of the Constitution concerning the non-observance of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). Moreover, the Government representative had requested technical assistance from the ILO on the application of Convention No. 87, but the ILO representative had been prevented by the authorities from undertaking the mission.

For some years, the Workers' members had been raising the matter of seafarers in Myanmar and had been requesting the Government to confirm that they were no longer forced to sign contracts obliging them not to contact international trade union organizations and that they were no longer intimidated if they exercised their rights in accordance with the Convention. Regrettably, the question had to be repeated once again this year.

The Workers' members expressed surprise that Myanmar had recently been admitted to become a future member of the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN). This constituted a setback for the democratic forces in Myanmar and had been criticized by the Nobel Prize winner, Aung San Suu Kyi. The Workers' members were concerned that the demands concerning respect for freedom of association in the country might be relaxed and that, in reality, the ILO Constitution might be set aside. The Declaration of Philadelphia stated that all national and international policies and measures, in particular those of an economic and financial character, should be judged and accepted only if they promoted the fundamental principles of the Organization, including freedom of expression and association. The Workers' members questioned whether the acceptance of Myanmar as a future member of ASEAN would be seen as an example of applying ILO principles with objectivity, impartiality and transparency at the regional level as had been actively advocated in the ILO by some of those Governments concerned.

In conclusion, the Workers' members urged the Government to immediately accept the right of workers to organize freely in trade unions without prior authorization and to affiliate freely with international trade union organizations. However, as no action had been taken by the Government, the Committee should express its dissatisfaction in the strongest possible terms and mention the case in a special paragraph for continued failure to implement the Convention.

The Employers' members observed that the comments made by the Committee of Experts on the case of Myanmar were getting shorter. This was due to the fact that, after repeated examinations of the case, there was almost nothing new to be said. The ILO supervisory bodies had been examining the continued non-existence of freedom of association in the country for decades. Since the early 1980s, the Conference Committee had been placing its conclusions on this case in a special paragraph of its report due to persistent violations of the Convention. When the case had been examined by the Conference Committee the previous year, the Government representative had had nothing new to report and had merely repeated his statements from previous years. There had briefly been some hope that an ILO mission might have been able to assist in addressing the problems related to application of the Convention. However, although the mission had been invited, it had not been received by the authorities in Myanmar and had not therefore been able to provide the necessary assistance. For the past 40 years it had been impossible to establish a trade union or an employers' organization without prior authorization from the national authorities and there were no federations at higher levels. In effect, there was no freedom of association in the country. Although the Government had referred in general terms to certain draft Bills on a number of issues of labour law, there had been no clear indication that any of these would lead to the development of freedom of association. Moreover, once again the Government had not submitted the requested report to the Committee of Experts. This was a very clear indication of a lack of cooperation, and indeed non-cooperation on the part of the Government. The Conference Committee was therefore bound to repeat what it had stated last year and express its regret even more profoundly that, despite its observations, not the slightest progress had been made. Its conclusions should be included once again in a special paragraph of the Committee's report.

The Workers' member of Japan pointed out that this was one of the oldest and most serious cases of violation of Convention No. 87 before this Committee. The Government had accepted to receive a direct contacts mission to the country. Its subsequent failure to do so showed a complete lack of respect for the supervisory machinery and the requirements of the Convention. He further pointed out that freedom of association could not exist without freedom of speech, freedom of expression and freedom of assembly all of which were absent in Myanmar. People who had participated in peaceful demonstrations were regularly arrested and detained, and more than 2,000 had been arrested in 1996. Students and fellow workers who participated in these demonstrations were unfortunately forced to seek asylum. He insisted that the Government bring, without delay, its legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention, and announce a scheduled time frame for doing so. He urged the Committee to have Myanmar placed in a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of Pakistan regretted that the Government representative had not bothered to reply to the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the prevalence of the denial of freedom of association in Myanmar. Basic human rights, including freedom of association, as incorporated in ILO core Conventions, were fundamental to all persons and if they were denied these rights, in any country, no social justice could exist. He, along with the Workers' members, fully supported that freedom of association principles be immediately respected in Myanmar.

The Workers' member of the United States stated that the absolute denial of freedom of association must be viewed in the context of the absolute denial of all basic human rights and freedoms by the military regime. Freedom of association received particular attention, however, for the leaders of the military regime understood all too well that freedom of associaion — the right to come together, to organize — was a necessary prerequisite for the protection of all other rights. This case came before the Committee only a few weeks after 316 followers of Nobel Peace Prize Laureate, Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, were arrested in order to keep them from meeting with each other on 27 May, the seventh anniversary of the landslide victory of her party, the National League for Democracy, in national elections. He pointed out that this case had been examined by the Committee of Experts and this Committee on numerous occasions, for many reasons. The most obvious was the hope that, despite the long history of no progress, the unrelenting pressure of the ILO to ensure that the Government respect its obligation, taken together with a growing international campaign to force the military regime to step down and allow civilian self-government, would one day begin to have an impact. Secondly, despite the fact that nothing of substance had been heard from the Government representative thus far, this was yet another opportunity to communicate directly to the representatives of the military regime, the condemnation of the international community. Finally, it provided this Committee with an opportunity to bring to the attention of the Committee of Experts even more information on the violations of freedom of association by the military regime.

The speaker wished to ask the Government representative, given the vague statements that the latter had made earlier on, about the regime's respect for the rights of workers in Myanmar, and why the Free Trade Unions of Burma (FTUB) was not allowed to function inside the country. Moreover, he wondered why workers who were identified with the FTUB were under constant surveillance by the police and the military intelligence, and why they lived in permanent fear of arrest and torture. He strongly supported the view of both Employers' and Workers' members that this Committee had to find a way to express its extreme displeasure over the lack of progress and cooperation from the military regime in even stronger terms than the previous year. The Committee's conclusions should be contained, once again, in a special paragraph of its report as a case of continued failure to apply the Convention.

The Government member of Denmark, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Iceland, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and the United Kingdom, expressed his deep regret that the Committee, once again, had to examine the violations by Myanmar of the Convention. In addition to the fact that the Government had not sent a report to the Committee of Experts, it regrettably had not been possible for an ILO mission to visit the country, due to the lack of cooperation on the part of the Government. Although the Government representative had told the Committee, the previous year, that it was his Government's intention to apply the Convention, nothing had happened with regard to the right for workers in Myanmar to establish and join independent trade unions. Reference also had to be made to Resolution 1997/64 of the United Nations Human Rights Commission, which had been adopted by consensus. The Government of Myanmar had been asked to "fulfil its obligations as a State party to the Freedom of Association Convention No. 87 of the ILO, and to cooperate more closely with the ILO". He firmly hoped, that it would be possible to agree on a date for a mission to Myanmar in the near future, that it would be undertaken before the next Conference and that the Government would take the necessary measures to ensure fully the right to organize and join independent trade unions.

The Government member of the United States stated that the situation of the rights of workers in Myanmar was, quite simply and very sadly, deplorable. There were no functioning trade unions. Workers continued to be unable to organize freely. Efforts by the ILO to offer technical assistance had proved fruitless and were at present suspended. In addition, seafarers from Myanmar who had attempted to receive fair treatment and wages for their services on international vessels were intimidated and harassed when they returned home. Those who did speak of free trade unions, dared not return to their country for fear of imprisonment by the Government and were obliged to live in exile. Although Myanmar had freely ratified the Convention in 1955, the Committee of Experts and this Committee were obliged to conclude that it was not applied and that freedom of association just did not exist in Myanmar. There were no adequate explanations for this horrible situation. The only appropriate answer was swift and concrete action to fully restore trade union rights in Myanmar. In the meantime, he joined the overwhelming call in the Committee for the strongest possible conclusions in this case.

The Workers' member of Greece invited the members of the Committee who were not familiar with this case to consult the reports adopted by this Committee during its 1994, 1995 and 1996 sessions. In those reports, the Committee had noted the commitment of the Government to bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Government representative had just made the same statement again this year. The Employers' members were quite right when they stated that everything had been thoroughly discussed regarding this case. The Committee of Experts also noted the absence of any new element. The list of delegates for this Conference revealed an interesting aspect of the trade union situation: the Workers' member appeared in that list in his capacity of controller of oil wells and sites in the petroleum company. Although Myanmar was a third world country, it had an abundance of resources. By forbidding workers and citizens to organize themselves, a minority was only trying to prevent the majority from organizing itself to defend its own interests. The means available to incite a change of attitude by the Government were unfortunately limited to the adoption of a special paragraph. As we move towards the twenty-first century, other means should be envisaged to deal with such a serious case where a regime did not respect the most fundamental human rights.

The Government representative indicated that an interesting dialogue had taken place in the Committee for improvement in the application of the Convention, both in law and in practice. He stressed that the present Government was building the country into a peaceful, modern and developed nation, after having laid down clear-cut political, economic and social objectives, which reflected the aspirations of its citizens and the objective situation of the country. In this context, efforts for national reconsolidation and the emergence of an enduring new State constitution were being met with success as a result of the goodwill of the Government. It was to be recalled that Myanmar was a union of more than 100 ethnic groups, and that the Government, through its goodwill, had been successful in bringing 15 out of 16 armed groups back into the legal fold. This meant that peace reigned in the country after almost half a century of internal conflict that had held back development.

He stressed that the other important task to which his Government was firmly committed to was the establishment of a genuine multi-party democratic system and the enjoyment of the principles of justice, liberty and equality. At this juncture, although there were no trade union organizations in the actual sense of the term, workers' welfare associations in various industries and establishments were functioning on a tripartite basis. There were more than 2,000 associations of this kind. Workers' supervisory committees at the township level also looked after matters relating to industrial relations. These were clear indications that the Government never neglected the well-being and welfare of workers. The labour administration system was as strong as ever in terms of protecting the legislative rights of workers. There was no doubt that trade unions' rights would prevail within the framework of a new constitution. Stability and national reconsolidation were the prerequisites to reach this desired goal in the shortest possible time. His Government had learned from the painful events that had recently occurred in some countries that hasty changes lead to disorder and instability that resulted in suffering for the citizens. Therefore, it was making efforts at gradual and stable progress towards the goal of a genuine democratic society.

The Committee took note of the statements made by the Government representative and of the wide discussion which had taken place. It recalled that this case has been discussed by the Committee on numerous occasions in 1987, 1989, 1993, 1994, 1995 and 1996. In 1995, the Committee put its conclusions in a special paragraph of its general report and, in 1996 it also mentioned this case in a section of its general report highlighting the continued failure to implement, taking into account that for many years and in spite of various appeals, serious discrepancies with the Convention continued to exist in legislation and practice. The Committee could not but deplore the fact that no Government report had been received by the Committee of Experts and expressed its profound regret that serious divergencies between the national legislation and the Convention continued to exist. It also deplored the fact that the Government failed to cooperate. Being greatly concerned with the total absence of progress in the application of the Convention, the Committee once again urged the Government to adopt, as a priority, the measures and mechanisms necessary to guarantee, in legislation and practice, to all workers and employers, without any distinction and any prior authorization, the right to join organizations of their own choosing to protect their interests. The Committee insisted also on the need for those organizations to have the right to affiliate with federations and confederations and with the international organizations, without any interference from the public authorities. The Committee expressed a firm hope that substantial progress in the application of the Convention might be noted in the very near future and urged the Government to supply a detailed report to the Committee of Experts. The Committee decided that its conclusions would figure in a special paragraph of its report and to mention this case among cases of continued failure to implement Convention No. 87.

Nigeria (ratification: 1960). A Government representative noted that the Committee had shown understanding of the cases that it had examined concerning several member States. He expressed confidence in the objectives of the ILO, especially as they related to human rights and social justice. His Government was deeply committed to acting in consonance with the Convention, which it had ratified in 1960. On previous occasions when the case had been examined by the Committee, the Government had emphasized the threat to internal security, which had placed national living standards in great danger. Nevertheless, the Government had not prevented the trade unions from conducting elections at the unit, branch and zonal level. These elections had been carried out successfully by the country's trade unions without any interference by the Government. With regard to trade union elections at the national level, the Government had appealed to the country's workers to enter into consultations with the object of holding such elections within the shortest possible time. In this respect, the most critical factor was the commitment of workers to the full democracy of the labour movement. Any necessary amendments to the legislation relating to trade unions would be adopted in accordance with the provisions that had already been incorporated in the constitutions of workers' organizations.

With reference to the matters raised by the Committee of Experts, he noted that the Decree and Order adopted in August 1996 had been enacted as a result of a six-month dispute which had affected the country's universities. Under these provisions, a failure to abide by negotiation and arbitration procedures constituted an unfair labour practice. In this respect, he stated that the Convention called upon trade unions to observe the laws of the land. He added that recognition had been restored to the Non-Academic Staff Union of Educational and Associated Institutions.

With regard to the restructuring of the previous 41 registered industrial unions into 29 trade unions affiliated to the central labour organization, he informed the Committee that this measure had been taken as a result of a request by the Nigerian Labour Congress (NLC) to strengthen the collective bargaining machinery. The proposal had been referred to the National Labour Advisory Council, which was a tripartite body, the recommendations of which had been incorporated into Decree No. 4 of 1996. The principal purpose of this measure had been to develop strong and viable industrial unions. In this context, he noted that, in accordance with the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), which had been ratified by his country in 1994, the collective bargaining system was effective and had given rise to no complaints by workers' or employers' organizations. While the new measure clearly stated the names of the 29 industrial unions concerned, the registration of the former unions had not been cancelled. Trade unions were therefore recognized in Nigerian law and suffered from no let or hindrance in their activities. This was in accordance with the provision of the 1979 Constitution, which stated that the security and welfare of all people was the primary purpose of the Government. The enactment of Decree No. 4 of 1996 had therefore been based on the need to uphold public safety, the law and morality in order to promote social dialogue and harmony. As a result of these measures, Nigerian workers now enjoyed a degree of independence and freedom that they had not known for many years. It was necessary to consolidate these gains in order to enable workers to assume full responsibility for their affairs. The new legislative measures referred to by the Committee of Experts had therefore been adopted with the best of intentions after very close consultation with the persons concerned, in accordance with the Convention, and reflected the wishes of the trade unions. He thanked the Committee for its understanding and assured it that his Government was willing to play its role in expanding and promoting workers' organizations.

The Workers' members recalled that this case had been the subject of a special paragraph in the report of the Committee in 1995, as well as a paragraph in 1996 which had noted with profound concern the continued failure by the Nigerian Government over a number of years to eliminate the serious violations of the Convention.

Since then, the Government had failed to transmit a report to the Committee of Experts. Although the Government representative had referred to a number of steps that had been taken subsequently, these merely served to further highlight the violations of the Convention. The Committee of Experts had noted with deep regret a serious deterioration in the trade union situation in Nigeria. Decrees Nos. 9 and 10 of 1994, dissolving the executive councils of the Nigerian Labour Congress (NLC), the National Union of Petroleum and Natural Gas Workers (KNAPPING) and the Petroleum and Natural Gas Senior Staff Association of Nigeria (PENGASSAN), had not been repealed and these unions were still being run by the administrators appointed by the Government. A number of Decrees adopted recently further aggravated the situation of trade unions in the teaching sector, universities, hospitals and research institutes. Decree No. 29 of 1996 prohibited trade unions from affiliating with any international organizations. Moreover, the Government had reinforced the system of trade union monopoly set out in the law through Decree No. 4 of 1996, which had once again restructured trade unions.

In Case No. 1793, the Committee on Freedom of Association had continued to call for the release of trade unionists who had been imprisoned since 1994 for having participated in legitimate trade union activities. It had also called for the repeal of Decrees Nos. 9 and 10 and for the holding of trade union elections without interference by the public authorities and for the lifting of the suspension of the automatic check-off of trade union dues. The Committee on Freedom of Association had also regretted the lack of cooperation by the Government in responding to the repeated calls for it to authorize an ILO mission at the earliest possible date. It had later reiterated its request in even stronger terms. (See the 306th report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, March 1997, paragraphs 45 to 47.)

The Workers' members requested the Government to indicate whether it had the real intention of receiving a direct contacts mission from the ILO. They also sought assurances that the Government would quickly reinstate the right of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing, to freely elect their representatives and to formulate their programmes without interference from the public authorities.

In conclusion, the Workers' members reminded the Committee that, despite the fact that Nigeria was a member of the Governing Body, the horrors of the judicial murders of Ken Sarawiwa and others were still fresh in everyone's minds. They therefore called on the Nigerian Government to take urgent measures in both law and practice to allow Nigerian workers to establish and join unions of their own choosing, to structure those unions as they saw fit and to pursue their trade union activities without government interference. Furthermore, it should release all detained trade unionists immediately. The Committee should include its conclusions on Nigeria in a special paragraph.

The Employers' members deplored the fact that, despite the weighty concern with which the Committee of Experts and this Committee had treated this case during the 1980s, there had not been a single improvement, but instead the situation had worsened. In the last few years, very serious measures had been taken to dissolve by a Decree of 1994 the executive committees of three trade unions, replaced by government-appointed administrators. This was a clear violation of freedom of association. In addition, new Decrees impeded the union affiliation of teaching staff. By decree or legislation, 41 unions were restructured into 29 and the National Labour Congress was created. This trade union monopoly was imposed by the Government and the NLC was the only central union designated by name in law, in clear violation of the Convention. The restructurings preceding the union movement were revoked and a Decree of 1996 went much further in the restrictions it imposed. They regretted that after so much time freedom of association did not exist in Nigeria. The total lack of collaboration of the Government with the Committee of Experts, which noted that no report had been received this year, and with the Committee on Freedom of Association, as well as the negative response towards accepting an ILO mission, amounted to a very serious situation. The moment for change had arrived and the Employers' members supported the inclusion of this case in a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of Nigeria, on the subject of Decrees Nos. 9 and 10 of 1994, stated that a number of Nigerian workers had been involved in the promulgation of these Decrees. Moreover, as soon as the NLC had been dissolved, certain trade unionists had submitted proposals for new executives of the organization, instead of joining together to accept or condemn the Decrees. He therefore emphasized the need for ILO educational programmes and would welcome an ILO mission.

He added that Nigerian workers had accepted Decree No. 4 of 1996 and noted that the constitutions of industrial unions in Nigeria agreed with the provision. Those who opposed the Decree did so because it prevented persons who were not members of the occupation from holding elective office in industrial unions. However, similar provisions had been in existence since 1973. It was therefore clear that their opposition was based on selfish motives. This had not prevented them from touring the country and calling for a boycott of the NLC election. This was another area in which Nigerian workers called for ILO assistance to help trade union members who were genuinely interested in the democratization of the trade union movement and the improvement of workers' welfare.

In view of the evident duplication of certain industrial unions, which had even resulted in court cases, Nigerian workers had started moves in 1993 to consolidate the trade union movement and had been helped in this aim by the Government. With a view to the democratization of the NLC, many meetings of industrial unions and the state councils of the NLC had been held. The Government had given the go-ahead to the process and the workers of Nigeria therefore hoped that the Government and the ILO would assist them in the realization of their dream.

The Workers' member of the United States strongly condemned the gross violation of human rights by the Nigerian military regime, including serious breaches of freedom of association principles. He recalled the observation of the Committee of Experts according to which it noted that there had been no progress made in bringing legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention. In fact, he added that the trade union situation continued to deteriorate seriously. The most immediate concern was the welfare of those trade unionists unjustly imprisoned without charge. The continued illegal detention of union leaders, Frank Kokori and Milton Dabibi, in conditions where they were not able to communicate with their family members, access proper medical care, or consult with their attorneys, was an outrage. In addition, it appeared that, in early May 1997, Mr. Kokori's home was vandalized and his wife and son were roughed up and threatened, shortly after she publicly spoke out calling for her husband's release. With regard to legislative measures taken, Decree No. 29, implemented in secret in October 1996, sanctioned criminal and monetary penalties on any trade union or individual trade union activist maintaining connections to any international trade union organization. It served to nullify existing affiliations and banned any future arrangements in this regard without the expressed approval of the administrator of the Nigerian Labour Congress (NLC). It was difficult for him to reconcile the Government's version of events with the observations of the Committee of Experts and the facts they reflected. The Conference Committee had to request the military regime in the strongest terms to immediately release all trade unionists imprisoned for their trade union activities, to allow them access to adequate medical care until they were released, and to ensure that they were allowed to meet with their families and their attorneys. He concluded by fully supporting the position of the Workers' members in expressing extreme displeasure over the lack of progress and cooperation from the regime in a special paragraph of the Conference Committee's report.

The Workers' member of Colombia stated that in Nigeria freedom of association did not exist in practical terms, and that the Government did not have the political will to fulfil the commitments assumed when it had ratified the Convention which implied the guarantee of the right of Nigerian workers to organize and bargain collectively. The acts and laws denounced by the spokesperson for the Workers' members demanded an urgent response and an official warning to guarantee trade union rights and respect the forms of organization of workers without intervening or interfering. He supported the inclusion of the case in a special paragraph.

The Government member of Finland, on behalf of the Governments of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland, expressed their deepest concern with regard to the serious violations of human rights in Nigeria. They deeply deplored the persistent deterioration of trade union rights, described by the Committee on Freedom of Association as a "systematic approach to diminishing trade union rights". The Governments shared the deep concern of both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association about the trade union situation in Nigeria since no progress had been made in spite of the comments that the ILO had been making for several years. Therefore, they urged the authorities in Nigeria to guarantee the effective enjoyment of human rights at the workplace and requested that immediate and concrete steps be taken to fulfil the commitments entered into by ratifying Convention No. 87.

The Workers' member of Sweden, speaking on behalf of the Workers' members of the Nordic countries, endorsed the urgent appeal made by the Committee of Experts to the Government of Nigeria to comply with the Convention and cease interference in internal trade union matters. He expressed deep concern at the deterioration in the situation and called for the immediate release of detained trade unionists. He recalled that, despite being mentioned in a special paragraph of the Committee's report in 1995, Nigeria had become a member of the Governing Body and simultaneously achieved another special paragraph in 1996. Some governments might have thought that, as a result of its membership of the Governing Body, Nigeria would change its practices and comply with the fundamental human right of freedom of association. In his view, membership of such a body implied an obligation to act on behalf of all the members of the organization concerned and to defend and promote the basic values and principles of that organization. Unfortunately, Nigeria seemed to have a different view. He therefore urged the Government of Nigeria to acquaint itself with the ILO's principles on freedom of association. In this respect, he noted the Government's failure to fulfil its promise made in 1996 to repeal Decrees Nos. 9 and 10. Furthermore, it had also failed to comply with the request made by the Workers' member of Nigeria in the same year to release Mr. Kokori and Chief Milton Dabibi, who were being held in jail without charges or trial. In conclusion, the Workers' members of the Nordic countries supported the inclusion of this case in a special paragraph of the Committee's report.

The Workers' member of Tunisia recalled that, since 1994, the trade union situation in Nigeria had been consistently worsening, in particular because of the measures taken by the Government to shackle the trade union movement in the country. The Decrees which the Government had adopted aimed at splitting the trade unions and constituted a serious attack on freedom of association. More precisely, the Decrees adopted over the last few years were in flagrant violation of the provisions of this Convention. The measures taken by the Government, such as the dissolution of the legitimate Nigerian Labour Congress (NLC), its appointment of an administrator to oversee trade union affairs, and the ban on the right to organize of workers in sectors designated as essential, demonstrated the Government's wish to attack and annihilate all free and independent trade unionism in Nigeria. The general climate of social tension and violence, together with persecution, arrest, harassment, torture and assassinations, was in stark contrast to the requirements for the respect and effective implementation of the Convention. Finally, he supported the severe comments made by the Committee of Experts and by the Workers' members.

The Government member of the United Kingdom, also speaking on behalf of the Governments of Germany and the Netherlands, fully supported the statement made by the Government member of Finland. The Governments on whose behalf she was speaking were deeply concerned at the promulgation of Decrees which had severely and unacceptably curtailed trade union activities in Nigeria. The continued abuse of basic workers' rights, including the detention without charges of trade union leaders, was totally unacceptable. In view of the serious concern of the Committee in this case, as noted in two special paragraphs, she expressed extreme disappointment that the ILO mission had still not been able to visit the country. Such a mission was crucial to enable all sides to set out their concerns and discuss how best to improve the situation. It was imperative that an ILO mission take place as a matter of urgency. She also urged the Nigerian authorities to take immediate steps to release all detained trade union leaders and noted that resolution 1997/53 of the United Nations Human Rights Commission had already called upon the Nigerian Government to ensure the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms by releasing trade union leaders. By such action, the Nigerian Government would be able to demonstrate whether it had any serious commitment to the principles of the ILO.

The Workers' member of Pakistan emphasized the gravity of the case, in which the Government continued to violate fundamental principles that had been recognized from the very beginning of the ILO as one of the cornerstones of peace and social justice and as being essential to sustained progress. The Government representative had claimed that the trade union legislation had been changed on the recommendation of a tripartite board and that the NLC and other organizations had been dissolved for reasons of public order. He could only implore the Government representative to show respect for principles that went to the heart of the ILO. No member State could overturn those principles on the basis of mere consultation or interpret them in its own manner. He explained that the restriction placed on the employment of full-time officials by trade unions considerably weakened the position of workers' representatives by making them dependent on an employer for their livelihood. In view of the very serious violations of most of the basic provisions of the Convention and the deterioration in the situation of trade unions in the country, the Government should take immediate action to lift the restrictions in question, release detained trade unionists and cease interfering in trade union affairs. He supported the call to place the Committee's conclusions on this case in a special paragraph.

The Government member of the United States recalled that Nigeria was participating at the Conference this year without having taken any steps whatsoever to improve its application of the Convention or to provide Nigerian workers with basic, universally recognized human and trade union rights. If anything, the situation had deteriorated. Nigeria's lack of regard for its international commitments, and indeed its own citizens, was deplorable. The entire international community was frustrated with Nigeria's failure to respect human rights, as illustrated by the recent appointment by the United Nations Human Rights Commission of a human rights rapporteur for Nigeria. Trade unionists all over the world were justifiably pessimistic about the Government's intentions in view of its complete stranglehold over free and independent trade unionism in the country. The Committee had no choice but to criticize Nigeria's failure to apply the Convention in the strongest possible terms.

The Workers' member of South Africa recalled the statement by the Workers' member of his country in the Committee's discussion of this case in 1995. He had referred to the apartheid period in South Africa and expressed his empathy and solidarity with Nigerian workers in their struggle against the basic denial of human and trade union rights. However, the situation had worsened since 1995. The Nigerian military government was guilty of gross interference in trade union affairs and had run the NLC for three years. It had forcibly merged the NLC's 41 affiliates into 29 unions. Frank Kokori and Milton Dabibi had been detained without charges or trials and he called upon the military government to inform the Committee of the evidence against them. He added that the Government had adopted legal provisions with the aim of bringing independent trade unionism to its knees in Nigeria. Decree No. 29 of 1996 banned the NLC and its affiliated unions from becoming members of international trade union organizations. He recalled that the Government had introduced a similar measure in 1989, but had withdrawn it in 1991 following widespread condemnation by the ILO and the international trade union movement. The increasing denial of trade union rights, civil liberties and democracy in Nigeria meant that the case should once again be included in a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom noted that the Committee of Experts had expressed its concern at the situation in Nigeria in very strong terms. Time and again, the Committee on Freedom of Association had clearly stated that freedom of association could only be exercised under conditions in which fundamental human rights, including in particular those relating to human life and personal safety, were fully respected and guaranteed. This concern had been reflected by other United Nations bodies, including the General Assembly and the Human Rights Commission, as well as by the Organization of African Unity, the European Union and respected non-governmental organizations such as Amnesty International. Nevertheless, human rights violations continued in the country, along with the continuing repression of trade unions and trade unionists. She drew attention to the impact of Decree No. 29 of 1996, adopted in October 1996, but only made public at the beginning of 1997. This Decree empowered the Minister of Labour to cancel the registration of any of the 29 NLC affiliates if he considered their activities to be at variance with the national interest. Although trade unions could appeal against such a decision to the Minister, the decision could not be challenged in the courts, in clear violation of Article 4 of the Convention, so that even though the Experts had noted a deterioration in the situation in their Report, there had been introduced yet further violations since the Experts had reported. With regard to the detention of trade union leaders, she emphasized that the situation in Nigeria was intolerable. The judicial murders of Ken Sarawiwa and the Ogoni tribesmen remained indelibly imprinted on everyone's minds. The thoughts of all trade unionists throughout the world went out to their colleagues who were isolated in Nigerian jails without charges or trial, denied health care and the most basic rights, including contact with their families and lawyers. She therefore called upon the Government to answer questions that had already been raised in 1996. What were the charges on which these trade unionists were being held? What was the evidence? Why were they being denied access to lawyers? Why had they been refused medical attention? Why had they not been granted family visits? Finally, she requested the Government to state whether it would now set a date for the ILO direct contacts mission called for since 1995 to visit the country and the detained trade unionists.

The Government member of Canada expressed her country's deepest concern with regard to the persistent and unacceptable deterioration of trade union rights in Nigeria, as described in the report of the Committee of Experts. Since the Conference Committee addressed these issues in June 1996, additional Decrees, restricting further the right of trade unions to organize and elect representatives in full freedom, had been adopted by the Nigerian Government in total disregard for and disrespect of the recommendations of this Committee and the fundamental rights of Nigerian workers. Moreover, in spite of concerns expressed, in 1996, by the Conference Committee with regard to the illegal detention of trade union leaders, and the recent resolution of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (1997/53) urging the Nigerian Government to release all detained trade union leaders, no progress had been made in this regard. She urged the Nigerian Government to make arrangements, at the earliest possible date, for an ILO mission to examine the issues under discussion in this Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association, and to take immediate steps to release all detained trade union leaders, and to bring its law and practice into conformity with the provisions of Convention No. 87.

The Workers' member of Swaziland reaffirmed the fact that the Government was fully aware of what was expected of it as a party to the Convention for 38 years and as a member of the Governing Body. Nevertheless, it deliberately continued to flout the dictates of human dignity and social justice. As a member of the Governing Body, Nigeria was supposed to lead by example, but was doing just the opposite in denying the fundamental trade union rights and perpetrating malicious arrests, detentions and disappearances. It set up arbitrary courts with the power to impose death penalties, while denying access to lawyers. Its interference with trade union rights extended to their dissolution and the abolition of the check-off system. It extended the list of essential services at will to include such professions as teachers and bank workers. Champions of oppression could not at the same time be champions of social justice. The current dictatorship and intolerant climate was not a conducive environment for human and trade union rights. Moreover, by claiming that Nigerian workers were in agreement with the measures taken by the Government, the Worker representative from Nigeria had made himself an accomplice to the arbitrary measures committed in that country. True trade unionists were not impressed by government-sponsored workers' representatives who supported injustice.

The Government representative assured the Committee that his Government would take account of all views that had been expressed in good faith. However, he noted that the comments made concerning a lack of cooperation were mainly related to the proposed ILO mission. The Government favoured the proposal, but a mutually convenient date needed to be agreed upon and consultations should continue on this subject. He denied that Decree No. 29 of 1996 restricted effective trade union organization in Nigeria. Moreover, although it established the prescribed procedures to be adopted for affiliation to international organizations, it did not prohibit such affiliation. Decrees Nos. 9 and 10 of 1994 were transitional measures which would be repealed when the respective trade union elections had been held. He regretted that the Committee was not fully informed of the situation in his country. Some of the information on which comments had been made was already out of date. But the Committee had been able to note that Nigerian workers were happy with the reforms and gave them their unequivocal support. He suspected that a visit by an ILO mission to Nigeria would confirm his comments. As on other occasions, if errors were to be found in the application of the Convention, the necessary measures would be taken in good faith. However, there could be no doubt at the present time concerning the adequacy of the freedom of association enjoyed by Nigerian workers with their registered trade unions grouped into a single central organization. It was regrettable that three industrial unions were still run by appointed administrators, but urgent steps were being taken to redress the situation. Of the 62 registered associations in the country, 59 were run by their freely elected leaders. He emphasized that the objective of the Government in its reforms was to place Nigerian worker's organizations on an enhanced footing in order to contribute to the best possible interaction between workers and society at large. He had taken note of all the comments that had been made and requested the Committee to exercise patience and understanding. His Government was committed to the full achievement of the ideals of the ILO. The trade union measures that had been introduced were in the overall interests of the workers and would lead to an improvement in the overall security situation. He emphasized that workers had a major role to play in the development of the country and that the current administration was committed to ensuring that no constraints were placed on labour to prevent it from playing an effective part as one of the pillars of production.

The Workers' members pointed out that, despite his lengthy intervention, the Government representative had not replied to the questions raised by the members of the Committee. Very clear answers needed to be provided to these questions. In view of the gravity of the case and the long history and overwhelming evidence of gross violations of the Convention, they called for it to be placed in a special paragraph for continued failure to implement the Convention.

The Employers' members reiterated the position they had expressed earlier.

The Committee noted the statement of the Government representative and of the debate which followed. The Committee set out its great concern that, although this case had been the subject of a special paragraph in 1995 and 1996, no concrete progress had been made to date in relation to the very grave trade union situation in the country. Both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association had profoundly deplored the gravity of the situation of trade unions in Nigeria. The Committee once again urged the Government to urgently derogate not only Decrees Nos. 9 and 10 of 1994, concerning dissolution of the executive councils of trade unions persecuted by the public authorities, but also to nullify the Decree of January 1996, which fixed the number of trade unions for each category of profession, and which reinforced the current trade union monopoly. The Committee lamented that notwithstanding the guarantees given by the Government, it had not replied to the request of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Governing Body to accept an ILO mission to the country with the object of examining the questions raised in this case. The Committee called on the Government to accept without delay this mission in order to examine the trade union situation in Nigeria, including the situation of the imprisoned union leaders. The Committee urged the Government to ensure full respect of civil liberties, essential for the exercise of freedom of association. The Committee expressed the firm hope that it would be able to count on important progress in the very near future and asked the Government to send a detailed report to examine anew next year the situation. The Committee decided to include this case in a special paragraph of its report and to mention it as a case of continued failure to implement the Convention.

The Government representative expressed apprehension at the suggestion that no progress had been made with regard to the application of the Convention. He had already explained the overriding need for basic reforms in the Nigerian labour movement. He noted in this respect that the same applied to many other countries. He reaffirmed his belief that the ILO was the organization best suited to assist Nigeria in achieving the basic aims of these reforms, which were to the advantage of all concerned.

Swaziland (ratification: 1978). The Government supplied the following information:

With regard to Article 2 of the Convention, the status of the Prison Staff is comparable to that of the Royal Swaziland Police and the Swaziland Defence Force: all three are considered as part of the armed forces.

The obligation for workers to organize along industry lines is not known to pose any functional problems and no complaints have been submitted by organizations so far. There is a very small labour force in Swaziland and the multiplicity of unions within the same industry may interfere with the strength of labour unions. The risk facing unions in Swaziland as regards multiplicity is that some unions may exist on paper only, with no real power. Similarly, the power of the Commissioner of Labour to refuse to register a union is due to the small size of the labour force.

There has been a change since the entry into force of the Industrial Relations Act, 1966. Section 41(1) of the Act only provides for consultation of the Minister as opposed to seeking his authorization, which was the case under the 1980 legislation.

With regard to Article 3 of the Convention, the limitation on the activities of federations is necesarry to avoid jurisdictional conflicts between federations and unions. Limits on carrying out political activities are a question of degree. According to the terms of Section 42(1) of the Industrial Relations Act, 1996, federations are entitled to express views on any matter of public administration and public policy. Beyond this point, however, federations risk violating state security-oriented legislation.

Concerning the prohibition of strike action in the postal and public services, this is due to the importance of these services. The teaching service, however, has been removed from the list of essential services (Section 73(6)(a) of the Industrial Relations Act, 1996).

As in any country, the national interest is of paramount importance. The Minister, however, is not the final authority in determining the national interest: his perception of national interest has to undergo the test of the court (Section 70 of the Industrial Relations Act, 1996).

With regard to Section 12 of the 1973 Decree on Meetings and Demonstrations, it is not the intention of this Decree to restrict labour organizations which operate as labour organizations (see also Section 40(2) of the Industrial Relations Act, 1996).

The Industrial Relations Bill of 1995 has now been enacted. The Employment Amendment Bill is still before Parliament.

In addition, a Government representative, the Minister of Labour and Public Service, reaffirmed his Government's commitment to upholding the principles of the ILO as enshrined in its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. He supported the sentiments expressed by various delegations that had reiterated the need for strengthening the supervisory machinery for the sake of realizing the goal of social justice. There was an equal need to strengthen the ILO's advisory services in order for the constituents to reap the maximum benefit of their membership in the Organization. Ratification of standards in itself was not enough since, after ratification, countries needed to implement them. Of the 31 Conventions ratified by Swaziland, his country had implemented them all, although some discrepancies had been observed. He referred to the written information provided to the Committee. Referring to the observation of the Committee of Experts on the extent to which the Industrial Relations Act, 1996, was found wanting in relation to the Convention, he had noted, with great interest, that it acknowledged that his Government had tried to some extent to bring the law and practice into line with the Committee's previous comments on the legislation, by removing the teaching service from the essential services list. At the same time, some discrepancies had been observed which needed to be rectified. In a document prepared for a meeting of the Labour Advisory Board due to take place on 27 June 1997, his Government would bring these points to the attention of that Board in an effort to bring the recommendations already proposed by the Labour Advisory Board into conformity with ILO standards as much as practice allowed. This arrangement was in keeping with the assurances he had given during the 268th Session of the Governing Body during which he had stated that his Government had no aversion to any proposal to amend the current legislation. His Government was committed to social dialogue and believed that all doors to social dialogue should be open for all concerned. The Prime Minister had indicated that the Industrial Relations Act would be amended if it threatened the nation's peace. This policy statement was later drafted into the Government's Economic and Social Reform Agenda, which was a reform programme with specific deadlines. If all went well and representatives of both capital and labour cooperated with the legislative reform programme, a Bill would be ready by the end of August 1997. The speaker encouraged the Office to consider focusing technical cooperation in his country as a matter of urgency. In this regard, a tripartite meeting of the Swaziland delegation was scheduled in Geneva on 16 June 1997, to be chaired by a senior official of the ILO, and to form part of an ongoing process of consultation and assistance which had begun earlier in the year when his Government's attention had been drawn to the discrepancies in the Industrial Relations Act. It was to be hoped that such interaction would go a long way towards addressing the situation through constructive dialogue.

The Workers' members pointed out that the previous year they had noted that this was one of the most serious cases before the Committee. It was therefore of grave concern that a further deterioration rather than an improvement had occurred. The climate of fear, intimidation and harassment of trade unionists continued. In its observation, the Committee of Experts had noted that the 1996 Industrial Relations Act not only perpetuated most of the previous discrepancies between the legislation and the Convention, but contained new provisions which contravened even further some of the core requirements of the principles of freedom of association enshrined in Convention No. 87. The Act imposed penal sanctions for legitimate trade union activities. Section 30 of the Act granted the Labour Commissioner the power to refuse registration of a trade union if a union already existed in that sector. Moreover, the Act prohibited federations from calling rallies or mass meetings, all of which was in violation of the principles of freedom of association. The Committee of Experts made explicit mention of section 40(3) of the Act which prohibited a federation or any of its officers from causing or inciting the cessation or slowdown of work or economic activity upon punishment of imprisonment. Equally severe penalties applied to organizations or office holders calling for, organizing, or giving financial support to strikes in essential services. However, the Act gave a broad definition of essential services and the Minister of Labour had unilateral powers to amend this definition. The Attorney-General could apply for an order to stop a strike and the Minister of Labour could apply to ban a strike on the basis of national interest which was not defined. The Act severely violated the right to organize and to strike which was clearly contrary to the decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association which had established that no one should be deprived of their freedom or be subject to penal sanctions for the mere fact of organizing or participating in a peaceful strike. The Government had introduced this Act without any direct consultation with the social partners. Furthermore, when a tripartite forum rapidly approved a protocol containing 62 unanimously agreed amendments to the Bill, the Government took no heed and had its own original version of the legislation adopted. The Workers' members noted that, according to the direct contacts mission, the Government had been unable to give any convincing explanation for the refusal to amend the legislation so as to take account of the subsequent proposals of the Labour Advisory Board submitted during March 1996. These proposals were substantially similar to those contained in the tripartite protocol. In addition to this new Act, there were other legislative provisions which violated the requirements of Convention No. 87. The 1973 Decree on meetings and demonstrations restricted the right of organizations to hold meetings and demonstrations. Under the Public Order Act, 1963, police permission was needed for certain meetings and public gatherings. Moreover, the police could attend union meetings. Recent events gave cause for great concern. In January 1997, the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU) called a stay-away in an attempt to put pressure on the Government to negotiate 27 demands which related, inter alia, to economic, labour, social and affirmative action issues and called for the lifting of the state of emergency, imposed since 1973, which remained in force. Tripartite discussions had agreed that immediate action could be taken on 16 of these 27 demands if the political will to do so was there. The Committee on Freedom of Association had decided that the two actions taken in support of the 27 demands — one in January 1996 and another in January 1997 — constituted legitimate trade union activity. It had considered that the declaration of illegality concerning these national strikes, taken in protest against the social and labour consequences of the Government's policy, constituted serious violations of freedom of association.

The Workers' members outlined other infringements, in practice, of the Convention: between the night of 31 January-1 February, 1997, four leaders of the SFTU were arrested under section 12 of the Public Order Act, 1963, on charges related to intimidation, for which bail was not granted. All were subsequently acquitted. In dismissing the case, it was reported that the judge used harsh words to the effect that there had never been a case to answer in the first place. This reflected a similar position taken by the judge who had presided over the case against Mr. Jan Sithole of the SFTU and other trade union leaders taken in January 1996, and who was subsequently demoted. The Government was openly using the media to threaten trade unionists and trade union activity. There was evidence of intimidation of the media not to give coverage to trade union activities or the SFTU. The Workers' members noted that, despite the comments made by the Government representative in the discussion of this case last year, broadcasting was still listed in section 73 of the Industrial Relations Act as an essential service, despite the pertinent decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Government was continuing to use the police and armed forces directly to break up trade union meetings and disrupt legitimate trade union organization, such as the 1 February 1997 raid and search without warrant of the SFTU offices. It was using bullets, tear gas and beatings to break up assemblies, such as the 11 February 1997 shooting at Big Bend. It was perpetuating and intensifying the climate of fear and intimidation surrounding trade unions and trade union activity, such as the incident on 3 February 1997 when 150 armed police fired on 23 General Council members of the SFTU and ordered them to go to a local police station where they were locked in a tear gas filled room, beaten and individually questioned for several hours. It was extending the violence and intimidation to encircle the families, friends and relatives of those trade unionists, such as the February 1997 harassment of Mr. Sithole's mother and close relatives while he was in jail. The Workers' members stressed that the Committee on Freedom of Association had stated clearly that freedom of association could only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental human rights and, in particular, those relating to human life and personal safety, were fully respected and guaranteed. Violence, fear and intimidation and the lack of freedom of expression were incompatible with Convention No. 87, as was the lack of democratic process. So it was with deep concern that the Workers' members noted that there had been no progress on changing the national Constitution, since Swaziland was the only south African country where multi-party democracy had not been introduced. The suspension of the SFTU was now lifted, but not so for the trade unions which had been deregistered under the Act just two weeks ago, and which had lost their right to function, to collective bargaining and to represent their members on the Labour Advisory Board. This deregistration had been carried out by the Labour Commissioner on the spurious grounds that the unions had not submitted their annual returns, even though the Act did not define the period of the financial year. Such administrative dissolution of trade union organizations constituted a clear violation of Article 4 of the Convention and was a measure which should be taken only by judicial decision so that the rights of defence were fully guaranteed.

The Workers' members urged the Committee to adopt extremely firm conclusions in this case since the Government appeared, at best, complacent and, at worst, contemptuous of the supervisory procedures and authority of the ILO. It was time to give a clear message to the Government as there had been ample opportunity to make progress and this had not happened. In practice, the situation had deteriorated. Specifically, the Workers' members wanted to see, within a clearly defined timetable, progress in accordance with the comments of the Committee of Experts and the decisions of the Committee on Freedom of Association on the following points: amendment of the 1963 Public Order Act so that it would no longer be used to oppress legitimate and peaceful strike action in contravention of the principles of freedom of association; repeal of section 12 of the 1973 Decree which placed important restrictions on the right of organizations to hold meetings and demonstrations, so that trade union organizations could operate freely without fear of police interference in trade union affairs; amendment of the 1996 Industrial Relations Act to bring it into conformity with the requirements of the Convention, giving due consideration to the proposals made by the Labour Advisory Board. They asked that the Government ensure that the social partners were fully involved in this process and that the technical assistance of the ILO be sought so that progress could be reported before the next meeting of the Governing Body in November 1997; that it stop any further harassments, threats, malicious arrests, intimidation and victimization of workers, their leaders and their families; and authorize freedom of the press and freedom of expression; establish independent inquiries into the many incidents which had taken place over recent months, including the dismissal of Mr. Jabulani Nxumalo, Assistant General Secretary of the SFTU; and enter into positive and meaningful negotiations on the 27 demands. The Workers' members concluded that this was a case of the most gross, wide-ranging and fundamental violation of the Convention and the principles of freedom of association. The Government should immediately commit itself to the full implementation of the recommendations of the direct contacts mission in a defined, short period of time and accept permanent monitoring of the implementation of these developments by the ILO.

The Employers' members recalled that the application of Convention No. 87 by Swaziland had been already examined by the present Committee in 1996. This case involved numerous restrictions on the exercise of the fundamental rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Convention and, in particular, interference in the internal affairs of the trade unions; the non-recognition of the right of association of a certain group of workers; the power of the Labour Commissioner to refuse to register trade unions if he was satisfied that an already registered organization was sufficiently representative; and the restrictions of the right to organize meetings and to hold peaceful demonstrations. These were flagrant violations which were, on the whole, the same that had been brought to light last year. On the question of restrictions on the right to strike, the Employers' members referred to their own well-known position according to which the point of departure was not an unlimited right to strike. There was no basis in the Convention for the unlimited right to strike, the provisions of the Convention would be infringed where the right to strike was constrained to such an extent that it no longer existed. He recalled that strikes always had an impact not only on the interests of the conflicting parties but also on the rights of persons who were not concerned with the conflict of interests. It was also reasonable to balance the interests of the conflicting parties on the one hand, and of the general public on the other. As for what concerned the qualified majority required when voting on strike action, it was not excessive in itself. What was worrying was that the Industrial Relations Act, 1996, worsened, not improved, the situation. Referring to the direct contacts mission which had taken place last year, they stated that an invitation for such a mission usually constituted proof of the readiness of the Government to change its law and practice to improve the situation. However, the position of the Government with respect to the required changes remained unclear. Although the Government representative mentioned, for example, the existence of tripartite consultations, he did not explain in which manner and on what subjects these consultations were held.Turning to the conclusions of the contacts mission report, the Employers' members recommended to incorporate those points into legislation on which the social partners had already reached an agreement. The Government should accept these recommendations and incorporate them into the legislation. It should provide detailed information, so as to enable this Committee to review the case, if necessary.

The Workers' member of Swaziland pointed out that his country was a signatory to various national instruments but had been in a state of emergency since 12 April 1973 when the rights of citizens had been usurped. This left workers as the only voice for the downtrodden and they had presented to the Government the popular "27 demands" which dealt with, inter alia, labour-related, economic, human and civil rights issues. The Government had ignored the demands, but the SFTU asked for a tripartite forum to look into them through dialogue. A series of tripartite structures was thus set up which deliberated on all the issues and advised the Government accordingly, but again, it ignored all their recommendations. Several international and regional workers' organizations visited Swaziland between 1995 and 1997 in order to help find a solution and their advice was also ignored by the Government on the pretext that it constituted foreign interference in national sovereignty. The Government's inaction had been met with a wave of industrial action, to which the authorities reacted with arrests and the shooting of workers, the lodging of applications in the High Court, for court injunctions to declare intended strikes unlawful; the issuing of extraordinary gazettes declaring the strike unlawful if the Government failed in its court applications; and judges who refused applications would suffer reprimands, demotion and/or dismissal. He considered that the Government had acted in bad faith since it acknowledged the violations of the Convention before international fora and yet remained intransigent at home. The Government had deceived the social partners because it had promised to table amendments to the Act in March 1996, but to date, no such amendments were before Parliament. Furthermore, the Government was not truthful when it stated that it was not aware that trade unions were being harassed: its security forces regularly raided trade union offices, interrupted trade union meetings, detained and arrested trade union leaders and members (including the 23 members of the general council of the SFTU) and physically assaulted them. After describing some of the infringements in practice of the Convention, the speaker stated that the 1996 Act's provisions were a flagrant legislative violation of the Convention and in serious breach of the principles of freedom of association. He expressed the belief that Swaziland and other Governments which were also members of the ILO Governing Body must be advocates and die-hard defenders of ILO principles, especially social justice; and, as such, must lead by an example of exemplary behaviour. Therefore, he agreed with the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association that the Government should bring the legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The 27 demands should be dealt with seriously once and for all. A clear deadline had to be set for the Government specifying when these issues would have to be tackled and resolved, and the ILO's technical assistance could help in the amendment of the Act. He proposed that this case be mentioned in a special paragraph of the Committee's general report.

The Employers' member of South Africa pointed out that in this case there had been many promises but little progress. The Committee of Experts' observation noted that not only did the 1996 Industrial Relations Act perpetuate the previous discrepancies between the legislation and the Convention, but it contained new provisions which further contravened the terms of the Convention. The Government's behaviour in drafting this Act disclosed a series of breaches of undertakings made to the social partners. In March 1994, a tripartite committee had been established by the Government to consider a series of demands made by the SFTU and significant progress had been made on 21 of the 27 points raised by the Federation. Although the Government expressed its support for some of the recommendations of the tripartite committee, it indicated that it would formulate its own proposals in the form of amendments to the legislation. Early in 1995, the Government published a draft Bill for comment and later tabled it in Parliament but the social partners had not been consulted. Further discussions were held between the Government and the social partners before the Bill reached the Senate because there was general disagreement with a number of its provisions. In July 1995 the tripartite forum adopted a resolution to the effect that it would identify unacceptable aspects of the Bill and attempt to agree on amendments acceptable to all parties. The Government undertook to submit these amendments at the same time as the Bill was presented to the Senate. In September 1996 the tripartite forum formally adopted a protocol containing 65 proposed amendments to the Bill. However, the Government introduced the Bill to the Senate without the amendments. The parties in the tripartite forum expressed their dismay over this turn of events and the Government's good faith was questioned. After the enactment of the Act, further efforts to review it were initiated and the SFTU's concerns were referred to the Labour Advisory Board, which in March 1996, submitted proposals for amendments to the Minister. They had not yet been introduced in Parliament. So the history of this legislation reflected some form of general agreement between the social partners, but mostly a history of unfulfilled promises by the Government. The direct contacts mission that had visited Swaziland in October 1996 noted that no convincing explanation could be given by the Government for either its unilateral decision to redraft the Act or for its refusal to introduce the amendments to the Act proposed by the Labour Advisory Board. Therefore, while he had noted the Government representative's expression of support for the ILO's Constitution and Conventions, what was needed now was some progress in Government action. It should move without further delay to implement the recommendations of the direct contacts mission, with guidance and technical assistance from the ILO.

The Workers' member of the United States pointed out that this was the second consecutive year that this case, which involved fundamental violations of the Convention, was before the Committee. In addition to the violations of a legislative nature, as reflected in the observation of the Committee of Experts, this Committee had heard in great detail about the violations in practice, in particular the intensifying campaign of intimidation and harassment of union leaders and their families. This pattern of behaviour by the Government demonstrated its disdain for the ILO and this Committee. However, it was important to point out to the Government that its behaviour had caught the attention of the Committee of Experts and this Committee, as well as that of the international community. Therefore its days of operating in relative obscurity had passed. The Workers' members were following closely the developments in the country since the personal safety and welfare of members of the SFTU were at stake. If the Government intended to take its obligations arising from the Convention seriously, it had to put an immediate end to its campaign of intimidation and harassment against trade unions and their leaders. Moreover, it had to return immediately to the bargaining table with the SFTU and the employers to negotiate in good faith a revision of the Industrial Relations Act. This year, the Committee should send to the Government an even stronger message than its 1996 conclusions in the hope that it could be influenced to choose the path of the rule of law and respect for basic worker rights, rather than that of repression and increasing international condemnation.

The Workers' member of Zambia asserted that the Government representative had repeated the assurances that his Government had given to this Committee in previous years and had stated nothing new this year. Therefore he fully supported the view that the Government should commit itself immediately before this Committee to engage in effective and genuine dialogue with the workers and employers of Swaziland with a view to amending the Industrial Relations Act and other labour laws in line with international labour standards. Moreover, this action should be accomplished in a short time-frame.

The Government member of the United Kingdom welcomed the fact that a direct contacts mission to Swaziland had taken place and was pleased to note the readiness of the Government to continue its dialogue with the ILO. He supported the Government's request for further technical assistance to tackle the problems which had been identified. While his Government had been very concerned over the arrest in early 1997 of the principal trade union leaders of the SFTU, and had made those concerns clear to the authorities at the time, he was very glad that they had since been released. The Committee of Experts' observation had noted that the Industrial Relations Act, 1996, still contained a number of discrepancies with the provisions of the Convention. He was pleased to hear that the Swazi Government intended to rectify the situation and hoped that it would turn this commitment into concrete action as soon as possible.

The Workers' member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic Workers of this Committee, expressed grave concern over the violations of the Convention. In spite of appeals by the international community, missions from the ILO and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and interventions from trade union leaders from neighbouring countries, the Government had continuously harassed Swazi trade unions and their leaders. She fully supported the comments made by the Committee of Experts on the Industrial Relations Act. It was disturbing that a so-called democratic country still thought it was acceptable for workers not to have the right to strike, for unions to face major restrictions on their right to hold peaceful demonstrations and meetings or for the court to wind up a federation which had been actively campaigning on matters that were defined as political issues but that could not in fact be distinguished from occupational issues. Moreover, trade union leaders had been imprisoned, including the four senior leaders of the SFTU, for having threatened to go on strike over labour demands. Although they were finally released, democratic reforms and the opening of negotiations did not follow and matters had worsened. Just before the present Conference she had heard that the Government had suspended the activities of the SFTU and the 17 unions affiliated to it apparently because of failure to submit on time the 1996 financial reports. It was incomprehensible that trade union activities could be suspended for this reason. She assured Swazi workers that they had the support of the Nordic trade unions. The right to carry out trade union activities, including the right to strike, was so fundamental in Nordic countries that it was hard to believe the action taking place in Swaziland. It was not acceptable that in 1997 workers were denied their most fundamental rights.

The Government member of the United States supported the statement of the Government member of the United Kingdom and hoped that the recommendations of the direct contacts mission to Swaziland would be implemented soon.

The Workers' member of the United Republic of Tanzania endorsed the concern expressed by his colleagues concerning the gravity of the situation in Swaziland. The Government should in no way be proud of the fact that it had ratified 31 ILO Conventions while in practice it violated them daily. He therefore insisted that the Government adopt a clearly defined timetable of action towards applying the Convention, including the repeal of the Industrial Relations Act. It further needed to engage in much-needed dialogue with the SFTU.

The Workers' member of Zimbabwe indicated that the situation in Swaziland, contrary to the promises made here by the Minister in 1996, had deteriorated significantly. The Committee of Experts had identified two aspects to the problem, namely the national legislation and the situation in practice. The Industrial Relations Act, 1996, contained new provisions which contravened the Convention even further as highlighted in the Committee of Experts' observation. In practice, the Government had been harassing the leadership of the SFTU, together with the use of force to prevent workers from holding meetings and exercising their other rights under the Convention. While he supported the need for dialogue, he considered that the authorities were using dialogue as a delaying tactic. This Committee needed to act decisively by including this case in a special paragraph of its report.

The Government member of Zambia, the Minister of Labour and Social Security, expressed his concern over developments in Swaziland. He was of the view that the Government should take steps to move towards democratization and labour rights as had occurred in other countries in southern Africa. Only this could really ensure respect for trade union rights.

The Government representative indicated that he took seriously what had been stated in the Committee. It was obvious from the observation of the Committee of Experts, from the recommendations of the direct contacts mission, as well as from the debate that had just taken place, that the basic problems in respect of the Convention stemmed from the adoption of the Industrial Relations Act, 1996. He reassured the Committee that he had not just made empty promises; his country was genuinely ready to ensure that the provisions of the Convention were complied with. He assured the Committee that the document that had been prepared by the Labour Advisory Board with ILO technical assistance would be discussed on 27 June 1997, and that the social partners should be fully involved. The final amendment Bill would be passed through Parliament by August 1997. He concluded by stating that his Government, like this Committee, wanted the national legislation to be in conformity with the Convention and would take the appropriate measures.

The Workers' members noted that the Government representative had focused his reply on discussions that had taken place in relation to the Industrial Relations Act. However, the conclusions of the direct contacts mission went beyond the Act, since they also related to infringements in practice of the Convention. All that was required was that the Government agreed to commit itself to implement immediately all the recommendations of the direct contacts mission, including those concerning issues beyond the Act. The Workers' members also wanted a permanent monitoring of its attempts to implement these recommendations.

The Employers' members, referring to the recommendations of the report made by the direct contacts mission, insisted on their immediate implementation, particularly with respect to the questions on which the social partners had reached an agreement. Rapid changes were necessary to improve the situation and it would be necessary to review the case in the near future taking into account the regrettable further deterioration in the situation after the direct contacts mission. The Government should supply a detailed report on the amendments and changes brought to the situation. The Employers' members supported the proposal to mention this case in a special paragraph of the Committee's report.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information supplied by the Government representative, as well as the discussion which ensued. The Committee noted the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association that, despite a direct contacts mission in October 1996 and specific progress concerning the education sector, the Industrial Relations Act, 1996, contained provisions which further violated the fundamental principles of freedom of association. The Committee expressed its deep concern for the numerous and major discrepancies between the national law and practice on the one hand, and the provisions of the Convention on the other. The Committee urged the Government to respect fully the civil liberties essential to the implementation of the Convention and to apply very rapidly the recommendations of the direct contacts mission, particularly those already agreed upon by the social partners. The Committee also urged the Government to take all measures necessary to eliminate the restrictions on the right of workers to constitute organizations of their own choice, to hold meetings and to demonstrate peacefully, to formulate their programmes of action and to bargain collectively. The Committee trusted that the next report would indicate detailed measures adopted by the Government, with the assistance of the Office, to secure the full application of the Convention. The Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its report.

Turkey (ratification: 1993). A Government representative stated that, as concerned the observation by the Committee of Experts that there still remained certain discrepancies between the Convention and national legislation on trade unions, collective agreements, strikes and lockouts, some recent developments had taken place either before or just after the report of the Committee of Experts. In accordance with Act No. 4121, which had amended several articles of the Turkish Constitution on 23 July 1995 with a view to ensuring fuller respect for trade union rights, a Bill to amend the pertinent sections of Act No. 2821 had received the unanimous support of the relevant parliamentary commissions and was now on the agenda of the legislature for final enactment. The proposed amendment would repeal the existing prohibition on the political activities of trade unions contained in article 37 and would totally abrogate article 39(1), which restricted the nomination of candidates to the organs of public organizations by trade unions and prohibited unions from engaging in propaganda in support of or against such candidates. Following the abolition of these restrictions, the penal sanctions contained in articles 58 and 59 for violations would also be repealed. The same Bill would abolish the auditing of trade unions by the Government and would leave this matter entirely to the internal machinery of trade unions.

With regard to restrictions on the right to strike, a Bill had been prepared to amend various sections of Act No. 2822 with a view to enlarging the scope of the right to strike. The proposed amendment envisaged the granting of the right to strike to establishments and operations such as banks and lignite production, as well as to urban public transport, which would considerably limit the scope of compulsory arbitration machinery in Turkey. The other changes proposed in the Bill included a provision making a lockout decision by the employer possible only after the implementation of strike action by the trade union concerned; the calling of lockouts only in establishments where strikes had already been commenced; the automatic termination of lockouts which were in progress with the ending of the strike in an establishment; and, an increase in the number of strike pickets to be placed at each exit and entrance of a plant in which a strike had been called, as provided in article 48. Following the adoption of these and other proposed amendments, the relevant penal sanctions for offenders would also be automatically repealed.

On the question of the right of public servants to organize and negotiate collectively with the administration, he informed the Committee that a Bill had been prepared that was in conformity with the amended version of article 53 of the Turkish Constitution, as well as with the provisions of Convention No. 151. The Bill granted public servants, within the meaning of article 128 of the Constitution, the right to organize their unions and negotiate collectively with the administration as regards their salaries and working conditions. The Bill had been submitted after consultation with the social partners to the Council of Ministers on 14 May 1997. It incorporated the main features of Convention No. 151, including the full utilization of impartial conciliation machinery. It should be noted in this connection that workers employed in the public sector who were not deemed to be public servants within the strict definition of article 128 of the Constitution had enjoyed the trade union and collective bargaining rights of private sector workers from the very beginning of the collective bargaining system in Turkey. They were currently covered by Acts Nos. 2821 and 2822. Having been mandated by the Constitution, it was expected that this Bill on public servants' union rights would be submitted to Parliament as an item of high priority to be debated in the near future in the relevant parliamentary commissions. In this context, he emphasized the fact that public servants and other public functionaries employed in continuous and essential services of the State in accordance with the Civil Service Regulations, as defined in article 128 of the Constitution, had already begun to organize their unions even before the constitutional amendment of 1995. There were currently three public servants' confederations and numerous public servants' unions and union branches.

Finally, he referred to the observation made by the Committee of Experts that trade union legislation in Turkey was overly detailed and regulated issues which should be left to the constitution and rules of the unions themselves. The tendency to enact detailed legislation emanated from the deep-rooted legislative tradition inherent in Turkish society since the establishment of the Republic in 1923. Parallel to the development of other branches of law in Turkey, Turkish labour law had made continuous progress over the years through the adoption of detailed legislation with the approval of the social partners. Nevertheless, the restrictive provisions of Acts Nos. 2821 and 2822 had been improved by successive amendments, as illustrated by the enactments of 1986, 1988 and 1995, combined with the ratification of several important ILO Conventions in 1993 and 1994, and by the constitutional amendment of 1995. Furthermore, in an effort to strengthen the autonomy of the social partners in drawing up their constitutions in full freedom, work was in progress on another draft Bill. As illustrated by the above legislative measures, the constant efforts under way reaffirmed Turkey's commitment to bring trade union and collective bargaining legislation into compliance with ILO standards, and particularly Convention No. 87. In addition to Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 100, 105 and 111 of the ILO's core Conventions which had already been ratified by Turkey, he informed the Committee that the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), had been submitted to Parliament for ratification. Moreover, the Ministry of Labour had submitted the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), to the Council of Ministers. The protective provisions which already existed in Turkish legislation in those areas would therefore be further strengthened by the ratification of ILO Conventions Nos. 29, 138 and 159. In particular, he emphasized that with the ratification of Conventions Nos. 29 and 138 Turkey would have completed the process of ratifying the seven core ILO Conventions concerning the fundamental rights of workers.

The Employers' members considered that a number of positive developments could be noted in this case. For a number of years, the Government of Turkey had appeared regularly before the Committee with regard to Convention No. 98. On many occasions, the Committee had regretted that Turkey had not ratified Convention No. 87. This was now the first report on Convention No. 87 since its ratification and once again Turkey had been included in the list of cases to be examined by the Committee. However, it should be noted with appreciation that the Turkish Constitution had been amended in a number of respects to eliminate obstacles to freedom of association. The amendments to the Constitution had also concerned the ban on the political activities of trade unions, restrictions on freedom of association and collective bargaining placed upon public employees who were not civil servants. Following these constitutional amendments, a number of amendments had been made to the labour legislation and measures had been taken to propose further amendments to Parliament in order to implement the changes in the Constitution. The proposed measures included new legislation on collective bargaining for public employees who were not civil servants. The final point raised by the Committee of Experts in its report concerned the detailed nature of trade union legislation in Turkey. In this respect, the Government representative had indicated that his Government was prepared to simplify the relevant legislation. On the basis of the report made by the Government representative, it was possible to note that a number of noteworthy steps had been taken. Following the ratification of the Convention, consistent efforts had been made to adapt the legal provisions of the Turkish Constitution, which would result in amendments to the labour legislation. The Employers' members assumed that the Government would include all the relevant details in its next report on the Convention and they looked forward to receiving the report.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information that he had provided verbally and noted with interest the announcement of the ratification of other fundamental ILO Conventions. The Committee was examining this case for the first time, since Turkey had only ratified the Convention in 1993. Nevertheless, they recalled that the Committee had on four occasions during the 1990s examined very closely related questions concerning Turkey in the context of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The ratification by Turkey of this Convention and others, such as the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), and the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158), was an important act. Nevertheless, ratification was not sufficient and, in the case of Turkey, needed to be accompanied by amendments to the legislation. As noted by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, Turkish trade union legislation was overly detailed and regulated several matters that should be left to the competence of the constitutions and statutes of workers' and employers' organizations. They noted that since 1995 several laws had been amended and that article 52 of the Constitution, which prohibited trade unions from engaging in any political activities, had been repealed. Nevertheless, measures were still needed to bring the legislation into accordance with the provisions of the Convention. These modifications would make it possible to establish effective, healthy and democratic industrial relations and would in so doing facilitate the achievement of social justice and peace. The legislation needed to be simplified, among other measures, by eliminating provisions which permitted interference by the authorities and employers in the internal affairs of trade unions and which created obstacles to free collective bargaining. By way of illustration, they referred to the prohibition from establishing base-level unions for specific occupations, the double quantitative criteria for the negotiation of collective agreements, the general prohibition placed on solidarity strikes, the ban on strike pickets accompanied by heavy penal sanctions, the serious restrictions on freedom of association in export processing zones and the absence of legislative provisions for the reinstatement of workers who had been the victims of anti-trade union measures. Finally, the Workers' members, in the same way as the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, noted with interest the Government's statement that it intended to continue reforming its legislation in order to bring it fully into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. They emphasized that the Government should provide all the relevant information and take all the necessary measures to repeal all anti-trade union legal provisions, which prevented the development of healthy industrial relations. In this respect, they recalled that ILO technical assistance could be made available to the Government if it so wished.

The Workers' member of Turkey recalled that the representation submitted by his trade union organization on 4 July 1994 concerning the non-observance by Turkey of Convention No. 87 had resulted in a very comprehensive report by the Committee on Freedom of Association, which had been approved by the Governing Body in March 1996. Since no legislative amendments had been adopted since the preparation of that report, all of its conclusions and recommendations were still relevant. He therefore hoped that the Conference Committee would further examine those basic points, which had also been referred to by the Committee of Experts in its report.

In March 1996, the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1810 had stated that the Committee noted with deep regret that, despite the repeated assurances given by the Government in the context of numerous cases concerning Turkey which the Committee had examined, certain legislative provisions continued to violate rights guaranteed by Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and that national practice was far from meeting Turkey's international undertakings. The Committee on Freedom of Association had requested the Government to intensify its efforts to take urgent measures to remedy the situation. He noted that, in the absence of effective guarantees and job security, many of the workers recruited by trade unions had lost their jobs. The Government of Turkey had not fulfilled its obligations to bring its legislation into accordance with Convention No. 158. Moreover, trade union membership was strictly prohibited for contract personnel in public economic enterprises, security personnel in private establishments and conscripts employed as workers in the public sector. The legislation that was in force did not guarantee the right to organize of public servants or homeworkers. In addition, although the amended Constitution stated that trade unions and higher-level organizations of public servants would be permitted by law to establish among themselves, no such law had been adopted two years after the enactment of the amendment. Indeed, the prosecution of public servants for legitimate trade union activities had continued with full vigour. The draft Bill prepared by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security in January 1997 was still far short of meeting the requirements of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. Under section 6 of the Bill, founders of public servants' unions needed to have seniority of at least two years. Under sections 14 and 20, such unions could only be members of international public servants' organizations, which did not include ICFTU or ETUC. The fact that personnel in the judiciary, civilian employees in the armed forces and public servants in prisons were prohibited from joining unions meant that the two existing public servants' trade unions would have to be liquidated. The Bill was opposed by two trade union federations which had applied for membership of ICFTU and ETUC. According to information from trade union sources, 73,000 public servants had been fined, 1,500 had been demoted, the promotion of 1,700 public servants had been halted, nearly 8,000 public servants had received disciplinary punishments, 1,900 had been dismissed and 4,000 had been transferred to other cities because they had engaged in legitimate trade union activities. Moreover, the trade union representing public employees in the postal services had been liquidated. He added that political activities by trade unions were still severely curtailed. Despite the repeal of article 52 of the Constitution, more extensive bans and restrictions on political activity by public servants and by trade unions representing workers and public servants still existed in the Trade Unions Act, Public Servants Act and the Decree respecting contract personnel. Article 82 of the Constitution, which provided that trade union office was not compatible with being a member of parliament, was still in force. Trade unions still faced administrative and financial auditing by the authorities.

Although the right to strike was a basic and indispensable component of the Convention, Turkish labour legislation still violated the Convention in many respects. These violations had not been resolved by the amendment of the Constitution. Workers in the informal sector and unorganized workers could not strike. Workers could not call a strike without prior authorization from their trade union and could only strike as a result of a conflict of interest during collective bargaining. Confederations could not strike and strikes were prohibited for workers in export processing zones, public servants, contract personnel, students employed on a temporary basis for training purposes, conscripts employed in public enterprises and employees of the central bank. Nor could workers employed in the production of water, electricity, gas, lignite and petrochemicals call strikes. This ban also applied to bank employees, public notaries, fire-fighting personnel and land, marine and rail transport workers, despite the fact that none of these services could be considered essential in the strict sense of the term. Prohibitions were also placed on solidarity strikes, general strikes, peaceful workplace occupations and go-slows, despite the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in this respect.

Very cumbersome procedures had to be fulfilled in order to call a strike. These excluded extreme limitations as regards cooling-off periods, the number of strike pickets and their shelter. Employers had to be notified six days before the initiation of a strike and the courts were entitled to suspend lawful strikes on the grounds of damage to society. Moreover, the right to strike could be totally suspended under martial law and in emergency situations. The sanctions in the event of violations of these prohibitions were severe. In this respect, he indicated that the Bills prepared to amend Acts Nos. 2821 and 2822 had shared the same fate as the other Bills referred to by the Government of Turkey during discussions of Convention No. 98 over the past five years.

In conclusion, he stated that minor legislative improvements would not suffice to bring Turkish legislation into line with the Convention. In accordance with the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1810, the technical assistance of the ILO was required to achieve this belated task.

The Workers' member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic Workers in the Committee and the Workers' member of the Netherlands, strongly supported the Workers' member of Turkey's intervention concerning violations of the Convention. First, he recalled that in its observation, the Committee of Experts had mentioned that a wide range of political activities was still prohibited for trade unions, that several provisions restricted the right to strike in contravention of the principles of freedom of association and that national legislation regulated several matters which should be left to the competence of organizations of employers and workers. His organization had visited Turkey twice in autumn 1996. The findings of these visits confirmed that the Government was continuously responsible for serious violations of fundamental trade union rights, particularly in relation to fundamental international instruments, such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, as well as the European Convention on Human Rights. He shared the deep concern of the Committee on Freedom of Association which, in examining Cases Nos. 1810 and 1830, had noted with deep regret that certain legislative provisions continued to violate rights guaranteed by Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, and the national practice was far from meeting Turkey's international undertakings. He listed the following serious restrictions on the trade union movement: under the legislation there was no right to strike, organize or bargain collectively for contract personnel in public enterprises; according to national practice, public servants were deprived of the right to organize, to strike and to bargain collectively; regulations imposed broad restrictions on those rights for workers in the public and private sectors; the Free Trade Zone Act banned strikes in export processing zones and imposed binding arbitration; there was no provision for the reinstatement of dismissed trade unionists; the general lack of job security undermined legal protection; and, the laws remained overly prescriptive and regulatory about internal union rules and constitutions. Referring to the Committee of Experts' observation, he pointed out that although article 52 of the Constitution, which prohibited all political activity undertaken by a trade union, had been repealed, the observation failed to mention that the prohibition on political activity by trade unions still remained in national legislation (section 37 of the Trade Unions Act). Moreover, article 53 of the Constitution, which granted the right of trade unions in the public sector to bargain collectively, did not contain an effective right since it left it to domestic legislation to regulate the matter and nothing had been enacted as yet at the national level. He wanted to know from the Government representative what the proposed time frame was for the adoption of the necessary legislative changes on these two points. Consideration had also to be given to the fact that a lot of trade unionists had been prosecuted under the Anti-Terrorism Act, which provided for severe penalties. In fact, there were parts of Turkey where normal trade union activities could not be carried out and there were many examples of the detention of trade unionists just for having called a trade union meeting. According to information he had received recently, several union leaders had been arrested at the end of May 1997. Since there was little reason to believe that the Government on its own would manage to bring the national legislation into line with the Convention, he proposed that the ILO offer technical assistance so that the recently ratified Convention would be fully incorporated into the national legislation in the near future.

The Workers' member of Greece pointed out that once again, the information provided by the trade unions indicated the wide gap which could exist between the ratification of a Convention and its actual implementation. According to this information, only 2 million workers in Turkey were covered by collective agreements. The requirement for 10 per cent of workers in a branch and 50 per cent of workers in an enterprise were designed only to restrict the right to exercise freedom of association. For instance, in the case of a railway company, a trade union could not function if it represented only 50 per cent of workers across the country. Also, the organization of a trade union meeting required the prior authorization of the police to whom a complete list of the speakers had to be submitted. Those were only a few of the problems raised by this case, which could lead one to wonder which provisions of the Convention had been introduced in the legislation. It was urgent for the Government to act instead of simply making statements.

The Workers' member of Germany highlighted the discrepancy between the statement of the Government representative and that of the Workers' member of Turkey with respect to the legalistic and practical developments as regards application of this Convention. Referring to the individual cases described by that Workers' member, he stated that the Convention had been violated to an even greater extent in practice than in the law. It was therefore important to ask whether the Government representative was in a position to confirm that the measures required would be taken as requested by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association. Referring to conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos. 1810 and 1830, he stated that they gave rise to two main questions: first, could the Government representative state which measures had been taken to lift the current ban on trade unions from setting up radio and television stations, which interfered in the right to carry out union activities? Secondly, observing that the Government representative had not provided sufficient and precise information regarding the extent and substance of the draft Bill to amend the Trade Unions Act, would it amend all the legislative provisions which had been criticized regarding the right to strike? He recommended that the conclusions on this case be mentioned in a positive light only if the Government representative could give satisfactory answers to these questions.

The Government member of Iceland, speaking on behalf of the Governments of Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway and Sweden, noted with interest that article 52 of the Turkish Constitution, prohibiting all political activities by trade unions, had been repealed. He was looking forward to the practical implementation of this measure. He noted, however, that several Acts which prohibited a wide range of political activities still remained in force. Measures should be taken by the Government to bring these laws into conformity with the Convention. In order to do so, the Government could ask for the technical assistance of the Office.

The Workers' member of Pakistan fully supported calls from other speakers to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. In its observation, the Committee of Experts had noted that the laws still contained restrictions on both political and trade union activities, as well as on the right to organize of public servants. In order to bring the legislation in line with the requirements of the Convention, the Government should envisage having recourse to the technical assistance of the Office.

The Government representative expressed appreciation for the views expressed by both Workers' and Employers' members but wanted it to be acknowledged that the enactment of legislation, especially in the labour relations field, was long and difficult in any country due to the conflict of various interests. As the Workers' members had rightly pointed out, ratification alone was not enough. This was why the Government was involved in the amendment of the Trade Unions Act, which was being debated in Parliament currently. With regard to the issue of the maintenance of the dual criteria for bargaining collectively referred to by the Workers' members, the Government representative emphasized that his Government was willing to repeal the dual criteria requirement but that it needed the consent of the social partners to do so; until now they had expressed their satisfaction with this requirement. Replying to the statement of the Workers' member of Turkey that job security for union members and officers still employed at the establishment did not exist, he pointed out that these persons benefited from the protection of the national legislation, which provided that compensation should not be less than the total amount of annual wages. Reinstatement was only granted to shop stewards. However, when Convention No. 158 would be incorporated into the national legislation, all workers, unionists and non-members of unions, would be protected. Regarding the call for the removal of the various bans on unions' political activities, he replied that section 37(2) of the draft Bill on the Trade Unions Act (No. 2821) now only stipulated that unions and confederations could not engage in activities outside their objectives, nor could they use the name, emblem, logo or signs of political parties under this provision. Moreover, section 37(3) provided that if union officials were nominated as candidates in general and local elections, their positions in unions would be suspended. If they were elected, their union leadership and functions would be terminated. Now the draft Bill provided that union and confederation officials elected to the organs of political parties would maintain their positions in their unions. In order to further trade, Act No. 3218 of June 1985 on Free Trade Zones banned strikes in export processing zones only for 10 years. Collective bargaining could be initiated and, if negotiations failed, the dispute was to be referred to compulsory arbitration for a period of ten years from the inception of the free trade zone. Similarly, trainee students (apprentices) who worked in industrial establishments as part of their vocational training were subject to a strike ban under section 22 of Act No. 3308, because they were students and not workers under the terms of Act No. 2821 and Act No. 1475 on labour affairs. With respect to the prohibition of union membership contained in section 21 of the Trade Unions Act, only professional members of the armed forces were barred from membership now that the ban had been repealed by Act No. 4101 in 1995. As for contract employees, they could be found only in state economic enterprises and their number was decreasing because of privatization. Moreover, contract employees, who were considered as "other public personnel" according to article 128 of the Constitution, would be covered by the proposed Bill on the trade union rights of public servants. Although no more than four strike pickets were allowed at one time under the current legislation, this number had been increased to eight in the draft Bill to amend Act No. 2822 on collective agreements, strikes and lockouts. Moreover, the draft Bill removed the administrative and financial auditing of unions and left this to the constitutions of the unions themselves. Finally, while the TUM-HABER-SEN Union had been dissolved by the court of appeal, due to the absence of enabling legislation, this ruling was only applicable to the specific case in question. Besides, it would be premature to make definitive remarks about something for which the legislative process had not yet been finalized. The draft Bill to amend Act No. 2822 removed the bans on the right to strike in banks and lignite production and distribution, and maintained strike restrictions in some of the essential services where compulsory arbitration would be the last resort. The denial to confederations of collective bargaining and the right to strike was only natural as, in many countries, confederations were top-level horizontal structures, not conducive to collective bargaining. Unorganized workers had the right to strike, as well as members of the striking union. Although unions could not request any additional fees from their members other than the regular union dues, they were, unlike the situation in other countries, entitled to automatic "check-off" of union dues which strengthened them financially. The ban on the right to strike for rights disputes was based on a Constitutional provision and the right to strike was recognized only for interest disputes, as was the case in various Western countries. The law now provided for the referral of collective disputes to the labour courts or to voluntary arbitration. The allegation that many unionists were being subjected to legal harassment in Southeastern Turkey was misleading, since these people, who lived in an area subject to separationist terrorist activism, were probably detained for acts unrelated to their rights and functions. Therefore, all other public servants unions were functioning legally at present. The other points that had been raised were not related to Conventions Nos. 87, 98 or 151. He stressed the significant impact the ILO had had on shaping the national legislation relating to labour standards since Turkey became a member in 1932.

The Workers' members were of the opinion that even after the adoption of the amendments to the legislation several problems would remain, in particular regarding the export processing zones and the right to strike. They recalled that the Government committed itself to the Committee on Freedom of Association to pursue the reform of the legislation to bring it into full conformity with the Convention and the Government had been invited to request the ILO's technical assistance.

The Employers' members pointed out that after the amendment of the Constitution, the amendment of the Labour Code was necessary. Since the Constitution provided for the principles which had to be implemented by the Law, it was thus logical for the country to amend its legislation accordingly. Certain speakers had referred to Convention No. 98, but the discussion here should focus on the questions related to Convention No. 87. When the Committee of Experts mentioned in its report that it "noted with interest", this was a sign of progress which should be reflected in the conclusions of this Committee.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and the discussion which had ensued. The Committee recalled that the Committee of Experts had taken note with interest of the constitutional amendments which had repealed the ban on trade unions from carrying out any political activity and which authorized collective bargaining for public servants' unions. Nevertheless, the Committee of Experts had once again asked the Government to adopt, in the near future, all the measures necessary for the drafting of legislation which would be in full conformity with the requirements of the Convention. This Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures, in particular regarding the right of all workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations of their own choosing and the right of workers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, to formulate their programmes and to bargain collectively without any interference by the public authorities. The Committee expressed the firm hope that it would be able to note concrete progress in the Government's next report, as regards the application in law and in practice of this core Convention. The Committee reminded the Government that it could resort, if it so desired, to the technical assistance of the Office.

United Kingdom (ratification: 1949). The Government supplied the following information:

The Government has honoured its pledge to restore the right, which was denied in 1984, for staff at the Government Communications Headquarters in Cheltenham (GCHQ) to join a trade union of their choice. The conditions of service at GCHQ have been amended, with immediate effect, to remove all restrictions on union membership. The staff are now free to join any union they wish. The full details of these changes will be communicated to the ILO in due course.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the United Kingdom Minister of State for Employment had already announced formally the restoration of trade union rights at the Government Communications Headquarters in Cheltenham (GCHQ) in his speech to the plenary session of the Conference. He had emphasized the Government's full support for the ILO, the importance that it attached to restoring the United Kingdom's reputation for fulfilling its obligations in the ILO, and its full respect for the application of the ILO's core labour standards. He was therefore very pleased to put on record before the Committee his Government's prompt action to restore freedom of association at GCHQ. This was one of the very first acts of the new Government, after it was elected on 1 May 1997.

The speed with which his Government had acted on this commitment demonstrated the importance to the United Kingdom of upholding respect for freedom of association and basic trade union rights, the exercise of which it believed was crucial to balanced, humane, democratic and peaceful development. Referring to the wider questions raised about his Government's compliance with the provisions of the Convention, the speaker indicated that he was not in a position to give a detailed response at this point. He could, however, confirm that the Government had pledged to restore a fair balance between the rights and responsibilities of employers and employees at the workplace. The Government intended to consult later in the year on its proposals for fairness at work. Trade union organizations would, of course, play a full part in those tripartite consultations. Finally, he wished to confirm that his Government would, in due course, respond in full to the comments made by the Committee of Experts in its latest observation.

The Workers' members stated that on the basis of the observation of the Committee of Experts a long and difficult debate might have been needed on the application by the United Kingdom of the Convention. However, in view of the declaration of the Minister of Employment in plenary, and that of the Government representative in this Committee, it seemed that progress was being made at last. With regard to the issue of the dismissal of workers at GCHQ, it would appear that the situation had been rectified. This was a great victory for the supervisory bodies and the system. However, sight should not be lost of the fact that the Government would have to take several further steps before its legislation and practice were completely in line with the requirements of the Convention. But there were significant reasons to look forward to such further steps with some confidence, especially as the new Government was prepared to engage in real and meaningful consultations with the Trades Union Congress (TUC) and the Confederation of British Industry (CBI). The Workers' members welcomed the Government's intention to introduce a White Paper to restore fairness in the workplace. The Workers' representatives in the United Kingdom were looking forward to proper consultations on the White Paper and subsequent legislation. Finally, the Workers' members welcomed the prospect of full participation by the Government in the ILO in line with the Minister of Employment's statement, and of its intention to ensure respect for the core ILO Conventions.

The Employers' members noted that this case was well known to this Committee since it had been discussed on several occasions. The written information submitted by the Government, as well as the explanations of the Government representative, showed that this case was essentially resolved. The actual contribution of the Committee with respect to this solution was difficult to evaluate and internal considerations had probably played a more decisive role than the discussions of the Committee. Instead of referring to historical considerations, it was enough to note with satisfaction that freedom of association had been reinstated at GCHQ. As was often the case with the discussions of this Committee, several points as well as the comments of the Committee of Experts were never discussed in detail but were just touched upon generally. Points 2 and 3 of this year's observation touched upon fundamental questions but since neither the Government representative nor the Workers' members had dealt with them the Employers' members were going to follow the same line while reserving the possibility of coming back during a forthcoming session of the Conference.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom appreciated and welcomed the statement of the new Labour Government on bringing to an end a 13-year-old injustice. He also expressed the appreciation of the British TUC, his own union which had over 900 members banned from trade union membership at GCHQ, and of the 14 GCHQ staff who were dismissed for refusing to leave their trade union, to the ILO and all the delegates of this Committee for keeping the issue of GCHQ alive. He also thanked those Governments and Employers' members who had given their support and joined in the call for a resolution of this case over those 13 years. Moreover, he thanked the British civil servants who had presented this case 13 years ago, virtually all of whom had been members of the same union banned at GCHQ in 1994. Most of all he wished to thank the Workers' members of this Committee for their steadfast and total support for this issue.

The Government member of Switzerland, in his personal and official capacity, welcomed with great satisfaction the statement of the Government representative. The discussion of this case for several years made it a symbol touching the application of a fundamental Convention of the ILO. One could only express delight with respect to the measures taken in the case of GCHQ and note with satisfaction the measures that the Government had taken or was going to take on a tripartite basis to fully implement the Convention. Hope could be expressed that the Government would demonstrate the same goodwill regarding the other requests of the Committee of Experts. This was not only a case of progress but a case which had been resolved and therefore should no longer appear on the list of cases to be discussed.

The Government representative noted the welcome by the Committee of the restoration of trade union rights to the staff at GCHQ.

The Workers' members disagreed with the Government member of Switzerland that the case had been resolved. On the contrary, many steps had yet to be taken in order to bring national legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention. They trusted that these measures would be taken soon.

The Committee took note of the written and oral information provided by the Government. It noted with satisfaction that the Government had fulfilled its promise to re-establish the right of the staff at Government Communications Headquarters in Cheltenham to join organizations of their own choosing, which had been withheld since 1984. The Committee decided to mention this case of progress in the appropriate part of its General Report. The Committee expressed the hope that, in consultation with the organizations of workers and employers, the Government would examine the other points raised in the report of the Committee of Experts.

Venezuela (ratification: 1982). A Government representative emphasized the negative climate of labour relations which had existed in Venezuela at the time that the representation had been made by FEDECAMARAS and the IOE. It had been facing an extremely serious economic and social crisis that had given rise to social tension and had created an unhealthy atmosphere for social dialogue, impeding the social consensus that was necessary for Venezuela to develop its labour law. He said that he was convinced that the crisis was in the process of being overcome, as confirmed by, for example, the re-establishment and consolidation of social dialogue which had culminated in the signing of a far-reaching Tripartite Agreement on Social Security and Wage Policy, in which high-level representatives of the Government, Workers and Employers recognized the existence of ample common ground in its conceptual framework. This had been the result of an exchange of views that had taken place in a profoundly democratic climate of mutual respect and consideration for the treatment of the issues discussed. He stated that the Minister of Labour had given priority in her programme to obtaining a wide consensus as an underlying principle of the system of labour relations, which she had described to the ILO Standards Department in communications dated 8 May and 6 June 1997, which had stated that the Government of Venezuela had taken due note of the legal problems arising in relation to sections 404, 409, 418 and 419 of the Organic Labour Law and any discrepancies with the standards contained in the Convention. Aware of the importance of these issues, she had decided to accelerate the process of resolving them.

He indicated that, as the problems raised in the report of the Committee of Experts implied the need to harmonize four sections of the Organic Labour Law of Venezuela with the provisions of Convention No. 87, he was pleased to be able to inform the Committee that discussions had already been initiated with the most representative organizations of workers and employers in order to resolve this matter, based on the conviction that the most effective and balanced mechanism for harmonizing the labour law with the requirements of the Convention was through social dialogue, the success of which was illustrated by the recent experience described above. He stated that in this way the concrete fulfilment of the promises made to the Committee by the previous Minister of Labour of Venezuela in 1996 had begun. Finally, he believed that the social partners in Venezuela would agree that, in virtue of the initiative cited to modify the legislation, the way had been opened to the definitive resolution of a problem which had occupied too much of the attention of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

The Employers' members indicated that this case had its origins in a representation on the violation of the rights of workers' and employers' organizations enshrined in the Convention. The Committee of Experts had examined these questions for various years, as had the Conference Committee in 1995 and 1996. This year, the statements made by the Government representative had shown no anger and had manifested the willingness of the Government to enter into dialogue. In this sense, there had been a certain improvement. The Committee of Experts' criticisms of the legislation concerned violations of the Convention on fundamental questions: the existence of too long a period of residence (more than ten years) for foreign workers to hold office on trade union executive boards; the overly extensive and detailed list of the attributions and purposes required for workers' and employers' organizations; the requirement of too high a number of workers (100) to form unions of self-employed workers; and the requirement of too high a number of employers (ten) to constitute an employers' organization. These requirements amounted to undue interference by the State. The Employers' members deplored that the Government had not supplied any information on any of these issues to the Committee of Experts, making a real dialogue on this question impossible, and that the Government representative had not provided any specific information indicating how and when these violations of the Convention would be resolved. In 1996, the Government had undertaken to resolve these problems through tripartite meetings. This undertaking had not been fulfilled and the Committee had to regret the time which this case had taken and which it appeared it would take in the future. They requested the Government to send a detailed report and hoped that it would contain a satisfactory response to the problems raised which would render it unnecessary to return to this issue. Finally, they regretted that the Government had not paid the costs of the attendance of the Workers' and Employers' delegates at the Conference, as required under the ILO Constitution.

The Workers' members were in full agreement with the statements made by the Employers' members. The restrictions imposed on the rights of employers to establish organizations of their own choosing so that workers' organizations could have valid partners for collective bargaining needed to be eliminated. They deplored that the Government, on several occasions, had not responded to the Committee of Experts or the Conference Committee with detailed information and regretted the repeated failure of the Government to fulfil its commitments. The Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee had all pointed to the need to amend the legislation to resolve its discrepancies with the Convention. The fact that no information had been provided to the Committee of Experts once again this year was a sign of an unwillingness to cooperate. The Government representative had said only that the crisis that had existed previously in the country was being overcome and that a tripartite dialogue existed. The Workers' members expressed the firm hope that this dialogue signified the beginning of a change of attitude. They insisted on the importance of the Government providing positive responses in its report to the Committee of Experts and on the need to take the necessary steps without delay, in consultation with the social partners, to resolve the problems identified by the Committee of Experts and to guarantee the right of workers and employers to establish organizations of their own choosing and the other rights of these organizations.

The Employers' member of Venezuela stated that the representation referred to had been submitted by FEDECAMARAS and the IOE and agreed with the declarations of the Employers' and Workers' members. The Committee of Experts had criticized the legal provisions which violated various Articles of the Convention, but the new Labour Minister had expressed an openness to tripartite dialogue. It was important that the Government respond to the comments of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee and comply with the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Workers' member of Venezuela supported the views of the Workers' members. The difficulties which had existed earlier in the field of industrial labour and in the handling of labour conflicts had been overcome. The present tripartite meetings would produce results in the near future and would make it possible to overcome the problems relating to the Convention. He expressed his willingness to trust in the positive attitude adopted by the Government. The Committee should urge the Government to ensure that the tripartite discussions led to complete and immediate results so that this case could be resolved in time for the next meeting.

The Government representative expressed appreciation for the statements of the speakers who had participated in the debate. He denied that the Government had been angry concerning the matters under examination and referred to the serious political, economic and social crisis from which the Government of Venezuela had been emerging. He also regretted that the written response of the Government to the ILO on the tripartite dialogue and the new system of tripartite consultation had not arrived in time to be examined by the Committee of Experts. He considered that under the new system, it was perfectly possible to resolve the questions raised in the representation filed by FEDECAMARAS to the ILO several years ago. He insisted that the Government was not making the same promises as in previous years. Very concrete results had been achieved which showed that seminal changes had taken place in this respect and that the Government was participating actively in the machinery of tripartite dialogue, which covered the matters raised in the representation, with the aim of overcoming them.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the discussion which ensued. It recalled, once again, that the Committee of Experts had urged the Government to amend the Organic Labour Act with a view to removing the divergencies existing between the national legislation and the Convention. The Committee urged the Government to supply, in its next report, concrete information on the measures taken to apply the Convention, taking into account all the points mentioned in the Committee of Experts' observation. The Committee stressed the need to amend the number, which was too high, of workers or employers required for the creation of a trade union or employers' organization, the requirement of a too long period of residence for foreign workers to be eligible for election to trade union office, and the long and detailed list of attributions and services required by workers' and employers' organizations, since all these provisions were not in conformity with Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee regretted that the written information was sent by the Government too late to be examined by the Committee of Experts and this Committee. It expressed the firm hope that the tripartite dialogue referred to by the Government representative would permit decisive progress to be made towards the full application of the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to send detailed information in this respect in its next report.

Convention No. 95: Protection of Wages, 1949

Ukraine (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stated that the Government was fully aware that delays in the payment of wages were a flagrant violation of Convention No. 95. The main reason for the delays was the grave economic and financial situation in the country, which had also resulted in high unemployment, reduced wages and lower standards of living. The President of the Ukraine and the Government were taking resolute measures to liquidate the budgetary debt with respect to wages. The Decree of the President of 28 February 1997, No. 187 covering "measures to ensure replenishment of the state budget and strengthening of financial and budgetary discipline" established that all enterprises and organizations in the budget sector should use the available financial resources in the first place to ensure payment of wages and similar payment. The Government was systematically consulting trade unions and employers' organizations and the tripartite dialogue on this problem continued. According to the agreement reached with the trade unions in January-April 1997, 75 per cent of the state budget resources were used to finance wages and social benefits, and since May the current payments with respect to wages in the budgetary sector were being paid at the 100 per cent level. As a result of these measures, the increase of the state budget indebtedness with respect to wages had been stopped at present and as a rule current wages were paid regularly and without delays. The most serious problem remained the settling of debts accumulated in previous years, particularly after the signing of the macroeconomic memorandum with the international financial bodies aimed at controlling inflation before and after the introduction of the new national currency.

The Cabinet of Ministers guaranteed to the social partners to cover the indebtedness from the state budget with respect to wages, pensions, stipends and other social benefits for 1996 amounting to 1,489,000,000 grivnya before 1 November 1997. The timetable of the payments was agreed with the trade unions and published in the mass media. In May 1997, 82 million grivnya of debts for 1996 had already been settled.

With respect to the self-managing enterprises, the Government had accepted the suggestion of the Federation of Trade Unions of Ukraine, according to which 50 per cent of current payments into their current accounts were to be used to cover wage debts.

In addition, the Government had submitted to Parliament a draft law concerning payments on the territory of Ukraine and the fulfilment of tax obligations which directed the financial resources of enterprises to cover, in the first place, their wage debts to workers. The Government had agreed with the Federation of Trade Unions to propose to extend this provision of the draft law to cover the total amount of wages without any limits of payments.

The complex approach to this problem included a number of additional measures: the use of budgetary resources was restricted on any non-priority purposes; the incomes from privatization of state property were strictly controlled; the reform of the state administration was aimed at decreasing the number of ministries and agencies as well as a 25 per cent reduction of public employees; a number of measures were taken to strengthen discipline in collecting taxes under the supervision of inspection and judicial authorities. Since the beginning of 1997, the state labour inspection service had carried out more than 5,000 inspection visits, including over 3,000 concerning the fulfilment of the legislation on wage protection; 5,400 recommendations had been given, including 2,800 obligatory instructions, and 220 cases had been referred to tribunals. The judicial authorities, as a result of the inspections carried out this year have imposed sanctions on over 600 government officials; the overall sum of fines imposed on the government officials responsible for violating labour legislation amounted this year already to 37,000 grivnya. The analysis showed that over 40 per cent of all violations of labour legislation was concerned with the non-payment of wages.

Following the Decree of the President of the Ukraine, the contracts concluded with the managers of state enterprises now included additional requirements concerning the need to ensure the timely payment of wages and strict compliance with the timetable on the coverage of wage indebtedness. The failure to fulfil these contract requirements was considered to be sufficient grounds to break the contract at the instigation of the Ministry. The Ministry of the Mining Industry, for example, had broken, on these grounds, the contracts with the directors of nine coal conglomerates and of 34 coalmines; the Ministry of Industry had broken contracts with managers of 54 enterprises; Ministry of Transport — nine; Ministry of Forestry — with four general directors of state forest industrial complexes and 40 directors of state forest and hunting enterprises; the Ministry of Agriculture — 214 managers.

The Government understood that a definitive solution to the problem of wage indebtedness required stabilization of production and of the whole of the economy of the country. At the same time the Government also counted on strengthening cooperation with the International Labour Organization and its experts in this question as well. This was the first time that the Government had to appear before the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. Taking this opportunity the Government representative wished to thank the ILO for the efforts already deployed and to ensure that the dialogue in this Committee would attract the full attention of the Government.

The Employers' members took due note of the extensive information provided by the Government representative who had informed the Committee both about the measures which had been initiated and those which had been envisaged to improve the situation. This problem had already been touched upon in the report of the Committee of Experts where it had indicated that the problem of wage arrears was linked to the special situation of the country's transition to a market economy. It appeared, however, that the main elements of a market economy had not yet been introduced in Ukraine.

The cases of non-payment or delayed payment of wages had mostly occurred in the public sector or in enterprises owned by the State. Referring to the Government representative's statement that the necessary precautions had been taken so as to prevent such a situation arising in the future, the Employers' members pointed out that the main problem was how to pay off arrears which had accumulated until 1996. Thus, although according to the Government representative, a certain percentage of the arrears accumulated until 1996 had been paid by May 1997, there was still a considerable delay in paying the remaining amount.

In relation to the measures enumerated by the Government and cited in the observation of the Committee of Experts, the Employers' members expressed the hope that these measures would lead to the desired effects in practice. At the same time, they recalled that a free market economy was considered an integral part of a State based on the rule of law where individual workers had to be able to assert their rights and push through their claims. Convention No. 95 itself stipulated that appropriate action be provided for but it was up to the Government to define what constituted this appropriate action.

Finally, they considered that the Government should submit a detailed written report providing information on the specific level of debts and the concrete measures envisaged to avoid problems in the future. The number of inspections carried out and their results should also be shown in this report as well as details on the judicial proceedings. They expressed the hope that this Committee would not be obliged to discuss this case in the future.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the detailed information provided and noted that they appreciated the initiatives taken by the authorities as well as the Government's will to establish a dialogue. It was indispensable to discuss at least one of the cases concerning the application of this Convention which had had a determining influence on national legislation and the problems of application of which concerned several tens of millions of workers in the world. The ILO and the member States should renew their efforts to apply this Convention which the present Committee was called upon to consider on a regular basis. The problems of application stemmed, to a large extent, from the economic difficulties resulting from the transition towards a market economy, from the application of structural adjustment programmes and from the loss of market shares. However, their magnitude and persistence was aggravated by other factors such as the absence of the respect for the rule of law, of efficient control mechanisms or of procedures to claim payment of wages and damages.

Although the Government had listed Bills or decisions by the President of the Republic aiming at reinforcing the protection of wages and labour inspection or to stabilize the financial situation of enterprises, observations from workers' organizations still continued to pour in. This lent credence to the Committee of Experts' impression that, in practice, the situation had not improved. Payment of wages by promissory notes contravened both Article 3 of the Convention and the Act on Payment of Wages of 24 March 1995, but such payments continued to be used in practice.

As the Committee of Experts had clarified in its observation in this case, as well as in paragraph 73 of the General Report, the application of this Convention should comprise three essential elements: efficient control; appropriate sanctions; and means to redress the injury caused. This latter element had two components: payment of the amounts due and compensation for the losses incurred by the delayed payment. The Government should reinforce its efforts in each of these aspects in cooperation with the workers' organizations. Furthermore, it should submit to the Committee of Experts, for scrutiny, detailed information on the present situation, namely with respect to the number and nature of decisions by tribunals or other institutions concerning the regular payment of wages. It should finally also provide reports on investigations carried out, violations noted and sanctions imposed, in order to permit the Committee of Experts to evaluate the real impact of the measures taken. The Government should be encouraged to pursue a constructive dialogue with the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' member of Ukraine recalled that the right to the regular payment of wages was guaranteed by article 23 of the Constitution of Ukraine adopted on 28 June 1996, but this basic right had been violated for the past two years. According to the trade union estimate, the total wage debt at the beginning of June 1997 amounted to 4,757,200,000 grivnya, which was approximately 2.6 billion dollars. The average delay in the payment of wages was between two to three months, which prevented millions of workers from properly feeding their families. The non-payment of wages on time, as prescribed also by article 115 of the Labour Code and article 24 of the Law of Ukraine on the payment of wages, was the major factor of social unrest in the country, which was approaching the boiling point, at which time the situation would become irreversible, unless urgent measures were taken by the Government and by the employers.

In his statement, the Minister of Labour had explained the non-payment of wages by the economic and financial difficulties of the transition period, and one could not but support this point of view. However, the magnitude of the problem was aggravated by the incapacity of the Government and the local authorities to adopt measures ensuring application of the existing laws. For example, contrary to the law of Ukraine concerning the state budget for 1996, the credit side was fulfilled only at the rate of 87.6 per cent; the State had not received 4.3 billion grivnya, which resulted in the non-payment of wages, pensions and other benefits.

In this situation, the Federation of Trade Unions of Ukraine had organized on 17 October 1996 a national action of protest against the mass delays in the payment of wages, in which one and a half million people participated. Following this action the Government and the trade unions had conducted a new series of negotiations which led to the establishment of a timetable, approved by the Government, to settle outstanding debts in wages, pensions, stipends and other social benefits until 1 November 1997. Notwithstanding, the situation remained critical, with good reason to believe that this timetable would not be fulfilled. It was because nearly 11,000 enterprises, principally in the energy sector, where enormous financial resources were involved, did not pay any taxes to the state budget. The hidden deficit of the state budget of 1997 might surpass 16 billion grivnya or 8.8 billion US dollars, and would be placed on the workers' shoulders.

The Committee of Experts pointed out that Convention No. 95 required not only the full payment of wages, but also of the sums compensating the delays in the payment of wages. In this respect, the fact that the Government was postponing the adoption of the rules for compensating workers the partial loss of wages because of delays in their payment reflected their policy of always postponing matters. The Ukrainian trade unions fully understood that wages of the employees in the budget sector depended on the performance of the enterprises. Today, about 40 per cent of enterprises in Ukraine were paralysed. The Government still could not implement the economic reforms that it had announced. It placed too much hope on foreign investment, and particularly on help from the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, which promised to give substantial credits for the development of the productive sector but conditioned them on the virtual liquidation of the existing system of social protection for the workers. The trade unions have recently demanded the resignation of the Vice Prime Minister and the Minister for Economic Affairs, because of the negative impact of the economic reforms on the workers.

The Ukranian Workers' members thought that the ILO might recommend the Ukrainian Government to speed up the submission of the draft laws to Parliament, aimed at strengthening not only the administrative but also the penal responsibility in case of delays of wage payment and other violations of the labour legislation. This Committee could also ask the Government to supply, by November of 1997, the information about the settlement of wage indebtedness according to the adopted timetable. If this timetable were not respected, the Ukrainian Trade unions would organize a new nationwide action of protest and would demand the dissolution of the Government, and the adoption of reforms which would ensure for the Ukrainian workers fair and regular wages.

The Workers' member of the Russian Federation stated that this case was a terrible violation of Convention No. 95 which concealed the impoverishment of thousands of families and reduced them to starvation and marginalization. The fact that the total wage debt amounted to 2.5 months of the country's payroll and that in 70 per cent of cases workers did not receive wages for over three months, indicated that there was an economic catastrophe which might lead to social upheaval. Many workers had lost trust in the fundamental values and institutions, such as democracy, social justice, responsibility of the Government and social partnership.

The Committee of Experts rightly emphasized the need for appropriate penalties to prevent and to punish such violations, as well as measures to compensate the damages which resulted from the delays in the payment of wages in conditions of creeping inflation. The Russian trade unions fully understood the suffering of their Ukrainian brothers, because the Russian workers experienced the same problem on a much larger scale. This problem became, in fact, an inescapable attribute of transition to the market economy. In the Russian Federation, for example, the wage debt exceeded 9 billion US dollars. The speaker inquired whether the price paid by the workers of the Ukraine, the Russian Federation and Belarus, and many other countries could be justified by the aims of the so-called transition? Should the truly democratic transformations in these countries turn out to inflict such enormous sufferings on their populations? These questions still awaited a reply, including from the ILO. There were millions of Russian workers who would not understand how this same problem of a much greater scope, in respect to their country, could have been taken out of the discussion by the International Labour Conference, by invoking purely legal arguments. They considered that cases of violation of Convention No. 95 in Ukraine and in other countries would be a real test for survival of the ILO itself, showing its ability to adapt to the new realities of the changing world.

The speaker explained the views of the Russian trade unions on the approach to be taken to ensure a prompt and effective solution of the problems linked to the application of Convention No. 95 in the countries concerned, covering state regulation of prices, tax and investment policies, the fight against corruption and the establishment of the effective state supervision in the application of the national legislation and implementation of sanctions. The ILO might provide additional advisory and technical assistance to the social partners in the Ukraine and other countries concerned in all those areas, either directly or through its multidisciplinary teams. The speaker also suggested that the basic principles and responsibilities established by Convention No. 95 should be enshrined in the new Declaration on the fundamental objectives of the ILO, the elaboration of which was being discussed at the present session of the Conference.

The Workers' member of Germany supported the detailed statements made by the Workers' members. Although he acknowledged that the economic situation was difficult in the country, he emphasized that only workers bore the burden of the situation which was inequitable. In addition, extreme poverty and extreme wealth were the consequences of the present economic situation. He believed that this would create a climate of high social tension that would have a negative influence on further social and economic development. The workers affected had lost their confidence in democracy and the need for economic restructuring. He appealed to the Government to establish a system which provided for compensation for the delayed payment of wages and for severe sanctions in the case of the non-payment of wages. Finally, he recommended that the ILO and the Bretton Woods institutions examine this case together with the Government in order to ensure the establishment of a situation that was in conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' member of Niger, wished to support the different declarations concerning the inappropriate accumulation of unpaid wages which clearly contravened the Convention and which had already been denounced on several occasions. The replies by the Government to the questions by the Committee of Experts could give the impression that it had become aware of the gravity of the situation where wages were no longer paid on a regular basis to 75 per cent of the civil servants and where certain enterprises paid their wages in kind. Still, the acts and decrees which had been adopted did not seem to have had any concrete effect to judge from the continued denunciations by the trade unions of significant delays in the payment of wages. This was a factor which discouraged workers and would hardly enhance the development of the national economy. The case of Ukraine was unfortunately not an isolated case: there were numerous developing countries, in particular in Africa, who were experiencing the same type of problems with an accumulation of arrears in the payment of wages. In Niger, the Government had even proposed to pay such wages in kind. The Government should be called upon to take all necessary measures to ensure an effective application of the Convention, as the normative system might otherwise collapse.

The Government representative thanked the Committee for the positive as well as the critical statements made in connection with the major problem that his country was experiencing. He hoped that labour legislation would be fully implemented soon. He appreciated the understanding shown by the Employers' members towards the problems experienced by a country with an economy in transition. His country had also been badly affected by the Chernobyl incident. Nevertheless, he understood the concerns expressed by the Workers' member of Ukraine and gave assurances that his country would adopt the maximum possible number of necessary measures to address those concerns. His Government was determined to take action to ensure that the obligations stemming from this Convention were fulfilled. He counted on continuing a positive dialogue with the ILO.

The Committee took note of the oral information provided by the Minister of Labour and the subsequent discussion in the Committee. The Committee noted that the problem was rooted in the existing incompatibility between the practice on the one hand and the national legislation and the provisions of the Convention on the other. The Committee noted with concern that the situation had not improved, in spite of the adoption of the legislative measures described by the Government. The Committee stated that this situation could not be prolonged and urged the Government to institute control mechanisms, sanctions and means to redress the injury caused, in order to ensure a regular payment of wages. The Committee urged the Government to apply the provisions of the Convention and to submit to the ILO a detailed report before the end of the summer for the Committee to be examined at its next session. The Committee requested the Government to include in this report information on the compliance with the schedule of payment of wages pursuant to the protocol entered into between the parties. Finally the Committee sincerely hoped that next year it would be able to observe specific progress and a normalization of the situation.

Convention No. 97: Migration for Employment (Revised), 1949

Malaysia (ratification: 1964). A Government representative of Malaysia provided information to the Committee with regard to the questions raised in relation to the Convention. He reaffirmed his country's commitment to pursuing a policy of equal treatment in employment in so far as foreign and local workers were concerned. This commitment had already been reflected in the various national labour laws currently in force in the country. The Employment Act, which was the principal labour legislation governing terms and conditions of employment, made no distinction between a foreign worker and local worker. Both were equally entitled to the rights and benefits provided for under the said Act, including a weekly rest day and paid annual leave and public holidays. Where the employer provided housing facilities to his workers, foreign or local, he would have to comply with the minimum standards required under the Workers (Minimum Standards of Housing and Amenities) Act. On matters relating to safety and health at the workplace, the Occupational Safety and Health Act provided for similar protection to both local and foreign workers. On social security, foreign workers also enjoyed similar benefits as their local counterparts in such areas as paid sick leave, medical leave, termination benefits and maternity protection. Where there was a collective agreement covering the enterprise, foreign workers were equally entitled as national local counterparts to all the benefits provided for in the collective agreement. In addition, a new legal provision was being proposed to require employers to accord equality of treatment to foreign workers on terms and conditions of employment. The proposed legal provision would ensure that where a foreign worker and a local worker were employed in similar work or a similar capacity both might be offered the same terms and conditions of employment. It was therefore evident that Malaysia had complied with the Convention both in law and in practice to the fullest extent as far as circumstances permitted. However, during the past few years, a similar objection had been raised against Malaysia on just one aspect of Article 6 of the Convention, pertaining to the payment of compensation in respect of employment injury and invalidity. Malaysia's explanation and clarification on this issue in all previous sessions had been met with disapproval by this Committee. He hoped that this time Malaysia's case would meet with deeper understanding by the Committee. The change in policy by the Malaysian Government, in accordance with which a certain category of foreign workers were placed under the Workmen's Compensation Act should not be viewed as a form of discrimination against foreign nationals working in Malaysia. The change in policy had been necessitated by compelling circumstances and unavoidable reasons. In the first place, he specified that not all foreign workers had been placed under the Workmen's Compensation Act. Only foreign workers who were not permanently resident in Malaysia had been placed under the purview of the Act, whereas foreign workers who were permanently resident in the country continued to remain under the Employees Social Security Act in the same way as their local counterparts. He hoped that the Committee would take particular note of this important point, which substantiated the fact that, wherever possible and practicable, foreign workers in Malaysia were accorded equal treatment with their local counterparts. In addition, he explained that the basic difference between the Employees Social Security Scheme and the Workmen's Compensation Scheme was that the former provided compensation for employment injury and invalidity in the form of periodic payments, while the latter provided compensation in the form of lump-sum payments. For many years, all categories of foreign workers had been placed under the Employees Social Security Scheme together with nationals. However, as of 1 April 1993, the Government, after carrying out an in-depth study on the matter, had decided to transfer foreign workers who were not permanently resident in the country from the Employees Social Security Scheme to the Workmen's Compensation Scheme. It had been found that the previous system, where non-permanent resident foreign workers were placed under the Employees Social Security Scheme had been operating under tremendous administrative and operational problems. In general, non-permanent resident foreign workers worked in Malaysia under a work permit for a maximum period of three years, after which they had to return to their countries. Past experience showed that once the foreign workers had left Malaysia, extreme practical difficulties arose in obtaining accurate information from them which was urgently required for operational purposes. Even such basic information as whether the beneficiary was still alive or whether he or she had recovered from disability was difficult to obtain and verify, which gave rise to problems in deciding on the continued entitlement of the beneficiary to the periodic payments. Such problems could also cause genuine beneficiaries to be deprived of periodic payments to which they were rightfully entitled. In practice, therefore, the absence or inaccuracy of such vital information constantly threatened, not only the effective functioning of the scheme, but also its viability. It was for these reasons that non-permanent resident foreign workers had been taken out of the Employees Social Security Scheme and placed under the Workmen's Compensation Scheme, under which compensation for employment injury and invalidity could be paid in a lump sum before their departure to their home countries. The decision to place non-permanent resident foreign workers under the Workmen's Compensation Scheme had therefore been motivated by the desire of the Malaysian Government to protect such foreign workers under a scheme that best served their interests.

The intention of the Government of Malaysia to ensure that non-permanent resident foreign workers did not lose out from the change in policy was clearly reflected in the two follow-up measures taken by the Government, immediately after the transfer of these foreign workers from the Employees Social Security Scheme to the Workmen's Compensation Scheme. One of the measures taken was the amendment of the Workmen's Compensation Act to increase the level of the lump-sum compensation payable to such foreign workers by some 25 per cent. The other measure was the extension of the coverage of the Workmen's Compensation Scheme, which took effect on 1 November 1996. Before the extension, the scheme had only covered employment injury sustained as a result of accidents occurring during working hours. Following the extension, foreign workers enjoyed 24-hour coverage and protection against employment injury and invalidity arising out of accidents occurring during and outside working hours, thereby doubling the coverage and protection. To further enhance the level of protection of foreign workers, legal rules had been established requiring employers, firstly, not to dispute any claim for compensation by foreign workers and, secondly, to settle the compensation payable within seven days of the receipt of the compensation assessment from the Labour Department, thereby ensuring a litigation-free and worry-free right to compensation for foreign workers who sustained employment and non-employment injury and invalidity. Even nationals did not enjoy such protection. Under these circumstances, the contention that the value of the benefits provided under the Workmen's Compensation Scheme was substantially lower than that provided under the Employees Social Security Scheme should no longer be pursued.

He added that there were many other forms of labour protection under which foreign workers in Malaysia enjoyed equal treatment compared with their local counterparts.

The complaint against Malaysia under Convention No. 97 appeared to be based on the contention that, unless local and foreign workers were placed under the same scheme, there would be no equality of treatment between them. Malaysia's experience showed that this idealistic concept was not only impossible to implement, but also unfavourable to the foreign workers concerned. This was the reason why Malaysia had not been able to abide by the recommendations of the Committee of Experts to transfer the foreign workers back under the Employees Social Security Act. He therefore appealed to the Conference Committee to adopt a more flexible and realistic approach by giving due consideration to national circumstances, so that member States could respect and implement its recommendations.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for his clear statement concerning the matters raised by the Committee of Experts in relation to the situation in law and practice of accident compensation coverage for foreign workers in Malaysia. Although foreign workers had originally been integrated into the national social security system in the same way as national workers, they had subsequently been transferred to a different compensation scheme, under which accident compensation was dealt with in a different manner. One of the principal differences was that, under the new scheme, they were provided with a lump sum, but not periodic payments in accordance with the provisions of the Convention. Indeed, whereas the Convention required equality of treatment between foreign and national workers, this did not exist in practice. The Government representative had advanced a number of reasons for this difference in treatment in response to the comments of the Committee of Experts. When the case had been considered previously, one of the points considered had been the fact that agreements had been concluded with labour sending countries and the foreign workers concerned under which they consented to their coverage under different legislation from that covering nationals. However, the Government representative had not provided any information on this point. The Employers' members emphasized that accident compensation coverage was not a subject for negotiation. Although Article 6 of the Convention permitted a number of exceptions to the rule of equality of treatment, these exceptions did not apply in this case. The reasons now advanced by the Government representative for the change in coverage had included the fact that foreign workers normally remained for only three years in Malaysia before returning to their countries. The fact that it was then difficult to obtain information concerning these workers was important and could result, in practice, in the non-payment of their benefits. It might be possible to sympathize with the reasons advanced for the change that had been made in their accident compensation coverage. It was also possible that the new system might be less burdensome to operate. The Employers' members also acknowledged that certain improvements had been made to the accident compensation coverage scheme for foreign workers, including its extension to cover accidents occurring outside working hours and an increase in the level of the lump sum. However, information had not been provided on how the revised lump sum compared to the level of the periodical payments made to nationals of Malaysia. However, the system was not in accordance with the requirements of the Convention. The Employers' members considered that the Government should comply with the measures requested by the Committee of Experts. They believed that the Government should also explain the new elements that it had raised in its statement today in a detailed report to the Committee of Experts. The Government should take note of the fact that the situation was not fully in accordance with the requirements of the Convention and should re-examine the situation to see whether accident compensation could be structured as it had been in the past. The basic principle set out in the Convention was that foreign workers should receive exactly the same treatment as nationals, and that there could be no exceptions to that principle.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the additional information provided, and stressed that the protection and promotion of the principle of equality of treatment of workers was one of the priority objectives of international standard setting activities. The globalization of the economy stimulated both the internationalization of the markets, products, services and capital as well as the number of migrant workers. Migrant workers were one of the most vulnerable groups as regards social rights, and the international community should ensure that they were not subjected to any form of discrimination. Furthermore, ensuring that equality of treatment in employment was extended to migrant workers, certainly contributed to good relations, as well as peace among people, regions and countries. It was significant to note that, in many States, workmen's compensation for occupational injuries was one of the first branches of social security to develop and that internationally, it was one of the first topics considered by the ILO, resulting inter alia in the adoption of the Workmen's Compensation (Agriculture) Convention (No. 12), the Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention (No. 17) and the Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (No. 18), in the 1920s.

Discrimination in Malaysia against migrant workers in the context of workmen's compensation was discussed in the present Committee last year, as, since 1993, migrant workers were no longer covered by the social security system which applied to national wage earners. The compensation system envisaged for migrant workers was a lump sum benefits system rather than a system of periodic payment of benefits. When this case was discussed last time, the Government declared that the 1993 Employees Social Security Act was being amended, and that the amendments adopted would be transmitted to the ILO, which, in fact has been done. According to the Government, the amendments were intended to improve the situation, namely by increasing the ceiling on the lump-sum benefits payable to the beneficiaries. The Government was of the opinion that this legislation, on the whole, conformed to the relevant international standards and that the differences in the compensatory systems were caused by administrative difficulties, exposed in detail during this session. The present Committee noted, however, in 1996, that different methods of administering systems of compensation could not justify a difference in treatment between Malaysian nationals and migrant workers as regards the level of compensation. The amendments only increased the ceiling on the lump-sum benefits payable to the beneficiaries and thereby confirmed a discriminatory situation. In its last discussion of the case, the Committee of Experts took note of the information provided by the Government according to which certain categories of nationals were not covered under the 1993 Act, and that States sending migrant workers to Malaysia endorsed the removal of foreign workers from the ambit of the 1993 Act. Furthermore, it seemed that foreign workers voluntarily consented to this arrangement when accepting work in Malaysia. The Workers' members stressed the fact that the Convention did not permit a departure from the principle of equality of treatment in respect of benefits payable in case of an accident by way of an individual agreement or by way of an agreement with the country of origin of the migrant workers. In the terms of the Committee of Experts, the principle of equal treatment between nationals and non-nationals could not be bargained away, even with the consent of the workers concerned. A departure from basic rights was only allowed if a Convention so provided, and such was not the case in respect of Convention No. 97. Finally, while acknowledging that the legislative amendments contributed to an improvement of the situation, the Workers' members were of the opinion that equality of treatment had not yet been attained. They urged the Government to adopt new amendments which would ensure that migrant workers, the labour force necessary for the prosperity of Malaysia, would be treated on an equal footing with nationals as was the case before 1993. The Government should keep the ILO informed of the developments in this case and of the difficulties encountered in practice, and it should be recalled that technical assistance from the ILO was available upon request. They clarified that they would like to receive statistical information concerning the number and the gravity of occupational accidents suffered by migrant workers in relation to the total number of occupational accidents.

The Employers' member of Malaysia endorsed the explanation provided by the Government representative of the practical difficulties involved in providing the foreign workers concerned with coverage under the Employees Social Security Scheme, and the consequent need for them to be covered by the Workmen's Compensation Scheme. In addition to the reasons invoked by the Government representative, she indicated that, under the Employees Social Security Scheme, invalidity pensions and survivors' benefits only became due when workers had completed a certain qualifying contribution period. Foreign workers who had not met this requirement would not be eligible to receive compensation under the Employees Social Security Scheme. However, the Workmen's Compensation Scheme required no such qualifying period before compensation became payable. The coverage of the foreign workers in question by the Employees Social Security Scheme would therefore be detrimental to their interests. Moreover, she pointed out that the payment of a lump sum to these workers instead of periodic payments did not constitute discrimination. Indeed, it ensured that they were paid compensation even if they did not meet the eligibility requirements of the Employees Social Security Scheme and were paid an upfront lump sum before they left the country. In view of the particular circumstances of the case, she urged the Committee to adopt a pragmatic approach, since it was clear that the policy in question had been established for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of the foreign workers concerned.

The Workers' member of Korea pointed out that Asian countries were experiencing important labour flows which were contributing to the economic growth of the region. The workers were attracted to countries such as Malaysia, where employment opportunities as well as wages were better. In this context, foreign workers were often placed in a precarious situation and were the victims of discrimination in comparison to national workers. Since the priority of migrant workers was to find employment, they were not really concerned about the risks which they could face in their work and did not therefore worry about the consequences of an accident in the workplace. States which accepted these workers must take the necessary measures to protect such vulnerable workers against accidents. In the case of an accident, appropriate compensation, similar to that received by national workers, without any discrimination, must be guaranteed. This obligation existed even in the case of illegal foreign workers. He was therefore surprised that such agreements had been concluded by the States which sent the migrant workers and that these workers had accepted such arrangements. However, it was important to remember that migrant-sending countries were not always in the best position to negotiate.

The Workers' member of Spain pointed out that it was a matter of concern that, despite the geographical distance between Malaysia and Europe, the same problem still occurred, namely difference of treatment for migrant workers. Nevertheless there was one difference. In Europe, there was difference of treatment in practice, even though it was prohibited by national legislation and constitutions. It appeared difficult to understand that these differences existed, and yet efforts were being made to eliminate them. The Committee of Experts had observed that in Malaysia the inequalities in treatment were contained in the legislation, particularly with regard to benefits in case of work accidents, which were lower for migrant workers. He stated that this inequality could not be justified by saying that these conditions had been accepted in the country of origin of the workers. He pointed out that the only manner in which the Government of Malaysia could bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention was by eliminating any reference to difference of treatment between nationals and migrant workers. Finally, he endorsed the statements made by the Workers' members.

The Employers' member of the Islamic Republic of Iran insisted on the fact that the Committee should take a practical approach concerning the case of Malaysia, since a strict interpretation of the Convention would not be in the interests of the workers concerned. Moreover, he emphasized that the measures taken by the Government were fully in the interests of foreign workers.

The Workers' member of Malaysia endorsed the explanations provided by the Government representative and stated that the Government was doing all that was necessary to safeguard the welfare and interests of foreign workers. The fact that accident compensation coverage for foreign workers had been extended outside working hours and that compensation payments were made within a period of one week illustrated the concern of the Government for this category of workers.

The Government representative thanked all of the speakers for the interest that they had expressed in the case and took note of their comments. He did not consider that it was necessary to reply to each of the points that had been raised, but felt that instead a few words would be appropriate on the manner in which the Conference Committee approached its work. The Conference Committee dealt with cases concerning individual governments and played the role of the enforcement arm of the ILO. In so doing, it prosecuted, and even persecuted, the governments in question, who were subjected to great pressure. It was very rare in these proceedings for there to be expressions of mercy or indications of encouragement. As a result, some countries might be frightened into compliance. However, in general, most countries had become immunized. The work of the Committee was therefore becoming increasingly unproductive and even counterproductive. The question needed to be raised as to whether the Conference Committee was conducting its business in the most effective way. The Committee was of great importance and needed to function effectively all the time. A team approach should therefore be adopted to improving compliance with Conventions in order to help member States overcome problems of implementation. The Committee would therefore need to promote its role as a facilitator of progress. A distinction should also be made between genuine problems of application and real cases of violations. In particular, the member States concerned should be treated with honour and respect so that no delegates were left discouraged, and therefore demotivated.

The Employers' members expressed surprise at the reaction of the Government representative to a discussion which had appeared relatively mild, factual and appropriate to the circumstances of the case. The mandate of the Conference Committee was quite clear in this respect. The purpose of bringing cases to the Committee for its examination was to highlight and illuminate problems arising in the application of ratified Conventions and to provide assistance in overcoming such problems. This was what had occurred in this case. No speakers had allowed their interventions to go beyond the scope of the report of the Committee of Experts and the intention was to assist the Government in achieving full compliance with the Convention.

The Workers' members supported the comments of the Employers' members concerning the last intervention made by the Government representative. In the case of Malaysia, the Committee had limited itself to the execution of its mandate, as defined by article 7 of the Standing Orders, by ensuring that the provisions of the Convention were applied in practice. In this case, as in other cases, the different interventions in the Committee concerning the case of Malaysia had been of a serene nature and were fully in line with the mandate of the Committee. Finally, they recalled that they had requested the Government to indicate the difficulties encountered in the implementation of the Convention in order to seek solutions together.

The Committee noted the information given by the Government representative as well as the subsequent detailed discussion. The Committee, like the Committee of Experts, considered that the level of benefit in case of industrial accident was lower for foreign workers than for nationals. The Committee stressed that equality of treatment between nationals and foreign workers could not be bargained away, even with the consent of the workers, and that legislative amendments which had been adopted only served to increase the ceiling on lump-sum benefits and did not provide for periodic payment. It once again insisted that the Government adopt necessary measures so that foreign workers benefited from the same conditions as nationals. The Committee asked the Government to furnish detailed information to the Committee of Experts and hoped to be in a position to look at the case again next year, if it was judged appropriate.

Indonesia (ratification: 1957). The Government has supplied the following information:

1. The Government has sent communications to the ILO dated 22 September, 23 September and 26 October 1994, and 18 January 1995, and 5 September 1996. As stated repeatedly in these reports, the Government has and continuously pays great attention to the workers' protection and welfare. The existing labour laws and regulations provide adequate protection of workers' rights to organize and collective bargaining. However, the Committee on Freedom of Association has requested further information from the Government.

The right to organize in Indonesia is fully recognized under the Indonesian Constitution and laws. The 1945 Constitution, article 28, states that: "Freedom of association and assembly, of verbal and written expression and the like, shall be prescribed by law". In addition, Act No. 14 of 1969 on The Provisions Respecting Manpower, article 1, states that "All manpower shall have the right to establish and become a member of a workers' union". Other regulations that reveal the right to organize are Act No. 22 of 1957 on the Settlement of Labour Disputes and Act No. 12 of 1964 on Termination of Employment in Private Undertakings. Act No. 22 of 1957, article 2, paragraph (1), states that: "If a labour dispute arises, the trade union and the employer shall seek to settle the dispute peacefully by negotiation".

Article 3, paragraph (1), of this Act states that: "If the negotiation between the disputing parties does not result in a settlement and they do not intend to submit their dispute to be settled by arbitration to an arbitrator or Board of Arbitration, then such situation must be notified to the official in writing by both, or either one of the parties". In addition, paragraph (2) of article 3 states that: "The notification as meant in the preceding paragraph shall be regarded as a request to the official concerned, which must be granted, to conciliate and seek a settlement of the disputes".

Article 6, paragraph (1), of this Act states that: "If in a dispute one of the parties intends to take action against the other party, such intention shall be notified in writing to the other party and to the Chairman of the Regional Committee. This notification shall also give details of the outcome of negotiations on the matters in dispute between the employees and the employers concerned, as presided over or conciliated by the official or stating that a request for negotiation was rejected by the second party, or that the second party has failed twice within two weeks to respond to the invitation of the first party to negotiate on the matters in dispute".

Article 8, paragraph (1), of this Act states that: "The Regional Committee in its endeavour to settle a labour dispute shall do everything possible having regard to the law, existing agreements, custom, justice, and the interests of the State".

Furthermore, article 1, paragraph (1), of Act No. 12 of 1964 states that: "The employer shall do his best to prevent termination of employment." Yet paragraph (2) of this article mentions "Termination of employment is prohibited: (a) while the worker is not able to perform work due to sickness, certified by a doctor, over a period not exceeding 12 (twelve) consecutive months, and (b) while the worker is prevented from performing work due to his fulfilling his duties towards the State as determined by law or the government or to the performance of his religious duties as commanded by his religion and approved by government".

Article 2 of this Act states that: "If, following such endeavours, the termination of employment cannot be avoided, the employer shall discuss his intention to do so with the worker's organization concerned or with the worker himself, should the worker not be a member of a workers' organization." Article 3, paragraph (1), further states that: "Should the discussion referred to in article 2 clearly fail to bring about agreement, the employer may dismiss the worker concerned only after having obtained a permit from the Regional Committee for the Settlement of Labour Disputes (Regional Committee), respecting individual dismissals and from the National Committee for the Settlement of Labour Disputes (National Committee) respecting mass dismissals. A dismissal is considered to be a mass dismissal if, in an undertaking, the employer has terminated the employment of ten or more workers within a period of one month, or has affected a series of terminations indicative of an intention to achieve mass dismissal." Moreover, article 5, paragraph (1), of Act No. 12 of 1964 mentions: "A request for a permit to dismiss, together with the reasons for termination, shall be submitted in writing to the Regional Committee within whose jurisdiction the residence of the employer is located, in respect of individual dismissals, and to the National Committee in respect of mass dismissals. In deciding upon a request to terminate employment the Regional or National Committee, as the case may be, shall take into account the condition and development of the labour market and the interests of both the worker and the undertaking (article 7, paragraph (1)). In granting a permit the Regional Committee or the National Committee, as the case may be, may also lay down the obligations of the employer to the worker regarding severance pay, service pay and other compensation of other kinds". The fixing of the amount of severance pay, service pay and other compensation shall be laid down by Ministerial Regulation. Such regulation, to be made by the Minister of Manpower, shall also provide a wage concept formula upon which to base the payment of severance pay, service pay and other compensation.

Article 8 of this Act states that: "The worker, the employer, or the worker's or employer's organization concerned, may appeal to the National Committee against refusal by a Regional Committee to issue a permit of dismissal, or a conditional permit, within 14 days of such refusal having been received by the parties concerned. The National Committee shall deal with such appeals in accordance with the appeal procedure laid down for the settlement of such labour disputes. Termination of employment without such a permit shall be null and void, ipso jure."

2. The development of trade unions. The right of each person to organize and to express opinions, both oral and written, is secured and regulated under Indonesian laws and regulations including the 1945 Constitution. In addition, Indonesia has also ratified ILO Convention No. 98 of 1949 on the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining as stated in Act No. 18 of 1956. Act No. 21 of 1954 provides stipulations on collective agreements between trade unions and employers.

Conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association were very critical on the freedom of Indonesian workers to organize. The Government of Indonesia feels it is important to present the historical background on trade unionism in Indonesia which tended towards a consensus for unification.

During the period of Dutch colonialism, the trade union movement was initiated by Dutch employees in the Government offices and private enterprises such as the Nederlands Indische Onderwijs Genootschap, 1897, Postbond or Post Workers' Union, 1905, Suikerbond or Sugar Workers' Union, 1906, and Cultuurbond or Agriculture Workers' Union, 1907.

The early stage of the trade union movements among Indonesian workers was inspired by the national movements such as Budi Utomo or Association of Scholars led by Budi Utomo, 1908, the Serikat Dagang Islam or Moslem Traders' Association, 1911, the Partai Komunis Indonesia or Indonesian Communist Party, 1920, and the Partai Nasional Indonesia or Indonesian National Party, 1927. Along with those movements, several trade unions were established such as Perserikatan Guru Hindia Belanda or Teachers' Association, 1912; Spoorbond or Train Workers' Union, 1913; Perserikatan Pegawai Pegadaian Bumi Putera or Pawning Employees' Association, 1914; Serikat Pegawai Pekerjaan Umum or Public Works Employees' Association, 1917; and Serikat Pegawai Hindia Belanda or Government Employees' Association, 1930.

In 1919, Perserikatan Pegawai Pegadaian Bumi Putera (PPBP) organized its first congress in Bandung. The congress came to the conclusion that all existing trade unions should be united into one organization. Then they established Persatuan Pergerakan Kaum Buruh (PPKB) or Association of Labour Movements as the only federation in the country.

Secondly, soon after independence in August 1945, several groups established new trade unions. One of them was Barisan Buruh Indonesia (BBI) or the Indonesian Labour Movement. It was established on 19 September 1945 and claimed that all existing trade unions were its members. The Indonesian Labour Movement (BBI) held its first congress on 17 November 1945 in Solo. At this congress a conflict arose. One group advocated that the existing labour organizations should remain as a socio-economic movement. The second group held a congress in Madiun on 21 May 1946 and established Gabungan Serikat Buruh Indonesia (GASBI) or Federation of Indonesian Trade Unions, with the aim of raising the living standards of union members.

On 29 November 1946, GASBI and another federation of trade unions, namely Gabungan Serikat Buruh Vertikal (GASBEV), or Federation of Joint Vertical Trade Unions, merged and established an organization called Sentral Organisasi Buruh Seluruh Indonesia (SOBSI) or Federation of Indonesian Workers' Organization. In May 1947 this organization held a congress in Malang. From this time, this organization was directed towards communism and affiliated to the Partai Komunis Indonesia (PKI) or Indonesian Communist Party. It was proven that SOBSI was involved in the uprising revolt led by the Communist Party in Madiun in September 1948, as well as in the abortive coup of Gerakan 30 September/PKI or the 30 September Movement in 1965.

During the period from 1946 to 1960 trade unions grew quickly because most of the existing political parties established trade unions. The main objective of the political parties was to use these trade unions to recruit the maximum number of members in the interest of their own parties, particularly as they were facing the first general election in 1955. Since the struggle of the trade unions was apparently for the political interest of their respective parties, the struggle for the workers was neglected. At that time, a number of organizations were established. Among them were Serikat Buruh Islam Indonesia (SBII) or Indonesian Moslem Labour Union, 1947, which affiliated to Partai Masyumi or Masyumi Moslem Party; Gabungan Serikat Buruh Revolusioner Indonesia (GASBRI) or the Federation of Indonesian Revolutionary Workers, 1948, which affiliated to Partai Murba or Murba Party; Serikat Buruh Muslimin Indonesia (SARBUMUSI) or Indonesian Islamic Labour Union, 1955, which affiliated to Nahdatul Ulama or Nahdatul Ulama Moslem Party/Society; and Kesatuan Buruh Marhaen or Marhaen United Workers, 1956, which affiliated to Indonesian National Party, etc. There were approximately 150 national trade unions, hundreds of local trade unions, and seven federations of trade unions. Almost all of the existing trade unions focused on political activities, ignoring their main function, which was to improve the social welfare of the workers and their families. Therefore, in 1960, there was a move to establish the Organisasi Persatuan Pekerja Indonesia (OPPI) or Indonesia Workers' Organization to unite all existing trade unions. This was opposed by SOBSI, an organization affiliated to the Communist Party (PKI). However, in 1961, Sekretariat Bersama Perjuangan Buruh Pelaksana Trikora (Sekber Buruh) or the Joint Secretariat of Workers' Movement on West Java was established in order to unite trade unions with respect to endeavours to return West Irian to the Republic of Indonesia.

Thirdly, the Communist Party and SOBSI continued to disintegrate trade unions in Indonesia. The disintegration among trade unions increased and reached its peak with the rebellion of the 30 September Movement of the Indonesian Communist Party (G30S/PKI).

Learning from this experience, soon after the abortive coup of the Communist Party in 1966, trade union leaders realized that in order to make the trade union movement stronger, they had to unify themselves, and they should not put the trade union movement under any political party. For this reason, the trade union leaders established Keszatuan Aksi Buruh Indonesia (KABI) or the Coordinated Indonesian Workers' Movement in early 1966. KABI struggled for political goals while socio-economic aspects of trade unions in Indonesia were handled by Sekber Buruh. On 1 November 1969 the spirit of Indonesian unionism reasserted itself again through the establishment of Majelis Permusyawaratan Buruh Indonesia (MPBI) or the Indonesian Trade Union Congress. This organization was established as a forum for dialogue on labour matters and to improve the general atmosphere of the labour movement. The MPBI was based on Pancasila and the Indonesian Constitution of 1945. Its members consisted of 21 trade unions.

Freedom of expression and of establishment of trade unions in Indonesia has developed. Workers' unions are independent and obviously do not depend on, nor are they influenced by, any organization or party. This shows great progress up to early 1973 when most trade unions in Indonesia were part of political organizations or parties. Their movement very much depended on political parties. As a result, the trade unions were unable to create and to implement sound industrial relations, and were unable to struggle for the improvement of workers' social welfare.

In the 1970s, the Government of Indonesia encouraged the leaders of all political parties to simplify their organizations. The parties finally agreed to reduce the number of political parties. Several parties merged to establish Partai Persatuan Pembangunan or the Development Unity Party and several others merged to establish Partai Demokrasi Indonesia or the Indonesian Democratic Party. The Functional Group or Golongan Karya (GOLKAR) also operated as a political party. This simplification had an effect on the trade unions, as most lost their parent bodies in the political parties. In this situation, the MPBI held a seminar in Tugu on 21-28 October 1971. All representatives of trade unions participated in the seminar and reconfirmed the necessary characteristics of the labour movement in Indonesia as follows:

— firstly, the labour movement must not be influenced by any political parties;

— secondly, trade union activities must be focused on socio-economic issues;

— thirdly, the existing trade unions must be reorganized and united through persuasive approaches;

— fourthly, the organizational structure of the labour movement must be improved; and

— fifthly, trade unions must not depend on external budget resources.

The seminar successfully exposed the idea of focusing the labour movement on its proper functions, responsibilities, and unification. As the follow-up to this seminar, the MPBI held a plenary meeting on 24-26 May 1972 to discuss reformation and simplification of the existing trade unions. They were encouraged to merge and establish one new organization of workers.

The determination to establish a single trade union federation in Indonesia was expressed in the Declaration of All Indonesia Workers' Unity in Jakarta on 20 February 1973, and following that, the Federasi Buruh Seluruh Indonesia (FBSI), or Indonesian Workers' Federation, was established. The trade union leaders agreed to set up a new system of trade unionism based on the following provisions:

— workers' organizations or trade unions were based on industrial sectors or trade;

— no trade union should affiliate to any political party;

— there should be only one trade union in each enterprise affiliated to an appropriate Serikat Buruh Lapangan Pekerjaan (SBLP) or industry-based trade union.

All existing 21 trade union federations agreed to merge into FBSI, namely:

(1) Gabungan Serikat-Serikat Buruh Islam Indonesia (GASBINDO, Federation of Moslem Workers' Organization);

(2) Kesatuan Buruh Pancasila (KUBU PANCASILA, Pancasila Workers' Union);

(3) Konsentrasi Nasional Gerakan Karya Buruh (KONGKARBU, National Concentration of Workers' Movement);

(4) Gabungan Organisasi Buruh Serikat Islam Indonesia (GOBSII, Federation of Moslem Workers' Society Organization);

(5) Kesatuan Buruh Marhaenis (KBM, Marhaenis Workers' Union);

(6) Kongres Buruh Islam Merdeka (KBIM, Independent Moslem Workers' Congress);

(7) Sentral Organisasi Buruh Republik Indonesia (SOBSI, Central Organization of Workers of the Republic of Indonesia);

(8) Gerakan Buruh Muslim Indonesia, (GERBUMI, Indonesian Moslem Workers' Movement);

(9) Gabungan Serikat Buruh Indonesia (GSBI, Federation of Indonesian Labour Union);

(10) Serikat Buruh Muslimin Indonesia (SARBUMUSI, Indonesian Moslem Labour Union);

(11) Persatuan Karyawan Buruh Indonesia (PERKABI, Association of Indonesian Workers);

(12) Kesatuan Pekerja Kristen Indonesia (KESPEKRI, Association of Christian Workers);

(13) Federasi Buruh Islam Indonesia (FBII, Federation of Moslem Workers);

(14) Persatuan Organisasi Buruh Islam Indonesia (PORBISI, Association of Indonesian Moslem Labour Organizations);

(15) Federasi Buruh Kerakyatan Indonesia (FBKI, Workers' Association of Indonesian Common People);

(16) Sentral Organisasi Buruh Pancasila (SOB PANCASILA, Central Organization of Pancasila Workers);

(17) Ikatan Karyawan Muhammadiyah (IKM, Muhammadiyah Workers' Association);

(18) Kongres Buruh Seluruh Indonesia (KBSI, Congress of all Indonesian Workers);

(19) Kesatuan Karyawan Buruh (KEKARBU, Association of Workers);

(20) Persatuan Guru Republik Indonesia (PGRI, Indonesian Teachers' Association);

(21) Serikat Pekerja Pegawai Pos, Telepon dan Telegraf (SSPPT, Post, Telephone and Telegraph Trade Union).

The Government appreciated the consensus of the abovementioned trade union leaders and issued Manpower Ministerial Decision No. 286 A/DDII/DPHK/1974 on 11 March that recognized the FBSI as the only "Federation" in Indonesia, as the result of the merger of the previous federation and trade unions.

Since the establishment of the FBSI, trade union leaders have endeavoured to strengthen the unionism of Indonesian workers through the new organization. Consolidation and reformation of workers' organizations continued as the organization of workers needed to be based on industrial sectors or professional fields. The FBSI represented Indonesian workers at both national and international levels.

In its early stage, the FBSI consisted of 19 Serikat Buruh Lapangan Pekerjaan (SBLPs) or industrial-based trade unions. However, in 1973 the Congress of Indonesian Teachers' Association (PGRI) declared itself an independent professional organization and left the FBSI. Then, in 1976 the Congress of Serikat Buruh Transport (Transportation Workers' Union) split into three SBLPs namely the Serikat Buruh Angkutan Jalan Raya or Inland Transportation Workers' Union, the Serikat Buruh Angkutan Sungai, Danau dan Ferry or River, Lake and Ferry Transportation Workers' Union, and the Serikat Buruh Transport Udura or Air Transportation Workers' Union. As a result there were 21 SBLPs namely:

(1) Serikat Buruh Pertanian dan Perkebunan (SBPP, Farm and Plantation Trade Union);

(2) Serikat Buruh Minyak, Gas Bumi dan Pertambangan Umum (SBPMU, Oil, Gas and Mining Trade Union);

(3) Serikat Buruh Rokok dan Tembakau (SBRT, Cigarette and Tobacco Trade Union);

(4) Serikat Buruh Makanan dan Minuman (SBMM, Food and Beverage Trade Union);

(5) Serikat Buruh Tekstil dan Sandang (SBTS, Textile and Cloth Trade Union);

(6) Serikat Buruh Perkayuan (SBP, Wood Trade Union);

(7) Serikat Buruh Percetakan dan Penerbitan (SB Perpen, Printing and Publishing Trade Union);

(8) Serikat Buruh Farmasi dan Kimia (SBFK, Pharmacy and Chemical Trade Union);

(9) Serikat Buruh Logam dan Keramik (SBLK, Metal and Ceramic Trade Union);

(10) Serikat Buruh Asembling Mesin dan Perlengkapan (SBAM, Machine and Equipment Assembly Trade Union);

(11) Serikat Buruh Karet dan Kulit (SBKK, Rubber and Leather Trade Union);

(12) Serikat Buruh Elektronik (SBE, Electronic Trade Union);

(13) Serikat Buruh Bangunan dan Pekerjaan Umum (SBBPU, Building and Public Works Trade Union);

(14) Serikat Buruh Niaga, Bank dan Asuransi (SB NIBA, Commerce, Bank and Insurance Trade Union);

(15) Serikat Buruh Pariwisata (SBPAR, Tourism Trade Union);

(16) Serikat Buruh Maritim (SBM, Maritime Trade Union);

(17) Serikat Buruh Pelaut Indonesia (SPI, Indonesian Seafarers' Union);

(18) Serikat Buruh Angkutan Jalan Raya (SBAJR, Inland Transportation Trade Union);

(19) Serikat Buruh Angkutan Sungai, Danau dan Ferry (SBASDF, River, Lake and Ferry Transportation Trade Union);

(20) Serikat Buruh Transport Udara (SBTU, Air Transportation Trade Union);

(21) Serikat Buruh Kesehatan (SB KES, Health Trade Union).

The Government appreciates the attitude and spirit of the trade union leaders to be associated in one federation, the FBSI. During its Second National Congress held in Jakarta on 26-30 November 1985, the FBSI agreed on a decision to change the name and organizational structure of FBSI to a unitary organization to be called the Serikat Pekerja Seluruh Indonesia (SPSI) or All Indonesian Workers' Union. As the continuation of the FBSI established on 20 February 1973, the SPSI now moved to merge the workers' unions of the various industrial sectors. The SPSI is a professional organization of workers based on Pancasila.

The objective of this organization is to unify workers and to foster a sense of collective purpose of workers, to protect and maintain workers' interests and rights, and to improve social welfare and conditions of work. Meanwhile, the SPSI has a responsibility to mobilize workers to fulfil their obligations, as well as to be disciplined, productive, innovative and responsible.

The SPSI was set up as a unitary organization with only one central executive board consisting of nine departments, namely:

(1) Department of Agriculture and Plantation;

(2) Department of Metals, Electronics and Machines;

(3) Department of Textiles and Garments;

(4) Department of Tourism, Food and Beverages;

(5) Department of Pharmacy and Health;
(6) Department of Chemicals, Energy and Mining;
(7) Department of Trade, Banking and Insurance;
(8) Department of Public Works and Forestry;
(9) Department of Transportation.

As a result of this restructuring, there were several trade union leaders who were not elected as executive members of the SPSI or to any position in a department. They became frustrated, and then made every effort to come back to the old organization in the form of a federation. Some of them established a trade union called "Sekretariat Bersama SBLP" (Joint Secretariat of SBLP), and the others established "Serikat Buruh Merdeka Setia Kawan" (Independent Trade Union of Solidarity). Both organizations had no members or followers and no longer survive.

The Third National Congress of SPSI in November 1990 decided to restructure SPSI by changing the nine departments to 13 sectoral unions. Each sectoral trade union has its own central and regional executive board. Meanwhile, the provincial and district executive boards of SPSI retain the function as coordinators of the sectors at regional levels. The return to a federation structure together with the establishment of independent and democratic industrial sector-based unions was agreed as the way forward to facilitate the creation of close relations between workers and their unions and of more effective representation. These changes were reconfirmed by the Board of Executives of SPSI at its national meeting held in October 1994. The sectoral trade unions are:

(1) building construction and public works;
(2) timber;
(3) trade, banking and insurance;
(4) publishing and printing;
(5) tourism;
(6) food, beverages and cigarettes;
(7) chemicals, energy and mining;
(8) metal, electronics and machines;
(9) textiles, garments and leathers;
(10) transportation;
(11) seafarers;
(12) agriculture and plantations;
(13) pharmacy and health.

In November 1995, the SPSI held the Fourth National Congress. Prior to that Congress, each sectoral trade union held its respective national conference. The conferences of: Cigarettes, Tobacco, Food and Beverage Trade Union held on 2 August 1995; Wood and Timber Trade Union on 23-27 August 1995; Building Construction and Public Workers' Trade Union on 12-15 September 1995; and the other nine sectoral trade unions held their national conferences in September 1995. The culmination of those activities was the Fourth National Congress of SPSI held in November 1995. In the framework of improving workers' understanding of their rights and obligations, the SPSI has set out a Doctrine for Indonesian Workers, which emphasizes that in executing their rights, workers should also realize their obligations. They should realize that workers and employers have mutual interests and common goals.

In conclusion, it was the decision of the trade union leaders to set up their own organizations whether as a federation, unitary or a confederation. On several occasions, they tended to unite into one trade union or federation.

Factory-based independent trade unions

In response to both domestic and foreign criticism on the freedom of workers to establish their own organizations, the Minister of Manpower issued Regulation No. 1 on 17 January 1994. Based on this regulation, workers may establish an independent and democratic union in each company freely and without any requirement of affiliating with another trade union. According to the data available, presently, there have been about 1,200 independent unions at the company level. The newly established company union is only required to submit information on its organization status and members of its executive to the Ministry of Manpower. At the same time, soon after the union is established, it is able to perform its functions and negotiate with employers for drafting collective agreements. Each factory-based trade union can stay as an independent union without necessarily affiliating with the FSPSI, or it may decide to join the FSPSI. As an independent union, each factory-based trade union is not encouraged to join a political party or other association. Each individual worker has, of course, the right to express his political aspirations through political parties. Each worker is also eligible to join existing relevant professional associations such as the Indonesian Economists' Association, the Indonesian Engineers' Association, the Indonesian Public Administration Association, and others. However, such political organizations and professional associations should not be involved in handling labour or industrial relations problems in certain companies or to take over or to duplicate the function of a trade union.

The essence of Conventions Nos. 87 and No. 98 is that all workers in each company have the right to establish trade unions. The main purpose of that trade union is to negotiate with employers for better standards of living for those workers and their families. These criteria have been followed by the FSPSI and the 1,200 independent factory-based trade unions or Serikat Pekerja Tingkat Perusahaan, SPTP.

Serikat Buruh Sejahtera Indonesia

The so-called Serikat Buruh Sejahtera Indonesia was formed in April 1992 by elements of political parties, the human rights movement and legal aid. So far we have not been able to prove that this organization is established by the workers or their representatives at the company level. Moreover, we have not been able to prove that its objective is to pursue collective labour agreements. From its inception up to the present, evidence shows that the SBSI is more concerned with politics than labour issues. The court will decide whether the SBSI has a right to exist or not.

Therefore, if the SBSI should exist, it should be categorized as a non-governmental organization rather than a trade union. As an NGO, it may follow Law No. 8, of 1985, on the Principles of Social Organization. As an NGO, SBSI, of course, may have particular programmes relating to labour issues such as to empower trade unions through workers' education, to help trade unions in court, etc., but it should not duplicate or take away the roles and functions of trade unions.

Manpower policy within the last four years

(1) In executing its role and function, particularly in the Sixth Five Years Development, the Government issues a manpower policy called "Sapta Karya Tama Pelita VI" (Seven Priorities of Manpower Policy in the Sixth Five Years Development). This policy contains seven priorities as follows: manpower planning; information systems and integrated labour market; professional independent young labour force; apprenticeship programme; industrial relations and protection of workers; overseas employment services; organizational development, development of productivity centre, reformatic training, and workers' cooperative. Recently, the last three priorities were added, making ten priorities or "Dasa Karya Tama".

(2) Under Act No. 3 of 1992, the scope of the workers' social security programme is expanded, i.e. to include a health insurance scheme. In addition, Act No. 11 of 1992 requires employers to include their workers in a pension fund scheme. Each company is also obliged to set up a committee for occupational safety and health.

(3) The Regional Wage Committee, whose members are drawn from tripartite elements, has long been established in each province. This committee conducts surveys on the minimum physical needs (MPN) and submits recommendations on setting the regional and sectoral minimum wage. Based on those recommendations, the regional minimum wage has been increased from time to time. It is recorded that the average minimum wage increased from 48.5 per cent of MPN in 1990 to 63.6 per cent of MPN at the end of 1993, to about 92.49 per cent of MPN in 1996. The regional minimum wages (RMW) in effect since April 1997, increased by more than 10 per cent on average as compared to the RMW of 1996.

(4) Participation of workers' and employers' organizations in various institutions have continuously increased such as in the bipartite bodies, national and regional tripartite bodies, national and regional committees for labour dispute settlement, national and regional committees on occupational safety and health, national and regional training councils. The workers' unions continuously and actively exercise their rights through formulation of collective labour agreements in each company.

(5) Government, employers' and workers' organizations have closely established cooperation through their own programmes and activities to promote, develop, and draw community awareness to create a conducive climate for industrial peace and company development. It takes a long time to make employers and workers, as well as the industrial community, aware of their obligations in implementing such industrial relations.

The strategic steps taken in this respect are the following:

— consistent implementation of law enforcement;
— establishment of organizational unit of SPSI at company level (UK-SPSI), factory-based trade union (SPTP) and of collective labour agreement (CLA);
— settlement of industrial disputes based on the existing regulations;

— improving the function of the bipartite cooperative body;

— paying more attention to the social welfare of workers and establishment of committees on occupational safety and health (P2K3).

Law enforcement

There are about 160,000 companies in the country employing 10 persons or more. There are about 1,300 labour inspectors including 350 who have structural occupations and 950 who have operational occupations. Labour laws are enforced based on direct visits of inspectors, as well as on company reports submitted as required by Act No. 7 of 1981. In 1996, inspectors conducted direct visits to over 3,000 companies. Based on these inspections it was found that 1,600 companies in 1996 violated the existing provisions on working norms; 28 of them were brought to court and were fined, and 1,572 were issued a warning letter.

Development of industrial relations

There are about 60,000 companies in Indonesia employing 25 workers or more. Of those companies, organizational units of SPSI (UK SPSI) were established in 12,750 companies covering 2.14 million workers. In addition, independent factory-based trade unions (SPTP) were established in about 1,200 companies covering about 60,000 workers. Employers' associations of Indonesia (APINDO) were established in 292 districts covering 2,000 companies. Collective labour agreements were agreed and formulated in about 11,000 companies covering about 2 million workers.

In 1996, there were 890 strikes involving about 500,000 workers, resulting in the loss of over 5 million working hours and of US$ 1 million.

Industrial disputes

The number of industrial disputes handled by the Industrial Dispute Settlement Committee at central level (P4P) during November 1996 was three cases, two of which have been settled. Industrial dispute settlement is regulated under Act No. 22 of 1957. Meanwhile, the cases of termination of employment handled by this committee during November 1996 were 111 involving 2,712 workers; in October 1996 there were 153 cases involving 1,179 workers. Among 264 cases in October and November 1996, 115 cases involving 2,228 workers have been settled. Settlement of termination of employment is regulated under Act. No. 12 of 1964.

Social welfare

Implementation of a minimum regional wage has been recently regulated under Manpower Ministerial Decision No. 2 of 1996. This decision is designed to improve the social welfare of workers where the basic calculation is according to minimum life needs. In November 1996 no companies applied for postponement of the implementation of a minimum regional wage. However, up to November 1996, the total number of companies applying for postponement of the implementation of a minimum regional wage was 797.

Up to December 1996, the membership in Workers' Social Security Scheme/Programme (ASTEK) was 65,778 companies covering 10,316,520 workers.

The number of workers' cooperatives as of December 1996 was 5,291 and the number of family planning programmes at the company level was more than 2,400 units covering about 111,000 workers.

Committee on Occupational Safety and Health

Committees of Occupational Safety and Health (P2K3) were established in about 11,000 companies as of December 1996. In 1996 there were 2,080 cases of occupational accidents, resulting in 1,686 injuries and 41 deaths.

In addition, Government representatives informed the Committee that, in response to the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association at its session in November 1996, the tripartite partners in Indonesia had conducted a series of meetings to consider the amendment of a number of Ministerial Regulations referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts, including Ministerial Decision No. 438 of 1992, Ministerial Regulation No. 3 of 1993 and Ministerial Regulation No. 1 of 1994. New draft legislation to replace the above provisions were now in the process of completion. However, they believed that before discussing the legal provisions in detail, it was necessary to provide the Committee with information on the historical development of trade unionism in Indonesia. In so doing, they referred extensively to the written information submitted on this case. Referring to a number of articles quoted from the Constitution and several labour laws, they stated that there were extensive provisions protecting the right of workers to organize and to bargain collectively.

They explained that the purpose of providing complete information on the historical development of trade unionism in Indonesia was to ensure the Conference Committee of the commitment of the Government of Indonesia to accommodate and protect the interests of Indonesian workers and of the consensus that they reached through their organization. The information provided showed that trade unionism in Indonesia was not static, but responded to the changing national and international environment. Trade unions in Indonesia were open to change, bearing in mind their struggle for unity and their concerted efforts for the betterment of their members. In this light, the workers, employers and Government in Indonesia had intensively reviewed several labour laws over the past three years which they realized were no longer relevant to present and future economic and social conditions.

Following the holding of a series of meetings and the completion of the necessary procedural steps, a new Bill on manpower had recently been submitted to Parliament. The Bill was expected to be an umbrella law covering and refining the provisions of Act No. 1 of 1951 bringing the Labour Act into operation, Act No. 21 of 1954 on the Conclusion of Collective Bargaining Agreements between Trade Unions and Employers, Act No. 22 of 1957 on the Settlement of Labour Disputes, Act No. 12 of 1964 on Termination of Employment in Private Undertakings and Act No. 14 of 1969 on the Basic Provisions respecting Manpower. The new Bill was more comprehensive, simpler and more concise, more flexible and easier to understand than the previous legislation. In this context, they noted that it was the custom of the parliamentary system in Indonesia to invite the views of society, and particularly of related institutions and organizations, on draft legislation. Several NGOs and institutions had organized a workshop to discuss the Bill, the results of which would be submitted to Parliament.

In response to the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Indonesian tripartite partners had agreed to draft a single Ministerial Regulation to cover the three Ministerial Instruments referred to above. The tripartite partners had agreed in this respect that the following principles should be contained in the new regulation: trade unions at the company level should be established by the workers for the workers at that company; trade unions should be established on a voluntary and democratic basis; trade unions at the company level could remain as single independent trade unions or could join a national industrial trade union; and single independent unions at the company level could directly conduct negotiations with employers only by sending notification of their establishment to the regional office of the Ministry of Manpower. Consensus still needed to be achieved on a number of matters, including the definition of democratic principles for workers and the issue of whether a company-level trade union belonging to an industrial trade union should be registered at the company level or through its national headquarters. The Government representatives were optimistic that these matters would be resolved in a relatively short period of time.

In conclusion, they emphasized that all Indonesian laws were available to public and international institutions. The ILO Office in Djakarta would have access to any legislation that was not supplied directly to the Committee of Experts by the Government. However, they took the opportunity to submit a copy of Act No. 8 of 1974, regulating the terms and conditions of employment of public servants, to the Conference Committee.

The Employers' members recalled that the issue of the application of Convention No. 98 by Indonesia had been raised on many occasions by the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts. The last occasion on which the case had been discussed by the Conference Committee was in 1995. The observation by the Committee of Experts was basically a repetition of earlier comments. The problems in question related to the application of the Convention in both law and practice. The situation was aggravated by practical problems in individual cases involving the extreme use of force of all kinds. Many of these individual cases were described in the report that the Committee on Freedom of Association had submitted to the Governing Body. It was a matter of particular concern that in these cases the persons concerned had been treated in a manner which was not at all in line with the provisions of the Convention. This failure to give effect to the Convention in practice was symptomatic of the fact that it was not correctly applied in law. It was therefore unfortunate that the lengthy statement by the Government representatives had contained only historical information on the development of trade unions, but had largely failed to address the questions raised by the Committee of Experts in its report and the Conference Committee in 1995.

Referring to the lack of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, the Employers' members noted that workers could be dismissed on the ground of lack of harmony in industrial relations, and that in practice trade union membership could be considered to constitute such a lack of harmony in industrial relations. Although there existed a Ministerial Regulation of 1992 which provided that membership of a trade union could not constitute a reason for dismissal, these provisions did not appear to be implemented in practice. Even though the Committee of Experts had pointed to the need to simplify and clarify the legal provisions in this respect, no new information had been provided by the Government representatives on this point.

Referring to the comments of the Committee of Experts on the need to adopt specific legislative provisions to protect workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations, the Employers' members stated that the regulations to which the Government representatives had referred did not contain sufficient protection in this respect. Better legislation was therefore needed to provide more effective protection.

On the question of the restrictions placed on free collective bargaining, the Employers' members noted that workers' organizations needed to cover a particular number of enterprise units in order to be able to engage in collective bargaining. Even though the Convention itself did not contain detailed provisions on this issue, such requirements were placed at a very high level so that collective bargaining became almost impossible in practice. Nevertheless, the Employers' members acknowledged that, since this question had been raised in the 1991 report of the Committee of Experts, the requirements in question had been reduced. They therefore recognized that some movement had been made in the right direction, although more rapid change was required. They regretted, however, that the Government representative did not provide new information in this respect.

The Employers' members had understood from the statements made by the Government representatives that the consultation process with regard to the new Bill on these matters was near completion and that the proposed legislation would soon be submitted to parliament. However, the Government representatives had not provided information on whether the problems referred to by the Committee of Experts would be addressed and resolved by the new legislation. Furthermore, although the Government representatives had provided the Conference Committee with a copy of Act No. 8 of 1974, regulating the terms and conditions of employment of public servants, it should be pointed out that such legislation should have been provided to the ILO many years ago. It was also to be regretted that the Government of Indonesia had not availed itself of ILO technical assistance to address these problems at an earlier stage and that the Government representatives had not taken advantage of the opportunity provided by this discussion of the case to respond to the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Employers' members suggested that technical assistance from the ILO might help to speed up the process of improving the application of the Convention, both in law and in practice. There was a great need to amend the legislation and the Government should endeavour to take the necessary action.

The Workers' members noted with regret that the case of Indonesia had been discussed in 1979 and four times during the 1990s, namely in 1991, 1993, 1994 and 1995. Notwithstanding the direct contacts mission which had taken place in November 1993, the situation remained preoccupying. The Committee on Freedom of Association, which had dealt with this case a number of times, had formulated very severe conclusions in which it deeply deplored and emphasized the gravity of allegations which had showed that the general situation had not improved, but continued to be characterized by increasingly serious violations of fundamental human rights and trade union rights in Indonesia. The terms used by the Committee of Experts reflected its grave concern. It insisted, in particular, that the Government should indicate the measures taken to strengthen the protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination and that it adopt specific legislative provisions to protect workers' organizations. The Workers' members deplored that the Government's reply, although long, did not contain any information in response to the repeated requests made by the Committee of Experts. Furthermore, they noted that the written and oral replies of the Government contained significant contradictions. While the Government insisted on the independence of the trade union movement in relation to the political parties, the SPSI, the official trade union, was closely directed and influenced by the authorities. In addition, in qualifying the SBSI as a non-governmental organization, the Government was in direct contradiction to the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, which urged the Government to eliminate immediately all obstacles preventing the recognition and registration of the SBSI as a trade union. The members of the SBSI and its leaders were systematically subjected to anti-union measures, such as arrests, imprisonment or harassment. In the period since the Committee on Freedom of Association had examined the case, the list of allegations of anti-union measures had lengthened. According to the information that had been obtained, many local trade union leaders of the SBSI had recently been intimidated by the police or the army. The chairman and the vice-chairman of the local SBSI organization in Binji had been arrested and interrogated. During the course of 1996, the activists and leaders of different branches and regional federations of SBSI had been intimidated and their property often confiscated. The chairman of SBSI, Mr. Muchtar Pakpahan, had been arrested on 30 July 1996 in spite of the fact that the Supreme Court had acquitted him and that all legal charges against him had been dropped. He had been kept in detention for over a year in spite of his poor health.

The Workers' members endorsed the observations of the Committee of Experts. The system of industrial relations in Indonesia was such that the anti-union measures against organizations which escaped Government control had become normal practice. The information and statistics supplied by the Government on the increasing number of collective agreements and trade unions at the company level did not prove either the true nature of the trade union movement or the success of collective bargaining. Indeed, it was necessary to take into account the content of these agreements to verify that they actually covered conditions of work and wages. According to information available to the Workers' members, the provisions of the draft law referred to by the Government representatives were in breach of Article 3 of the Convention by authorizing greater interference by the public authorities. The Workers' members deplored the fact that the Government had not replied to the precise questions raised by the Committee of Experts and insisted that Indonesia take the necessary measures in the very near future to bring its legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention. They emphasized that the Government could benefit from the technical assistance of the ILO in this respect. They stated that the authorities must free the imprisoned trade unionists, particularly Mr. Pakpahan and cease acts of anti-union violence and intimidation. Finally, they proposed that serious consideration should be given to sending a mission to Indonesia in the very near future and that this case should be examined once again next year to identify any progress achieved. If no progress was made, they suggested that the case of Indonesia should then be included in a special paragraph.

The Workers' member of Indonesia provided the Committee with some additional information on Ministerial Decree No. 438 of 1992 concerning the guidelines for the establishment of workers' unions in a company. The decree made no reference to dismissal or regroupment, but merely regulated the method of establishing workers' unions at the plant level. It stipulated that where there were 25 workers at the respective company, such workers could form a union by themselves without any intervention from third parties.

The speaker also said that the national convention of the All Indonesia Workers Union (SPSI) in September 1995 had concluded that there was an urgent need to reform and restructure the Indonesian trade union movement to make it more effective and professional in its efforts to protect the interests of workers. There were now 13 industrial unions affiliated to the new Federation (FSPSI). The national convention of the SPSI had also decided to urge the Government to review much of its labour legislation in accordance with recent economic developments. Based on this conclusion, the Indonesian Government had submitted to Parliament a Bill on manpower which revised eight existing labour Acts and six ordinances. The FSPSI had submitted its first response to the Bill, which covered, among other matters, dispute settlement machinery, compulsory and voluntary arbitration, mediation and conciliation, the establishment and recognition of unions, the Tripartite Consultative Council and the Bipartite Consultative Council, women workers, child labour, wage protection, employment relations, the contract of employment, the informal sector and migrant workers. The FSPSI had also conducted a three-day workshop, attended by the representatives of some NGOs and by academics, leading to the preparation of further comments. A further seminar would be held for the preparation of the final draft of the Bill. The National Tripartite Joint Consultative Body had also discussed the possibility of reviewing Ministerial Decree No. 438 of 1992, as well as Ministerial Regulation No. 3 of 1993 on workers' union registration and Ministerial Regulation No. 1 of 1994 on the establishment of in-house unions. There were still some differences of opinion on the criteria for establishing unions, the structure of industrial unions (including independent unions), the right to bargain collectively and other trade union functions to further the interests of the workers. The National Tripartite Joint Consultative Body also intended to organize a workshop to examine how universal principles could be set out in the new ministerial regulation on the right of workers to join unions, workers' participation in the industrial relations framework as well as their right to training, to a fair wage and to collective bargaining. In view of this progress, there were good grounds for believing that the Tripartite Joint Consultative Council would be ready to undertake a permanent review of labour legislation in an era of economic globalization, without harming the values and way of life of society.

The Government member of Iceland, on behalf of the Governments of Finland, Denmark, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, the United Kingdom and Iceland, deplored the growing number of violations of human rights at workplaces. Both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, in its 1996 examination of Case No. 1773, used strong words to express their deep concern with regard to the persistent and continuing violations of trade union rights in Indonesia and, more precisely, the seriousness of allegations referring to the murder, disappearance, arrest and detention of trade union leaders and workers. The Governments of the Nordic countries, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom shared this deep concern and strongly urged the Government of Indonesia to take all necessary measures to bring the situation into conformity with the provisions of Convention No. 98. Finally, the personal situation of the SBSI President, Mr. Muchtar Pakpahan, raised serious concern. He expressed their common wish to join those who had already appealed to the Government of Indonesia so that his civil, political and trade union rights be respected in every way.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands recalled that this case had been examined on twelve occasions by the Committee of Experts and on five occasions in the Conference Committee. Moreover, the Government had not furnished the detailed report requested by the Conference Committee in its conclusions to the long discussion held in 1995. In 1996, the Conference Committee had deferred discussion of the case due to severe time constraints. However, the Government had misrepresented this to its national press as proof that the ILO was now satisfied with the manner in which the Convention was implemented in the country. The Workers' members had, in 1996, expressed the wish to include the case of Indonesia on a list of cases for discussion in 1997. They were particularly concerned that the Government had stated time and time again that the criticism of the Committee of Experts, since 1979, was unfounded. He pointed to a certain inconsistency in the points raised by the Committee of Experts in its reports since 1979. Certain issues, such as the role of the army in dispute settlement and in labour matters in general, had been raised on some occasions, but not others. The same was true as concerned the denial of the right to organize for workers in the public sector.

With regard to the protection of workers against anti-union discrimination, the Government had denied over the years that there were any problems with the relevant legislation and had stated that new legislation was not necessary, as the law afforded good protection against anti-union discrimination. Nevertheless, for almost 20 years the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee had been telling the Government that this was not the case. In this respect, he noted that additional information supplied by the Experts, workers and employers had been ignored. It was not in this manner that such a case should be dealt with by government in the ILO supervisory system. Current examples of anti-union discrimination included the dismissals of SBSI and AJI (Independent Journalists' Association) members and activists by their employers.

On the question of protection against acts of interference by employers, the only development registered was the revision of Ministerial Decision No. 1109 of 1986 by Decision No. 438 of 1992. The Government, which had previously maintained that the 1986 Decision afforded adequate protection, had then implicitly said the contrary in 1993 by admitting that it was no longer compulsory for workers to obtain permission from their employer to set up a union. Moreover, despite the fact that both the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee considered that the revised Indonesian legislation continued not to provide adequate protection against acts of interference by the employer, the Government refused to take any further action. By way of illustration of the influence exercised by employers over trade union activities in practice, he informed the Committee that the president of SPSI from 1985 to 1995 had been the president of the employers' federation for the textile industry in West Java at the time he was elected to his trade union position.

The situation was identical as regards restrictions to collective bargaining. The Government had stated that its legislation was not in conflict with the provisions of the Convention and that the Committee of Experts did not understand the national conditions in member States. Despite changes to the excessive requirements for the registration of trade unions set out in Ministerial Regulation No. 5 of 1987, the new Regulation, No. 3 of 1993, still contained formidable obstacles which, according to the Committee of Experts, were in violation of the Convention. In fact, what the Government had done was to create a trade union monopoly for the FSPSI and its sectoral unions, similar to what had existed in Eastern European countries before 1989. In 1995, the Conference Committee had urged the Government to dismantle all restrictive registration requirements for the establishment of trade unions.

Not only had the Government shown very little political will to adopt the changes to the law requested by the ILO for almost 20 years but its record of application of the Convention in practice was appalling. It had also engaged in crude and brutal violations of the Convention in practice for many years. Over the past five years, it had relentlessly harassed, intimidated, arrested, jailed and victimized leaders, activists and members of the SBSI, a trade union to which the Government refused to grant recognition. The fate of its general chairman, Muchtar Pakpahan, was widely known, despite the fact that the Governing Body had repeatedly stated that Mr. Pakpahan was a genuine trade union leader who should be released forthwith and allowed to continue with his trade union work. Another example was that, based on the official State doctrine of the "dual function" of the army, retired military personnel continued to take positions in the government-backed trade union central organization, the FSPSI, and its sectoral unions. After denying this practice for years, the Government had later argued that it was the right of retired army personnel to take employment, become members of a union and be elected to trade union office. However, the real situation was that these army pensioners were selected for these functions by a special army department in view of the Government's preoccupation with security. Finally, he recalled that the security forces continued to interfere brutally in strikes and workers' demonstrations. Indeed, the presence of police and security personnel at trade union meetings and other activities was so widespread that it was almost considered to be a fact of trade union life.

Although the Government maintained that workers were free to set up their own company trade unions, it had been confirmed to him that if such trade unions expressed the intention to join the SBSI, their existence would immediately be forbidden.

Despite the acceptance by the Government of a direct contacts mission in November 1993 and a subsequent technical assistance mission, it had to be concluded that the few changes in legislation made by the Government did not go far beyond developments of a merely cosmetic nature, as the representative of the US Government had stated in 1995. He urged the Government to ask for ILO advice on the text of the new Bill submitted to Parliament, and to bring the ILO's views on the proposed legislation to the attention of the Indonesian Parliament. He fully subscribed to the conclusion drawn by the Workers' Vice-Chairperson while drawing attention to the fact that among the jailed trade unionists there were three leaders and activists of the Independent Journalists' Association (AJI).

The Workers' member of Thailand stated that the history of this case illustrated well the attitude of governments in his region. The case provided a pertinent and topical example of both the Indonesian Government's insensitivity to working people in local circumstances in Indonesia. The Chairperson of the Worker's group had already covered many aspects of the case, but he wished to concentrate on the SBSI and its general chairman Muchtar Pakpahan. As concerned the SBSI, the authorities had refused to register the SBSI on several occasions, even though it had fulfilled the necessary criteria. He recalled that the Committee on Freedom of Association had urged the Government to remove immediately all obstacles to registration and to the official recognition of the SBSI. He stressed that Muchtar Pakpahan had been arrested on 30 July 1996 on charges which alleged that he had been linked to the serious civil disturbances of 27 July 1996. Charges of subversion could result even in the death penalty. Yet, even though the official Indonesian Human Rights Commission said that the Government and its security forces were responsible for the July civil disturbances, Muchtar Pakpahan remained in prison. All legal experts following the trial which started in December 1996 considered that Muchtar Pakpahan was not granted a fair trial and that basic rules of justice were violated. The trial continued until he was hospitalized. After concerted national and international pressure, he was authorized to be treated in a civilian hospital, as long as he personally paid expenses. The Government had indicated that the trial would resume as soon as he was able to go back to prison. It was clear that these legal procedures and multiple sentences were linked directly to his union activities. In addition, many union members and members of SBSI were frequently harassed, interrogated and deprived of their freedom. He concluded by insisting that the necessary measures be taken to change the legislation and national practices to bring them into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. Unless significant progress was noted, he proposed, like several other speakers, that Indonesia be mentioned in a special paragraph in the examination to be made by this Committee in 1998.

The Government member of the United States emphasized the long-standing concern of his country regarding this case. Based on the observation of the Committee of Experts, along with the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1773, he expressed his concern that sufficient progress had not been made. In some respects, there was even reason to fear that the situation was worsening. The case of labour leader Muchtar Pakpahan was particularly troubling and he called upon the Government of Indonesia to ensure that he received adequate medical treatment. Both the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts pointed out that there were significant and long-standing weaknesses in Indonesian labour law, coupled with serious problems of enforcement of the legislation. Such a situation led, inevitably, to human rights violations the likes of which had been presented in some detail. He strongly urged the Government of Indonesia to continue the process of consolidating and amending its labour law, and to ensure that the new legislation was in full conformity with Convention No. 98, as well as other core labour standards. He recalled that technical assistance was available from the ILO in this respect. In addition, he strongly urged the Government to take immediate steps to prevent violence and other anti-union measures against Indonesian trade unionists. Convention No. 98 could not possibly be fully applied in an atmosphere where basic human rights were not first protected and promoted. He stressed that his Government would not hesitate to recognize and condemn the Indonesian Government's violations of fundamental workers' rights and human rights and strongly hoped that positive steps would be taken as quickly as possible by the Government of Indonesia to improve respect for the rights of workers.

The Government member of Canada expressed concern over the findings of the Committee of Experts with regard to the situation in Indonesia and stressed the importance that her country attached to the case of Mr. Muchtar Pakpahan, and in particular the necessity that he received just and fair treatment in any legal proceedings, as well as adequate medical care. This issue had been raised repeatedly with the Indonesian authorities by the Embassy of her country in Djakarta, as well as by the Department of Foreign Affairs, including at the ministerial level. She urged the Indonesian authorities to respect fully their obligations under the ILO Constitution and under ratified Conventions.

The Workers' member of France regretted that for a number of years the Committee of Experts had reported intolerable acts of interference with regard to the right of workers to freedom of association in Indonesia, in enterprises at both the regional and national level. The report contained allegations of serious anti-union discrimination, including intimidation, interrogation, molestation, illegal custody, imprisonment, dismissal and even the disappearance of members of the SBSI. These were not isolated incidents. These acts had become systematic and concerned the entire Indonesian territory. The Government, through the police, the army, and unidentified employers' groups, regularly put pressure on workers who wanted to form unions. If they did not renounce this right, individual or collective dismissal followed. On several occasions the local unions were ransacked and files taken or destroyed. The arrest and imprisonment of Muchtar Pakpahan came about as a result of such systematic anti-union policies. Since his first imprisonment in 1995, Mr. Pakpahan had been in jail for nearly one year, charged with endangering the security of the State. He was still detained to this day, and his failing health had become life-threatening. Despite the censure by international trade unions and various interventions made by European governments and NGOs, no action had been taken by the authorities. The speaker added that none of the reasons provided by the Government of Indonesia elucidated the serious and repetitive violations of the terms of Convention No. 98, ratified in 1957. The Indonesian Government must clearly account for these deliberate acts against the right of workers to freedom of association and to collective bargaining and not limit their arguments to more general accusations. This was especially true for the acts of anti-union discrimination against the leaders of the SBSI. Moreover, the president of the SBSI, Mr. Muchtar Pakpahan must be freed immediately. Finally, the Indonesian Government must adopt very rapidly specific provisions which would bring their legislation in line with the provisions of the Convention. It was regrettable that the information furnished by the Government was not more explicit; this cast a doubt on its seriousness.

The Workers' member of Japan emphasized the serious nature of the case, which related to violations of the rights of workers and the labour movement. Countries which ratified the Convention had the obligation to bring their law and practice into conformity with its provisions. Although the report of the Committee of Experts had raised four principal points and the Government had been requested to respond to them, it had not provided specific information on these matters, nor had it taken action in practice to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee of Experts. An important measure of the Government's willingness to adopt measures to give meaningful effect to the Convention in law and practice would be an improvement in the situation as concerned the right of public servants to bargain collectively. It was perhaps due to the legacy of Asian dictatorships that many people in the region looked to the public service as a model of employment. If the Convention was not applied in full to public servants, this would provide an excuse for employers to impose restrictions in the private sector. The Government should endeavour to play the role of a good employer which respected international labour standards, and particularly the right to collective bargaining in the public sector, in accordance with the Convention. He hoped that the Government would respond to the requests of the Committee of Experts in a rapid and faithful manner on these very serious points by taking the necessary measures to implement the Convention.

The Workers' member of Colombia, stated that, in spite of the declarations of good will made by the Government representatives, the workers were very concerned at the persistence of the anti-union policies in Indonesia. In the developing countries, there was frequently a tendency for undue interference in the activities of workers' organizations, restrictions on the right to collective bargaining and the submission of trade unions by employers. This phenomenon was attested to by the Committee of Experts in the case of Indonesia. He emphasized that these restrictions on the right of freedom of association and collective bargaining were unacceptable. He emphasized that national development could not be achieved without respect for workers' rights and expressed serious doubts about the positive industrial relations climate described by the Government representatives. With regard to the numerical restrictions imposed by the legislation in order to have free access to collective bargaining, he stated that these measures could not be described in any way as protecting the right to collective bargaining. Nor was it possible to speak of respect for freedom of association, when the official practice was to resort to intimidation and aggression, through detention and the confiscation of property. He hoped that the Government would free the trade union activists and leaders and that it would give full guarantees of the exercise of trade union rights.

The Workers' member of Pakistan joined with other speakers of the Workers' group and indicated his deep preoccupation concerning the situation of workers' rights in Indonesia. This preoccupation was even greater because Indonesia should, given the importance of the seat it held on the Governing Body, be an example for other governments. Whereas on the contrary, for a number of years, the Committee of Experts, the Committee on Freedom of Association and this Committee had noted serious violations of the principles of freedom of association, in law and in national practice. More precisely, the Committee of Experts had brought to light the contradictions between legislation and the provisions of the Convention which protected workers against anti-union discrimination, interference by employers or their organizations with regard to union activities, and restrictions on the right to collective bargaining. The Committee on Freedom of Association had emphasized the seriousness of violations of workers' rights committed by public authorities who had systematically resorted to anti-union measures including dismissal, arrest, harassment and other physical or mental violence. He insisted that the Government take the necessary measures, without delay, to amend the legislation so that it conformed to the provisions of the Convention and pleaded that the Government liberate jailed union members immediately, recalling that trade unions could function only where democratic values were properly respected.

The Government member of Germany declared that he fully supported the statement of the Government member of Canada.

The Government representative of Indonesia welcomed the time available for discussion of this case. His delegation had endeavoured to provide the Committee with as much information as possible in order to improve its understanding of the whole situation in Indonesia. However, in order to cover all the matters raised by the previous speakers, including information on individual cases, he welcomed the opportunity to respond to the points that had been raised during the discussion.

The Government representative stated, that, in response to several delegates' requests for information on particular cases, information had been communicated on related questions raised during the Committee's discussions in 1994 and 1995, and to the Committee on Freedom of Association. This information would not be repeated: the information provided on this occasion had been limited to the topic under discussion. Those who were interested in having access to the information should consult the Office. His delegation had been advised by the Secretariat to provide general information on this occasion and to submit information relating to individual cases to the Committee on Freedom of Association. This explained why the written information provided had not contained information on individual cases. It was also for that reason that 4 copies of information concerning individual cases had been submitted for disbursement to the Workers' and Employers' groups, the Chairperson and the Office.

In response to the comments made by the Employers' members, the speaker stated that the information presented was intended to respond to the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association, as they appeared in the report of the Committee of Experts. The conclusions asked the Government to refine 3 Ministerial regulations. His delegation had stated that the tripartite partners had discussed and drafted a new regulation to cover the 3 regulations mentioned. It had also to be noted that the tripartite partners had been involved, over the last 3 years, in formulating draft labour legislation.

Also in response to the comments of the Employers' members, he said that his delegation had already confirmed in 1995 that all workers at the enterprise level had the right to establish trade unions and only needed to provide notification so that they could be registered and engage in collective bargaining. The restrictions referred to by previous speakers were no longer applied, with the result that there were now hundreds of independent unions at the company level which concluded collective agreements. There was no requirement for such unions to be affiliated to the SPSI. Trade unions could therefore exist on their own at the company level. His country had engaged in a tripartite process for the refinement of existing legislation, including the development of one ministerial regulation to cover the three previous regulations. It was the objective of tripartite consultation to seek consensus positions on what was best for the country, particularly in a situation of great change, when laws and regulations might no longer be relevant to current and future national needs. Tripartite consultation had led up to the submission of a Bill to Parliament, which would in turn invite the opinion of the people on the subjects that it covered. The SPSI had formulated its opinion on the provisions of the Bill and had organized a workshop on that matter. It was to be hoped that a Bill could be adopted that would take into consideration the best way of protecting the interests and rights of workers. In this respect, while appreciating the value of ILO advice, he made it clear that the function of the ILO was not to draft legislation for every country.

He disagreed with the Workers' members that there had been an increase in violations of the provisions of the Convention. The information on the historical background of the trade union movement in his country had been provided to explain the aspirations of Indonesian workers to unity and concerted effort. They believed that their country could be strong if it were united. Although the case of Muchtar Pakpahan was often raised by officials from foreign governments, trade union organizations and the ILO, he stated that they could have the opportunity to meet him. He was being treated in a very good hospital by the best doctors and he informed the Committee of the telephone number at which he could be reached. He reminded the Committee that Mr. Pakpahan was being held under criminal charges and that his case was not related to trade union matters.

In response to the comments made by the Workers' member of the Netherlands on the involvement of the security forces in dealing with demonstrations and riots denoted as labour issues, the speaker referred to the information provided to this Committee in 1994 and 1995 which had explained: the division of work between the security forces and the Ministry of Manpower; the way to distinguish labour and industrial relations issues from political issues and personal interests; and the way to distinguish individual cases from the policy of the Government. It was necessary to have a good understanding of the history. Most Indonesian workers had directly experienced great suffering and hardship due to the lengthy oppression of the colonial power and during the revolution. The colonial power played the strategy of divide and conquer and the conditions were made even worse and painful because some Indonesian traitors did not feel guilty in betraying their fellow Indonesians. That explained why Indonesia tended to maintain unity and why the security forces were traumatized by the continuing efforts to exercise the policy of divide and conquer.

The speaker stated that, after having observed the work of the Committee for 12 years, it appeared that, if a problem arose between a government or its security forces and an organization, the Committee had a tendency to put into question the government or the security force. The Committee had never examined whether the organization concerned observed good conduct or not. It was to be wondered why the Committee tended to put into question the security force, even though it was conducting its role correctly, but not the organization which was not observing good conduct.

He cited a number of examples from his personal experience to prove that meetings were held freely and without interference from the police or security services. Where workers' organizations were engaged in legitimate activities, they had nothing to fear from these forces. He regretted that many speakers had reached erroneous conclusions on this matter due undoubtedly to misperceptions and misinformation. The SPSI would be ready to substantiate the fact that the action of the police and security forces did not amount to interference in trade union activities.

The Employers' members, although recognizing that the Government representatives had provided the Committee with information, were not convinced that it was the right type of information or that it was related to the problems raised by the Committee of Experts. With regard to the comments of the Government representatives concerning the desirability of trade union unity, they recalled that this was a matter to be decided upon by the workers themselves. Single trade union organizations only became problematic when they were imposed by the government. Indeed, the intention of the Convention was to prevent such situations. The Employers' members therefore requested the Government to respond to all of the points raised by the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association and to send all of the relevant information to both bodies. The Government representatives had indicated that Indonesian legislation might not be perfect. This could be due to misunderstandings of the requirements deriving from the Convention. It would therefore be very useful if the Government would agree to receive detailed technical assistance from the ILO on the matters raised by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members considered inadmissible the declaration by the Government representative concerning Mr. Muchtar Pakpahan and other trade union leaders. In order to maintain the position that the problems raised did not concern the application of the Convention, the Government held on to a reasoning according to which the SBSI represented a security risk only on the ground that it was not recognized by the SPSI. The reasoning was unacceptable as, according to the Committee on Freedom of Association, the SBSI fulfilled all the conditions required for being recognized as a trade union. The content of the debate in the present Committee demonstrated that this case was well known and that it troubled the members of all three groups, as it touched upon basic workers' rights. It was all the more regrettable that the Government had continued for several years only to provide evasive responses to the Committee of Experts. The Government representative had expressed the hope that the present Committee would close the discussion on this case. But, in order to do so, the Government should provide detailed and complete responses, in writing, to the observations by the Committee of Experts and finally give effect to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on Freedom of Association as well as the conclusions adopted two years ago by the present Committee. Regarding the Bill that had been mentioned, the Workers' members had at their disposal distressing information and the Government should also provide full information on this subject for consideration by the Committee of Experts.

The Committee took note of the information communicated by the Government representative and of the detailed debate which subsequently followed. The Committee further noted that the Committee on Freedom of Association had expressed that not enough protection existed against acts of anti-union discrimination, nor against interference by employers in the functioning of workers' organizations and that serious restrictions remained on the right to bargain collectively. The Committee observed with deep concern that the discrepancies between the Convention on the one hand, and legislation and national practice on the other, had continued for many years. The Committee also observed that the Government had not given sufficient proof of a willingness to comply with the provisions of this core Convention, as it had not requested technical assistance in this respect. The Committee expressed its deep concern over this situation and asked the Government urgently to amend the legislation and to report on the measures taken or envisaged in this respect. The Committee urged the Government to ensure full respect of the civil liberties essential for the full implementation of the Convention. The Committee voiced its wish to be able to examine this case next year.

Morocco (ratification: 1957). A Government representative expressed the wish of his Government to engage in a sincere and constructive dialogue with a view to finding effective solutions to the problems arising in the application, in practice, of the principles of international labour Conventions. Such solutions could only be reached through an understanding and objective assessment of the means used to implement these principles. He provided the Committee with information on measures taken to respond to the observations of the Committee of Experts on the application of the Convention. In his reply to the first observation of the Committee of Experts which emphasized the need to strengthen the legislative provisions of the Dahir of 1957 in order to guarantee in law, and in practice, adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, he stated that section 8 of the draft Labour Code expressly prohibited any discriminatory measure based on trade union membership or participation in trade union activities. He then described the different stages in the preparation of a draft Labour Code and the consultations held with the social partners to obtain their comments and emphasized that its adoption was a Government priority.

He noted, in particular, that Parliament had held an extraordinary sitting in order to review certain draft legislation, including the Labour Code. The Parliament was not able to adopt the text during that sitting and it was given priority during the regular sittings when 23 review sessions were devoted to it by the competent Parliamentary Committee. He stressed the divergence of views between the social partners with regard to certain points raised in the Code and noted, particularly, that his Government had the majority and could put it to a vote. But, in a desire for concertation and dialogue and at the insistence of certain trade unions, it had been decided to continue a further examination in the framework of a tripartite committee set up for that purpose.

With regard to the observation by the Committee of Experts on the protection of workers' organizations against interference by employers in trade union activities, he acknowledged that the Dahir concerning trade unions did not expressly prohibit such interference, since this fundamental principle had to be respected at all times. A violation of this principle could be brought to court. Indeed, any act of interference was contrary to the objectives of the Dahir. Moreover, he stated that during the review of the draft Labour Code by the Parliament, a proposed amendment to prohibit such interference had been submitted by certain deputies and the Government was willing to accept this.

As regards the observations on the measures taken to encourage collective bargaining, he recalled the legislative provisions of the Dahir of 1957 on collective bargaining, which allowed collective agreements to be concluded, without restriction, as a means of settling working conditions. He then referred to circulars sent in 1990 and 1996 to the Governors of various Prefectures and provinces of the Kingdom, as well as to regional delegations on employment, asking them to reactivate the provincial conciliation committees and to make the social partners aware of the importance of collective agreements by providing them all with the necessary technical assistance. Moreover, he emphasized the importance of the dialogue begun with the social partners in the context of a permanent national tripartite committee for social dialogue which led to the signature of a joint declaration which constituted a genuine social charter. In this declaration, the parties undertook to respect labour law and the right to freedom of association, and to work for the rapid ratification of Convention Nos. 87 and 135. With regard to the settlement of labour disputes, he underscored the positive and encouraging results of the regional committees and of the National Conciliation and Arbitration Committee, which had met regularly since September 1996 to resolve collective labour disputes. He emphasized the role played by the Consultative Council created in 1994 to follow the social dialogue. This Council was presided over by a senior magistrate who was also President of the Supreme Court, and included representatives of the Government and professional organizations of employers and workers.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for his extensive statement. They noted that this case had been taken up on a number of occasions by the Committee of Experts and had been discussed by the Conference Committee in 1987, 1988 and most recently in 1994. During the discussion in 1994, the Employers' members had pointed out that the Government representative was saying essentially the same things stated already in 1987, when he had announced that a draft Labour Code had been prepared and was being submitted to Parliament for adoption in the near future. The Government representative had once again said very much the same when informing the Committee that the process of preparing the draft Labour Code had commenced in 1992, as well as in his description of the process of its amendment and examination. However, it appeared that there was not yet a foreseeable date when the draft Labour Code would be adopted. Moreover, no information had been provided on its scope. The Employers' members also referred to the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association on Cases Nos. 1687 and 1691, which had been adopted by the Governing Body in November 1986 and which had been particularly critical of the low level of willingness shown by the Government to cooperate. In his statement, the Government representative had provided a good deal of information on the efforts that had been made to introduce the draft Labour Code to Parliament, but very little information on its contents or when it might be expected to be adopted.

The Employers' members referred to the three points raised by the Committee of Experts in its report. With regard to the need to adopt measures to encourage and promote voluntary collective bargaining, the Government representative had referred to a number of circulars that had been issued. The Employers' members suggested that the Government should submit these circulars and all related documentation to the Committee of Experts so that it could examine their contents and likely impact on the matters under examination. The Government representative had also referred to the joint declaration adopted by a tripartite body that had been set up in 1996. This information should also be provided to the Office in a detailed written report.

In conclusion, the Employers' members noted that, despite years of endeavour, no noteworthy improvement had been achieved. Although the establishment of the above tripartite body might constitute progress, it was not the same as the adoption of the necessary legislation. In the opinion of the Employers' members, the Government required not only technical assistance, but should also envisage the possibility of inviting the Office to send a direct contacts mission to achieve progress in the situation after the case had been examined for so many years by the various supervisory bodies of the ILO.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information that he had provided and recalled that this case had been discussed in the Committee in 1987, 1988 and 1994. The Committee of Experts had been making very serious observations for many years concerning the absence of legislative provisions to guarantee in law and practice adequate protection for workers against anti-union discrimination, the absence of legislative provisions to protect organizations of workers against acts of interference by employers or by organizations of employers, and the poor functioning of collective bargaining procedures for the determination of the conditions of work, including wages. The Committee on Freedom of Association had also received numerous complaints concerning serious problems of anti-union discrimination and obstacles to collective bargaining. He noted the continued widespread violation of the provisions of the Convention in both law and practice. In accordance with the constitutional obligations of all member States of the ILO, a government that was confronted with such problems of application had to take all the necessary steps to find solutions, and to bring the law and practice into conformity with the provisions of ratified Conventions. Collaboration with national workers' and employers' organizations and with the ILO may be very useful in such cases. In this context, they wondered whether the Government of Morocco had really made all the efforts required to ensure the adoption of the draft laws under discussion. They recalled that, during the discussions in this Committee in 1988 and 1994, the Government representative had stated that a new Labour Code had been prepared. They deplored the fact that no information had been received as to the status of this draft legislation. In this regard, the Committee on Freedom of Association, in case No.1825, which had been examined in March 1996, had noted that the Government had not replied, despite the fact that the allegations were of serious violations of the principles of freedom of association. According to information that they had obtained, acts of anti-union discrimination were frequent in all sectors of activity. One survey had shown that 1,193 trade unionists, members of the Moroccan Workers' Union (UMT), had been dismissed because of their trade union activities and their membership in that organization. Of those workers, 240 were elected representatives who were executives in trade union offices. They emphasized that those revealing figures concerned only the private sector in 14 cities and testified to systematic recourse to discrimination against unions. It was in this context that the Committee of Experts had requested the Government, in a footnote, to furnish full particulars to the Conference.

The Committee had suggested in 1994 that use be made of the ILO's technical assistance and that a direct contacts mission should be undertaken. They deplored the fact that the Government had not responded positively to these suggestions and urged it once again to state clearly whether it would accept a direct contacts mission and if the necessary measures would be taken to give effect to the conclusions of such a mission. The fact that no progress had been noted since the first examination of the case by the Committee made it necessary to adopt such a measure. They observed that the response of the Government would have a direct effect on the nature and the form of the follow-up action taken by the Conference. Finally, they insisted on the importance of taking sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against individuals and entities which had committed acts of anti-union discrimination and asked the Government to provide all the necessary information, including the information referred to during the discussion, so that the Committee of Experts could make an exhaustive examination of the case.

The Workers' member of France, who was also speaking on behalf of the Workers' member of Morocco, thanked the Government representative for the information that he had provided. He recalled that Morocco had not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), or the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), which could, in part, explain the situation that prevailed in the country. Nevertheless, Morocco had ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), which had led to the current discussion in the Committee. Even though the right to organize was recognized in the Moroccan Constitution and legislation, the consistent behaviour of the administration and government authorities depleted these texts of any meaning. The authentic, independent and free trade union movement, particularly in the form of the Moroccan Workers' Union (UMT), was the victim of constant acts of aggression of different types. The UMT had been the victim of anti-union discrimination, including the dismissal of trade union officers and their arrest by the public authorities. As reported by the Workers' members, in 1996, according to incomplete preliminary figures, some 1,193 UMT militants had been dismissed, of whom 242 were elected representatives. These arbitrary measures had been taken against activists in all regions and sectors.

Presenting a list of grievances or striking was automatically considered to be a reprehensible act. Even though the list of violations of freedom of association was long, certain flagrant cases merited citing. The first concerned government offices, where UMT union leaders had been transferred or downgraded because they had invited workers to join them in a simple, non-violent act of demonstration, namely the wearing of arm bands. The second was that of a hotel chain where the union secretary had been dismissed for having made a statement on public television following a strike. The upsurge of targeted retaliations, their frequency and gravity illustrated the discriminatory character of the conscious and deliberate policy to methodically decimate the UMT, dismantle its structures, demoralize its members and dissuade them from becoming members or participating in its activities. Large numbers of trade unionists had been charged, arrested and detained under the terms of section 288 of the national Penal Code, which provided for the imprisonment of anyone who tried or who succeeded in organizing a collective work stoppage. The application of this provision was subject to a very broad interpretation by the administrative authorities. In addition, in conformity with another provision of the Penal Code, trade unionists were subjected to forced labour, in violation of fundamental international labour standards as set out in the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105). The Government and the Prime Minister of Morocco had been urged to take the necessary measures to repeal these provisions, although no response had yet been noted to the appeal.

The second type of anti-union discrimination to which the trade union movement was subjected in Morocco was even more treacherous and insidious and consisted of dividing unions. Contrary to Article 3 of the Convention, the free and independent trade union movement was being undermined by the establishment of trade unions by the administration or by political parties. Nineteen such central organizations had already been created in Morocco, with a view to weakening the independent authentic trade union movement. One political party even had two central trade union organizations. This situation was not only contrary to the provisions of the Convention, but also to those of a crucial ILO resolution of 1952 on the independence of the trade union movement from any authority.

He emphasized that Moroccan workers had the right to be protected against anti-union discrimination. With regard to the right to collective bargaining, he recalled that this right constituted an important element of the right to organize, because without collective bargaining the right to organize was rendered theoretical and abstract. The social dialogue organized by the Government would be little more than a formal exercise until the fundamental issue of trade union rights was resolved. In this respect, he pointed out that the labour legislation referred to by the Government representative had been formulated unilaterally, without consultation, concertation or negotiation. He therefore insisted that the Government take the necessary measures as soon as possible to ratify Conventions Nos. 87 and 135, which were indispensable to make Convention No. 98 operational. Finally, he requested the Government to indicate the number of employers who had been subjected to legal proceedings or sanctions for abuse of power in relation to illegal dismissals, and to state the precise date envisaged for the ratification of Conventions Nos. 87 and 135.

The Workers' member of Italy stated that the information provided by the Government representative bore no relation to reality. There was an ongoing process aimed at the dissolution of trade unions. This situation was detrimental to democracy and contrasted with the assertions of the authorities that they were seeking to strengthen democracy. Furthermore, the situation of workers had deteriorated due to the economic transformations, the reduction of social protection in large enterprises and the expansion of the informal and service sectors. Labour law was almost exclusively applicable in practice to the public sector and to large enterprises, in a situation in which labour inspection had rather limited means at its disposal to cope with the very many violations of trade union rights and labour law. Conditions of work were set almost unilaterally by employers. However, the Government could demonstrate a real will to promote social dialogue by deciding to ratify Conventions Nos. 87 and 144. Such a step would permit an improvement in law and practice and would bring them into full conformity with the provisions of Convention No. 98. Explanations also needed to be provided for the interference by public authorities in trade union activities.

The Workers' member of Senegal endorsed the statement by the Workers' member of France concerning the importance of the ratification by Morocco of Conventions Nos. 87 and 135. However, he expressed certain doubts as to whether the Government really intended bringing national law and practice into conformity with the Convention under discussion. He noted that no significant progress had yet been observed in spite of the time that had elapsed since the first examination of this case by the Committee. Workers continued to be subjected to anti-trade union measures in violation of Article 1 of the Convention. He finally urged the Government to indicate clearly when it planned to adopt the legislation, which had been discussed at such length.

The Government representative thanked all those who had taken the floor and stated that he had listened with an open mind to all the comments and observations that had been made. He reiterated his firm intention to defend the principles set out in the Convention, namely to combat anti-union discrimination and interference in the activities of workers' organizations and to promote and encourage collective bargaining. With regard to the ratification of Conventions Nos. 87 and 135, he recalled that he had referred in his first intervention to the joint declaration concluded with the social partners, which specified the Government's commitment to ratify these basic instruments. He also considered that the joint declaration went further, since the social partners had also undertaken to create the conditions necessary for such ratifications. He considered that it was of the utmost importance to cooperate with the ILO and said that all technical assistance offered in this respect would be very welcome. As regards the question of anti-trade union dismissals, he emphasized that, in the context of the dialogue between trade unions and the Government, a tripartite committee had been set up which was responsible for examining all the cases of dismissal that the trade unions considered to be contentious. The committee had already proposed positive solutions in certain cases which had been examined. As regards the exact date for the promulgation of the draft Labour Code, the Government representative emphasized that it was the workers' organizations that had requested that the draft be subject to a tripartite discussion. Following the comments made by different organizations, including the ILO, a new draft Code had been prepared. As the parties had not succeeded in reaching agreement on all questions under consideration a committee had been set up to resolve the outstanding issues. The Government representative noted that technical assistance from the ILO would be quite appropriate in this context. Finally, with regard to the joint declaration, the Government representative stated that it had been signed by all the parties concerned. He was ready to transmit a copy thereof to the Office for examination by the Committee of Experts. He would keep the Committee of Experts informed of the outcome of the negotiations within the above Committee. He recalled that the draft Labour Code contained provisions relating to each of the principles in the Convention, namely the prohibition of anti-union discrimination and interference in trade union activities, as well as the promotion and encouragement of collective bargaining.

The Workers' members referred to two points that had been emphasized by the Government representatives. In the first place, they noted that the Government representative had, on numerous occasions, placed the responsibility for the delay in adopting the draft Labour Code upon workers' and employers' organizations. They also noted that the Government representative had expressed a readiness to adopt any suggestion made with a view to improving the situation in his country. In this context, they recalled that the Workers' and Employers' members had already proposed a direct contacts mission in 1994. No effect had been given to that suggestion, which was even more appropriate at the present time. They therefore called upon the Government to give a clear indication of its willingness to receive a direct contacts mission in the very near future.

The Employers' members endorsed the statement by the Workers' members that it would now be appropriate for the Government to invite the Office to send a direct contacts mission to address the problems raised by the supervisory bodies in relation to the application of the Convention. However, the Government representative had only referred to technical assistance. He undoubtedly knew the difference between technical assistance and a direct contacts mission, and his statement would therefore have to be construed as a rejection of the possibility of inviting a direct contacts mission.

The Government representative stated that his Government was ready to accept ILO technical assistance and added that this assistance was already being provided by the multidisciplinary advisory team (MDT).

The Employers' and Workers' members noted that the Government representative had not clearly indicated whether he would accept a direct contacts mission, as already proposed by the Committee in 1994. Given the importance of the case, they therefore called for the case to be included in a special paragraph of the report of the Committee.

The Committee noted the information provided by the Government representative and the debate that followed. The Committee recalled that it had discussed this case on several occasions in 1987, 1988 and 1994. The Committee noted that both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association had criticized the divergencies between law and practice in relation to the provisions of Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. Despite the fact that the Government had undertaken to submit a draft Labour

Code to Parliament to bring its legislation into full conformity with the Convention, the Committee was bound to regret with deep concern the numerous complaints concerning measures of anti-union discrimination and interference in trade union activities submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee urged the Government to supply the above text so that the Committee of Experts could examine whether its provisions guaranteed adequate protection to workers against acts of anti-union discrimination and to workers' organizations against acts of interference, and whether they promoted the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements for the determination of terms and conditions of employment. The Committee once again urged the Government to indicate in its next report whether the draft Labour Code and the draft Law on the Settlement of Collective Disputes, to which it had referred, had been adopted. The Committee expressed the firm hope that it would be able to note substantial progress in this respect in the very near future. The Committee regretted that the Government had not accepted the proposal to invite a direct contacts mission, as the Committee had requested the Government to do three years ago. The Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its report.

The Government representative indicated that the Government was willing to accept ILO technical assistance and that a technical cooperation programme was in fact in progress with the multidisciplinary team. In the circumstances, the invitation to accept a direct contacts mission was being neither accepted nor rejected.

Convention No. 100: Equal Remuneration, 1951

Nepal (ratification: 1976). A Government representative of Nepal insisted that, at present, no wage discrimination between men and women in organized tea plantations was allowed. Article 11(1) of the 1990 Constitution of Nepal stated that "All citizens shall be equal before the law" and article 11(3) added that "the State shall not discriminate between citizens on grounds of religion, race, sex, caste, tribe or ideological conviction or any of these". With regard to remuneration, article 11(5) further stated that "no discrimination in regard to remuneration shall be made between men and women for the same work". While the provisions of the Constitution are quite clear, he specified that there were two types of ownership of tea plantation estates in Nepal: some were owned by the public sector and others by private interests. In public estates, workers received equal wage without discrimination. Steps were taken by the Government to ensure that a similar situation prevailed in private tea plantations. For instance, in line with the recommendations contained in the report of the ILO mission to advise on wage fixing and equal pay (presented to the Government in 1993), after tripartite consultations and agreement, his Government constituted a tripartite minimum wage-fixing committee which had already fixed the minimum equal wage for tea plantation workers, whether male or female. Second, studies and surveys had been encouraged to identify if any wage discrimination based on sex existed in the privately owned tea plantations. The Government strengthened its monitoring and supervision mechanism in this regard. In conclusion, he recalled that the Minister of Labour in Nepal was an active trade unionist and president of one of the two main trade unions of Nepal and that he had personally taken great interest in this issue. He declared that his Government would do its utmost not to allow any wage discrimination based on sex and expected the further support and cooperation of the international community, including the ILO, to ensure the compliance with and implementation of the ILO Conventions which Nepal had already ratified and was in the process of ratifying.

The Employers' members noted that the difference in the wages paid to men and women which had been noted in this case by the Committee of Experts was clearly not permitted under the terms of the Convention. These differences occurred in particular in organized tea plantations. The Government representative had stated that the payment of unequal pay to men and women for equal work could be punished under the law. He had also provided certain explanations of the situation in a number of tea plantations, where exceptions to the provisions of the law in this respect had been allowed for the purposes of the development of the plantations and to provide more jobs for women. However, the Convention did not allow such exceptions. Discrimination should not be allowed, even for the purposes of promoting economic development. The Government representative had referred to the limited time period during which such measures were allowed and had stated that the matter had been discussed by a tripartite advisory body, which had recommended that no further exceptions should be allowed. Moreover, the observation of the Committee of Experts had also referred to the existence of certain criteria, including traditional practice and social and economic circumstances, under which such discrimination might continue to be permitted. At the same time, the Government representative had also emphasized his Government's commitment not to allow wage discrimination and to distance itself from this discriminatory situation. It was therefore unclear what this might mean in practical terms.

In raising the issue of equal pay in the case of Nepal, the Committee of Experts had raised the complex question of not only providing equal pay for equal work, but also for work that might be different but was of equal value. The Employers' members pointed to the difficulty of implementing this principle in practice. There were no scientific or generally recognized methods by which the value of work could be evaluated. Although many different approaches to evaluating the value of jobs had been developed, they still remained a matter of interpretation. Attempts to apply the principle of equal pay to different jobs opened the door to all kinds of arbitrary judgements. Nevertheless, the Employers' members called upon the Government to provide a report containing detailed information and to take up a specific position on the points that had been raised. It was to be hoped that the information contained in this report would indicate that the discrepancies observed between national law and practice and the provisions of the Convention would be eliminated in the shortest possible time.

The Workers' members thanked the Government for the information provided concerning this case and recalled that the principle of equal remuneration enshrined in the Convention was a fundamental human right. The fact that this Convention had been classified amongst fundamental instruments revealed the importance attached to it by the ILO. They subscribed entirely to the opinion expressed by the Committee of Experts according to which equal remuneration had to be applied to all workers without exception, regardless of the level of economic and social development of the sector in which they worked. They recalled that the Committee discussed on a regular basis cases regarding the application of the Convention by industrialized as well as developing countries.

The Committee of Experts noted that equal remuneration in Nepal was a principle provided for in both the Constitution and the legislation. However, the statement by the Government according to which differences of remuneration between men and women, particularly in the tea plantation sector, existed because of customary national practices, was contrary to the fundamental principles recognized by the Constitution itself as well as by the law in Nepal. Insisting on the importance that national practice should comply with the provisions of the Convention, they requested the Government to take all necessary measures in order to put an end to these violations, even temporary, of the principle of equal remuneration in the tea plantation.

Concerning the principle of equal remuneration for work of equal value when men and women performed different work, they indicated, as had the Committee of Experts, that the Constitution of Nepal only forbade wage discrimination between men and women with respect to the same work. Moreover, the Labour Regulation of 1993, although broader than the Constitution, had a narrower scope than the Convention with respect to equal remuneration. They pointed out that the principle provided for in the Convention covered not only the cases where men and women were performing the same or similar work, but also the more common situation where men and women were performing a different type of work. They emphasized the fact that, in the establishment of remuneration structures, the requirements for different tasks performed by men and women had to be evaluated in an impartial manner on the basis of objective criteria taking into account the various aspects of the work performed by men and women. They expressed the hope that the Government would implement the recommendations contained in the Mission report prepared by the ILO on the setting of wages and equal remuneration in 1992, which could take place within the recently created tripartite Labour Advisory Board. They requested the Government to rapidly take the necessary measures, taking into account the observations formulated by the Mission, the Committee of Experts and this Committee, to put an end to the violations in practice and in law of the fundamental principle of equal remuneration between male and female workers who were performing work of equal value. Finally, they recalled that the technical assistance of the ILO was available to the Government if they so wished.

The Workers' member of Singapore expressed her appreciation of the difficulties experienced by Nepal at this very early stage of its development and her sincere hope that whatever assistance that could be supplied by the ILO and other agencies would continue to be used to assist the country in the fulfilment of its obligations. Nevertheless, she believed that the reasoning put forward by the Government representative for allowing discrimination in pay between men and women plantation workers was seriously flawed. A policy of that nature reduced the worth of women's contribution to the economy and served to entrench women in low-skilled and low-paid jobs. In the long term, it could even discourage women from acquiring better skills and higher qualifications. Another consequence of such discrimination was that it would in the long-term depress the wages of male workers, thereby affecting standards of living in general. It would make better economic sense for Nepal to make the most effective and productive use of all its human resources, regardless of their gender, with a view to accelerating its development process. With regard to the hope expressed by the Government that it could promote the development of tea plantations through disparities in wages, she endorsed the view expressed by the Committee of Experts that many other measures existed to promote growth. In this respect, the sharing of information and the assistance of the ILO and other UN agencies could help to promote sound government policy. She noted in this regard the establishment of a tripartite Central Labour Advisory Board and the request by the Government for technical assistance. These initiatives were to be welcomed and would undoubtedly assist the country in fulfilling its obligations and promoting its development process.

The Workers' member of Pakistan welcomed the progress made in Nepal in strengthening its democratic system, as well as its ratification of the Convention and the fact that a trade union colleague had been appointed Minister of Labour. He hoped in particular that as a result of these developments women would benefit from better and fairer treatment than in the past. He agreed with previous speakers that respect for the principle of equal pay throughout the world was vital in order to allow women to play their rightful role in society. No progress could be achieved without observance of this fundamental principle, which was why it had been enshrined by member States in the ILO Constitution and the Convention. Although the Government had taken certain measures, such as fixing minimum wages, efficient labour inspection was required to apply these provisions in practice. He noted that women in the country were not encouraged to participate in trade union activities. The Government should be requested to take measures to remedy the situation in this respect. With regard to the wage discrimination that existed between men and women in certain tea plantations, the Committee should emphasize that exemptions could not be allowed to the principle of non-discrimination. He therefore called upon the Government to take more effective measures to remove the disparities in question and to show greater political will to comply with the obligations deriving from the Convention. It should request the assistance of the ILO in ensuring that the Convention was applied more fully in practice.

The Government representative stated that although rules had been adopted, it was very difficult to supervise their enforcement, particularly in small private enterprises. However, the Government would be taking initiatives in these areas.

The Committee noted the information received and the discussions which followed. The Committee shared the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts concerning wage discrimination between men and women. It noted that the Government had granted immunity from the national equal pay provisions to some employers in the tea industry in order to provide incentives to that industry and to improve the opportunities for the recruitment of women. The Committee noted with concern that the Government considers that this practice does not violate the basic provisions of the Convention. The Committee emphasized that any scheme which denies women the fundamental human right of equal pay is not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee also noted that no information had been supplied on the means adopted to apply the principle of equal pay in situations where men and women may perform work that is different but of equal value. The Committee noted that the Government had requested technical assistance for the implementation of the Convention. It also noted that the Government had not yet implemented all the recommendations of the technical assistance already provided. The Committee trusted that the Government would be able to report in the very near future that, with the assistance of the ILO, if necessary, practical and effective measures had been taken to give full effect to the Convention.

Convention No. 102: Social Security (Minimum Standards), 1952

Peru (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stated that this Convention established in Part II that all member States which had ratified it must guarantee preventive and curative medical care. Furthermore, it provided other benefits which must be guaranteed by ratifying member States, including: cash sickness benefit, old-age and survivors' pensions; work injury benefit in case of accident or occupational disease, family benefit and maternity benefit. In this respect, in Peru the National System of Social Security was comprised of the following regimes: the National Pensions System, regulated by Decree No. 19990, the National Health System, regulated by Decree No. 22482; and the System of Work Injuries and Occupational Diseases, regulated by Decree No. 18846. Regarding certain comments of the Committee of Experts, the Government representative provided the following information: Old-age benefits (Part V). Article 29 of the Convention established the conditions for the right to a full or reduced old-age pension. Concerning the Peruvian private pensions system, employed and self-employed workers both were entitled to join and benefits were paid to affiliates who completed 65 years of age, the age prescribed in Article 26(2) of the Convention. It was important to note that in this case, no qualifying period existed for receipt of an old-age pension, exceeding in this respect the qualifying conditions established by the Convention and demonstrating that the private pensions system went beyond the minimum standards. The amount of pensions provided in conformity with section 13 of Act No. 26504 was not effected. The Government of Peru had established by supreme decree the requirements and conditions under which the private pensions system must guarantee a minimum pension to its affiliates. In this respect, attention was drawn to section 13 of Resolution No. 484-95-EF/SAFP which sets the parameters for establishing the amount of the minimum pension due in case of payment in the form of a programmed retirement or temporary annuity.

Furthermore, Article 30 of the Convention established that old-age protection shall continue throughout the contingency, i.e. during the entire time that the insured lives beyond 65 years of age. It was noted that the private pensions system provided various modes of payment of retirement benefit which were freely chosen by the affiliate or the survivors. In effect, section 42 of Decree No. 25897 established the following methods: (1) programmed retirement benefit; (2) personal life annuity; (3) family life annuity; or (4) a temporary annuity with a deferred lifetime annuity. Through these methods, except for the programmed retirement benefit, pensions were provided to workers throughout their retirement, fulfilling the minimum standards contained in Article 30 of the Convention. In addition, in the case of a family lifetime annuity and a temporary annuity with a deferred lifetime annuity, the pension would continue beyond the life of the insured and be converted into a survivor's pension. The method of payment of pension was freely chosen by each worker, demonstrating that the system was based in full on the choice of the worker who knows best his or her interests and needs.

Article 58 of Convention No. 102 established invalidity protections to be paid when an insured person became unable to exercise an occupation. In conformity with section 9 of Act No. 2679 on the modernization of the social security law of Peru, Social Health Fund under the Peruvian Social Security Institute paid cash benefits for temporary invalidity and maternity. Affiliates of the private pensions system were compulsorily covered under this scheme. When the incapacity exceeded the period of cover for the insured person, the affiliates of the private pensions system had the right to a temporary invalidity pension paid out of their individual capital accumulation accounts or to select the applicable method for payment of retirement benefit. In case of permanent invalidity, the insured could choose between an early retirement pension, as provided by law, or the applicable normal retirement pension. As could be seen, the system guaranteed that an insured worker who suffered from an incapacity which rendered him or her unable to work was provided for, even when the disabled worker had not fulfilled the conditions for a regular pension.

Regarding Articles 65 and 66 of the Convention on the calculation of various cash benefits provided under the social security system, it was pointed out that the implementation of the private pensions system had taken into account these criteria. The Government of Peru had paid special attention to the establishment of criteria for fixing the minimum amounts of pensions and subsidies, which was related in each case to the previous remuneration of the insured worker. In this sense, section 13 of Law No. 26504, through a supreme decree, had established the requirements and conditions under which the private pensions system guaranteed a minimum pension to its affiliates. Resolution No. 484-95-EF/SAFP fixed the rules for establishing a minimum amount for a pension under the programmed retirement or temporary annuity methods of payment. Decree No. 19990 which regulated the National Pensions System set the invalidity pension at 50 per cent of the reference wage, i.e. the insured earnings. As could be seen, these levels were in accord with the percentages established in the annex to Part XI of the Convention. Act No. 23908 of 1984 fixed a minimum pension equal to three-times the minimum wage established in the industrial sector in Lima. This did not currently include pensions which had been paid for less than one year from the date the insured became entitled to a pension. It was clear that the framework of standards had been modified, but it was no less certain that the will had existed to establish these minimum levels of benefit to guarantee an adequate benefit.

As could be appreciated, the Peruvian Government had largely exceeded the minimum standards of the Convention, demonstrating its willingness to adequately protect workers and the population in general. Social security had been enshrined in article 10 of the Peruvian Constitution.

Finally, the Government representative explained briefly that the private pension system existed in Peru in parallel with and alternatively to the public system, and that affiliation was voluntary. It was administered by the Pension Fund Administrators (AFP) and regulated by Decree No. 25897. This system functioned through individual savings investment accounts. The Government had issued standards for the private pensions system with the aim of developing and strengthening pensions which had not been adequate. Equally, the implementation of this system implied the recognition of the right of workers to voluntarily select which system to join, without any coercion, as stated in the constitutional provision of the "principle of freedom of contract". In June 1996, this Committee had invited the Government to furnish information on ratified social security Conventions (Conventions Nos. 35 to 40). At that time, it was indicated that the public system of pensions paid a maximum pension which was absolutely insufficient and did not relate to the amount of contributions paid by the worker. The Government therefore developed this system with the goal of improving pensions for Peruvian workers. The implementation of this system in Peru had brought substantial benefits for all of the country through the savings produced which had been invested in various projects and created new jobs. Furthermore, according to various studies carried out in Peru, it appeared that persons affiliated with the private pensions system received significantly greater pensions than those paid under the public system. The benefits provided by the private pensions system included only old-age, invalidity and funeral benefits and did not concern medical benefits which were provided under the National Health System.

In light of the above-mentioned information, the Government considered that the private pensions system developed in the framework of social protection could not be understood or analysed within the context of Convention No. 102. For this reason, the Government called on the ILO to revise the provisions of this Convention, in order to allow for new approaches to social security now being adopted in various countries around the world. The Government considered that the National System of Social Security complied with all of the provisions of the Convention on minimum standards of social security.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information that he had provided and that he had undertaken to supply to the Committee of Experts for its examination. They recalled that issues relating to Peruvian social security had been discussed by the Committee in 1994 and 1996 with regard to the application of older social security Conventions, namely the Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.) Convention, 1933 (No. 35), and the Survivors' Insurance (Agriculture) Convention, 1933 (No. 40). In 1996, it was decided to put aside those outdated Conventions with immediate effect and to promote the ratification of more recent instruments, and particularly the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128).

In general terms, the Convention established minimum standards for all branches of social security, which were then set out in a fuller and more detailed fashion by other Conventions such as the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128). As observed by the Committee of Experts in its present report and in its General Surveys of 1961 and 1989, the Convention was designed in a very flexible manner. Indeed, Article 2 of the Convention laid down that member States which ratified it could specify the Parts under which they accepted the obligations. Furthermore, under the terms of Article 5, ratifying States, which were bound to protect prescribed categories of the population accounting for at least a specified percentage of workers or residents, had to ensure that the prescribed percentage was achieved. The required level of social security could be attained in various manners, since the Convention did not endeavour to promote one system of management and organization over any other system. It was intended to impose minimum standards, irrespective of the public, semi-public, mixed or private nature of the system in question.

The Workers' members deplored the ideological approach adopted by the Government, which was illustrated by the report it had transmitted to the Committee of Experts. Without replying to the detailed observations of the Committee, it had confined itself to general remarks of a political nature. The statement made by the Government representative to the Conference Committee was of the same nature. Irrespective of the nature of the system in question, governments and public authorities had a general responsibility to ensure the proper administration of the institutions, enterprises and services concerned with the provision of benefits. In this respect, the Workers' members referred to the position that they had expressed on the social security Conventions during the Committee's general discussion. They noted that the Employers' members had expressed substantially the same opinion.

In the same way as the Committee of Experts, they noted that the private pensions system was organized in such a fashion that, once a worker had joined a private pension fund administration, it was no longer possible to be insured under the scheme administered by the Insurance Standardization Office, which meant that the private pensions system which currently coexisted alongside the public system could end up totally replacing the latter. In these circumstances, the private system would become the definitive system for the worker concerned, who would then be subject to the important shortcomings noted by the Committee of Experts. In particular the payment of pensions was not guaranteed for the whole duration of the contingency. Furthermore, nothing guaranteed that the minimum pension, prescribed by the Convention, would be achieved, since pension benefits also depended on the capital accumulated in individual accounts. Workers appeared to have to pay the totality of contributions. Finally, it appeared that protected persons' representatives could not participate in the management, which was contrary to a basic rule of democracy. With regard to the public pensions system, the Workers' members deplored the fact that the Government confined itself to criticizing the scheme without endeavouring to find practical and effective solutions to guarantee its survival and effectiveness and to ensure the payment of pension benefits.

The Workers' members emphasized the serious nature of the problem and noted that an increasing number of people, who were entitled to receive a pension, no longer received it and were obliged to go to the national courts in order to have their rights upheld. The general responsibility for guaranteeing the survival and proper functioning of all the pensions systems concerned lay with the Government. The issue in question was a matter of fundamental principles and proper public administration. They therefore requested the Government to reply to the detailed observations made by the Committee of Experts and to undertake to adopt measures in the near future which would give effect to the provisions of the Convention.

The Employers' members recalled that the Convention raised important and technical questions. The fundamental question of the coexistence of a public social security system with a new private system had already been addressed when the Committee had discussed the application of Conventions Nos. 35 to 40. None the less, it was possible to ask, in the light of the Convention, if the private system should be measured by the same criteria as the public system. If the reply was yes, the private system should fulfil the provisions of the Convention. The Government representative had not disputed the fact that the old public system had been totally insufficient and inadequate. According to the Government, it was for this reason that the public system had had to be substituted by the private one, but a worker who affiliated with the private system could not return to the public system. In any case, the application of the Convention was problematic because the public and private systems were both weak, and in this respect the Committee of Experts had raised doubts and had questioned whether the new system complied with the requirements of the Convention. In certain conditions, a private system of retirement or invalidity pensions might be more efficient than a public system. None the less, it did not appear to be the case with the current private system in Peru and the Government should modify both the public and private systems to conform with the provisions of the Convention.

The Government representative had provided a certain amount of information which should be included in the government report to the Committee of Experts for evaluation. With regard to the Government's suggestion that the Convention be modified, the Employers' members indicated that they had considered this. They recalled nevertheless that the Peruvian legislation needed modifying to bring it into conformity with the Convention. They asked the Government to send a complete report to the Committee of Experts so that it could examine all aspects related to the application of the Convention.

The Workers' member of Argentina stated that, as in 1994 and 1996, the Peruvian social security system was again being examined. He expressed his concern over the repeated observations of the Committee of Experts on the same matters in various Latin American countries, as well as for the unfulfilled government promises to rectify these problems and he demanded more concrete action to reduce the discrepancies between national law and practice on the one hand and the principles contained in the ILO Conventions on the other. He indicated that the progress of Latin American integration would be a mere economic entity and would not bring about social justice and equality if the social principles rooted in the ILO were not taken into account. The speaker stated that Convention No. 102 was flexible in order to permit a wide range of national solutions and easy adaptation to technical changes in protection. But despite this flexibility, the Government had not amended its legislation to the provisions of the Convention. He stressed that it was possible and acceptable that a country have both public and private systems for pensions. But Peruvian workers could not return to the state system once they were affiliated to a fund administrator. Furthermore, the public system was in a state of terminal crisis and it was clear that the possibility to freely choose between the two systems was only hypothetical. He also indicated that the problem of non-contribution by employers remained. It was necessary to avoid the spread of the Peruvian situation to other Latin American countries, as the primary evidence showed that exclusively private social security systems served only a few workers. Lastly, he asked that this case continue to be monitored, not only concerning the adaptation of standards but also concerning the results and effects, in order that the supervisory bodies could evaluate the evolution of these systems in the coming years.

The Workers' member of the United States warned against the dismantling and undoing of social security in the name of efficiency, modernization and the supposed absolute wisdom of the market. The problems faced by Peruvian workers, which were being discussed in the present case, were part of a much bigger dynamic affecting the whole of Latin America and the Caribbean. The debt restructuring conditions imposed by the major international financial institutions called for full-scale structural adjustment and privatization at the state level, and in its enterprises and services. These conditions contributed to the problems underlying the Peruvian case. He observed that the general funding crisis faced by modern States, especially in Latin America, had led to a crisis of faith in the social security concept. In fact, the idea of total privatization had gained support, with the effect that old-age protection had become prey to the unknown factors and inherent hazards of the market. This argument had prevailed in Chile, threatened the obras sociales in Argentina, had commenced by way of legislative Decree in El Salvador and was due to be put into effect in Mexico. Even in the United States, a number of multinational financial houses had been lobbying actively for the total dismantling of the social security system, using the argument of an underfunding crisis in the federally administered system.

The problems raised by the Peruvian case today had to be viewed in a broader perspective, in which the integrity of the social security concept was jeopardized at the national, regional and international levels. In fact, the general situation in the Peruvian case, including the reality that Peru's private scheme was coming to replace its public system, had created the specific problems which the Committee of Experts had addressed in its latest observation under the Convention. The Peruvian Government had agreed a couple of years ago that the private pensions system in Peru, in view of its principles and general characteristics, could not be included or analysed within the scope of the Convention. The Committee of Experts had already stated in its General Surveys of 1961 and 1989 that social security coverage could be subject to various approaches, thereby foreseeing the problem of an increase in the number of private schemes in the future. Moreover, in the case of Peru, the Committee of Experts had observed in February-March 1995 that, once Peruvian workers had registered with a private pension fund administrator, they could not opt back into the public system, which contributed to the tendency that the private system was effectively replacing the public system. The rationale of the Committee of Experts had been reinforced by the admissions of the Peruvian Government before the Committee last year, to the effect that the public system was collapsing and was unable to provide adequate coverage. He considered that the integrity of the public system had been mortally threatened by the Peruvian Government's evident lack of commitment to it and by the evident encouragement of the private option. He deplored the fact that, despite the Committee of Experts' request for information concerning the private pensions system and compliance with essential aspects of the Convention, the Government had confined itself to providing vague information, without addressing any of the critical issues.

Finally, he asked the Government to provide the information requested by the Committee of Experts. Only when such information was provided in full would a thorough evaluation be possible.

The Workers' member of France, agreeing with the comments of the Workers' members, wished to comment further on the system of old-age benefits in Peru. He recalled that the Convention was important both in terms of protecting the workers' social and economic rights and of setting the level of flexibility possible for its implementation. The problems facing Peruvian workers arose from experimentation with new forms of managing social security systems, in particular privatization. The difficulties in obtaining respect of their rights to receive a decent pension in the system to which they contributed were not unique, but that did not make them any less unacceptable. Trends towards dismantling systems based on the principle of solidarity, with mandatory participation from employers in financing and replacing them by private systems based on individual capital without mandatory employer contributions, were worrying and did not offer the guarantees required by the Convention. These private systems were, by their very nature, unpredictable because they relied in part on international financial speculation and on fluctuations in the financial markets. The returns could therefore fall below the levels set by the Convention. The fact that a State was prepared to assume the obligations of a private pension scheme that went bankrupt was not an adequate solution because, in such a case, the workers contributed twice to the system: once through the payment of contributions and a second time through their taxes. In addition, in private systems the benefit ceased once the individual accumulation was exhausted and this could mean that the old-age benefit was not really covered. In the many cases where wages were less than or just equivalent to the basic minimum, the workers were often not able to build up sufficient rights to ensure their basic needs in old age. This meant that the already wide gaps in society would become even wider. He considered that there was no need to revise the Convention, as the Government representative had suggested, in order to promote privatization and individualization of pension schemes. This instrument only set minimum principles and in no way restricted recourse to public, mixed or private systems as long as they respected the requirements of its provisions. The chosen system had to guarantee to workers the old-age benefits to which they were entitled. The public scheme in Peru should therefore be revitalized in order to ensure the entitlements of its members. He recalled that a public system could allow joint management and participation of the social partners in its administration, which was not possible in private systems. Appropriate measures had to be taken so as to ensure respect of the Convention independently of the choices made by the State. He asked the Government, as had the Committee of Experts, to send a detailed report on the measures taken so as to guarantee the rights to social security and a decent level of benefits. In the light of this information, the situation ought to be re-examined.

The Workers' member of Colombia stated that, contrary to appearances, many categories of the population were excluded from the application of the Convention and that the private pensions systems were not as they appeared: only well-paid workers in fixed employment could hope for an adequate annuity; this hope did not exist for workers in the informal sector and was not realistic for independent workers. Furthermore, the principles of integrity, solidarity and universality of benefit had not been fulfilled. The ILO should closely follow this and similar cases in Latin America.

The Government representative appreciated the various interventions and emphasized the balanced and thoughtful way in which the comments and criticisms had been formulated. He promised to transmit the various concerns to the Government in order that they would be addressed in the Government's next report.

The Committee noted the statements made by the Government representative and the debate which followed. The Committee shared the opinion that the coexistence in the social security system of both a public and a private system, as in the case of Peru since 1992, was not in itself incompatible with the Convention, which allowed the minimum level of social security to be attained through various methods. Nevertheless, the Committee expressed profound concern that, as the observations of the Committee of Experts and the debate appeared to show, the minimum levels of benefit for retirement and invalidity guaranteed by the Convention might not be guaranteed, either by the public or the private social security system, although for differing reasons. The Committee trusted that the Government would provide a detailed report in 1997, as requested by the Committee of Experts, so that the information provided could be examined in depth.

Convention No. 107: Indigenous and Tribal Populations, 1957

India (ratification: 1958). A Government representative emphasized that India was a welfare State committed to the welfare and development of its people in general, and of vulnerable categories in particular, such as tribal peoples. The Constitution of India, and particularly its articles 38, 39 and 46, bore witness to this commitment. In this context, he noted that the population of the scheduled tribes in India amounted to 67.8 million, or over 8 per cent of the total population. Progress in the development of these people had been set out as a major objective of national policy in successive five-year plans. This commitment had also been shown at a very early stage by the ratification of the Convention in 1958.

With regard to the comments of the Committee of Experts on the working conditions in the ash area of the Gujarat Electricity Board, he drew attention to the sharing of powers and responsibilities under the terms of the Indian Constitution between the central and provincial Governments. Responsibility was also shared in this manner for labour legislation and labour administration. In this particular case, the responsibility was that of the provincial government of Gujarat, which had supplied most of the information that he would now provide to the Committee. The Gujarat Electricity Board owned the thermal power station at Ukai, which employed over 2,000 regular employees. There were also nine annual contractors employing some 300 workers and 12 casual contractors employing another 300 workers. All of these contractors possessed valid licences issued under the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act of 1970. These workers worked according to shift hours fixed by the authorities and were entitled to overtime payments, and free medical benefits. Rest rooms and crèches had also been supplied, as well as uniforms and shoes. The workers were entitled to casual leave, earned leave, sick leave and public and optional holidays. The contractors also provided uniforms and shoes for their workers. The communication sent by the Bijli Mazdoor Panchayat trade union to the Committee of Experts concerned the people working outside the factory premises who separated burnt coal ash from water. These workers were not covered by any settlement and did not work under any registered contractor. The Gujarat Electricity Board had given this work out to a firm, which in turn gave the work to 200 persons known as "Mukadams", who were paid on the basis of the burnt coal ash removed from the premises. The Mukadams employed members of their families and outsiders. The Mukadams were paid on a monthly basis, but had not been registered under the Contract Labour (Regulation and Abolition) Act. He informed the Committee that two criminal cases had been filed against the enterprise concerned, as well as a case filed on the same matter by the Bijli Mazdoor Panchayat. The Ukai Thermal Power Station and the Gujarat Electricity Board had not accepted liability for providing facilities under the terms of the Factories Act to the workers in the ash area and had challenged the claim that the Factories Act applied to that area. However, the Assistant Labour Commissioner and the Gujarat Government Labour Officer had carried out inspections and taken a number of measures concerning the tribal workers. On humanitarian grounds, the Gujarat Electricity Board had agreed before the High Court to provide basic facilities to these workers, and had in practice provided drinking water, toilets, sheds, a crèche and first-aid facilities. The Mukadams were paid at a rate of 155 to 165 rupees per ton for separating the burnt coal ash from the flowing water, sieving and drying it. Their activity had not been covered under any scheduled employment under the Minimum Wages Act. The provisions of the Act had not therefore been fully implemented in that area, even though the Gujarat Government had proposed that the work should be covered by the Act and action in this respect was expected in the near future. Moreover, legal action under the Equal Remuneration Act against the employer of these workers had been sanctioned by the Commissioner of Labour. It could therefore be seen that the appropriate government had taken action against all those concerned in the exploitation of tribal workers. The results of this action would further improve their conditions of work.

With reference to the comments by the Committee of Experts on the question of the Sardar Sarovar Dam and Power Project, he explained that the differences noted in the progress of resettlement and rehabilitation between the various states were only natural, because the necessary measures were only taken as the project advanced every year. Indeed, the construction of the dam was linked to the implementation of resettlement and rehabilitation measures in order to ensure successful rehabilitation well before the lands in question were submerged. The construction of the various blocks of the dam was planned on an annual basis after reviewing the progress made in rehabilitation. This progress was reviewed by a rehabilitation committee, under the chairmanship of the Ministry of Welfare and reported to the Supreme Court of India. The families that were affected by the project were given priority, which accounted for the substantial differences between the states.

He then proceeded to provide information on the number of families affected in each state and the progress made in their resettlement. The total number of families affected in Gujarat was 4,600 and land was being made available for their resettlement from government lands and the purchase of private land. Of these families, 4,392 had been allocated agricultural land and 4,331 had been allotted house plots on 116 developed relocation sites. In Maharashtra, of the 3,113 families affected, some 2,114 had stated a preference for rehabilitation in Maharashtra and 999 in Gujarat. So far, of the latter, 662 families had been allocated agricultural land and 639 had been allocated house plots. The number of families affected in Madhya Pradesh was estimated at 33,014, of which 14,124 had preferred to settle in Gujarat. Of the latter, so far 2,652 families had been allocated agricultural land and 2,449 had been allotted house plots. Of the 18,890 families from Madhya Pradesh which wished to remain in this state, some 733 had been allocated house plots. He noted in this respect that for this latter category of families, either only their houses or less than 25 per cent of their agricultural land would be submerged. They would therefore be relocated near the submerged villages at a higher level. Some 2,000 hectares of agricultural land would be allocated to families who were willing to resettle in Madhya Pradesh. In Maharashtra, five resettlement and rehabilitation sites had been established. Civic amenities had been constructed on two of these sites, and were at an advanced state of completion on the remainder. In view of all the above information, he believed that the Committee should have no grounds for concern about the ability of the states in acquiring land to meet the challenges of resettlement.

With regard to the observation by the Committee of Experts that there were other cases in which tribal people were displaced for development purposes, he stated that the Government could provide information on specific cases from the data supplied by the provincial governments. He noted in this context that many of the areas in which mineral resources were mined and other developmental activities undertaken were populated by tribal people. However, the exploitation of natural resources was unavoidable for the economic and industrial development of the country. He emphasized that the rules and regulations that were in force provided adequate compensation for the affected people, including tribal people. Moreover, the Government did not follow any discriminatory policy in addressing the needs and problems of the persons affected. He hoped that he had been able to provide adequate information in response to the observations made by the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the comprehensive information that he had provided. They recalled that the Committee had been examining the application of the Convention in India since the mid-1980s and that the most recent discussion of the case had been in 1993. However, at that time the Committee had only covered the question of the application of the Convention in the case of the Sardar Sarovar Dam and Power Project. The points raised by the Committee of Experts now also covered the working conditions of scheduled tribal workers in the ash area of a thermal power station in the state of Gujarat. In its report, the Committee of Experts described the very difficult working conditions of these people, who were mostly of tribal origin. In this context, the Government representative had said that the situation did not come under the authority of the central Government, but of the relevant provincial governments. The information provided by the Government representative had therefore largely been supplied by the provincial governments. He had stated in this respect that these workers were not covered by the normal labour legislation, which meant that, for example, the minimum wage was not complied with. It was clear that the Factories Act did not apply to work carried out in the so-called "ash area". The Committee of Experts had referred to many aspects of the working conditions of workers in this area that were not satisfactory. It was very unclear in practice which labour and social legislation should be applied to these workers. However, since they were all stated to be tribal persons, they clearly came under the special protection provided by the Convention. It was evident that much needed to be done to ensure compliance with the Convention in their regard and that, in view of the split responsibilities in the country in this respect, the central Government would face great difficulties in trying to impose its will to ensure that the inadmissible and inadequate working conditions in question were improved. The Employers' members therefore called upon the Government to provide as much information as possible in a written report on the labour situation of these people and to provide suggestions as to how their situation could be improved.

The Employers' members then referred to the matter discussed by the Committee in 1993, which related to the impact of the construction of a dam and power project and the major resettlement of tribal people caused by the project. The questions that arose concerned the manner in which the persons affected were being resettled, the compensation that was applicable to them and the extent to which these measures were being applied in practice. The Government representative had referred to the establishment of a five-member group to control these matters, as well as the relevant regional bodies. However, the procedures for the compensation and resettlement of the tribal peoples concerned were very complex and the Committee of Experts had noted broad differences in their treatment in the various states concerned. Although the Government representative had explained that the compensation and resettlement measures adopted were linked to the progress made in the project, the very detailed figures provided were difficult to place in context. Nevertheless, the general picture provided was that the compensation measures of all kinds had improved to a certain extent and were in practice higher than the claims granted by a court. Any such improvement was to be welcomed, although it was a matter of concern that substantial differences continued to exist between the measures taken in the various states. The Government should therefore be requested to provide all the relevant information in a comprehensive report containing detailed figures that were placed in the context of the general problem.

The Employers' members emphasized that efforts would be needed to give effect to the commitments undertaken by the country under the terms of the Convention, particularly in view of the large tribal population and the need to resettle many tribal peoples as a result of development and industrialization projects. Although these projects were clearly to the advantage of the country, it was necessary to ensure that the disadvantages of such projects were minimized for the traditionally weakest categories of the population, namely tribal peoples. The Employers' members also noted the inference by the Government representative that such cases of the displacement of tribal people occurred frequently. It was therefore necessary for the Government to keep the ILO informed as precisely as possible of the global situation of tribal populations so that the Committee of Experts, and if appropriate the Conference Committee, could examine whether the treatment of these matters in the country was in conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' members emphasized the magnitude of the case since, according to 1991 data, tribal peoples in India numbered around 68 million. The case related to several issues as regards the application of the Convention in law and practice. However, the matters before the Committee today were just the tip of the iceberg. The Committee of Experts had been monitoring the case for a number of years. On this occasion three main points had been brought to the attention of the Conference Committee. Article 15 of the Convention required ratifying States to adopt special measures for workers belonging to tribal populations, provided that they were not in a position to enjoy the protection guaranteed by law to workers in general. However, the Committee of Experts considered that these workers appeared to be dealt with in accordance with the general labour legislation. The Workers' members questioned this since, according to the information provided by the Government itself, it was quite clear that the workers in question were not being dealt with under the general labour legislation. Indeed, the evidence provided by the Bijli Mazdoor Panchayat trade union concerning the ash area pointed to appalling abuses, including 12-hour days, inhuman working conditions, safety and health problems, pollution by coal, dust and flying ash and the absence of access to the most basic facilities, such as toilets and canteens. The wages of these workers were so low that it was extremely difficult to imagine how they could survive. It was therefore clear that the Government regarded and treated these workers in a different manner to other workers who worked inside the factory gates. The Government representative had stated that, without conceding its legal position, the Gujarat Electricity Board had provided some basic facilities to these workers and that certain action had been taken as a result of labour inspections. Nevertheless, the Workers' members emphasized that the situation constituted a serious violation of Article 15 of the Convention.

The evidence obtained from the Centre of Indian Trade Unions had drawn attention to what was happening to tribal peoples, who were being evicted from areas in which mining, the construction of dams and other development projects were being undertaken. These projects had a direct impact on the peoples affected in terms of agricultural development, health, education and employment. The socio-economic development of tribal peoples fell far behind the national average and, as a result, rehabilitation and resettlement threatened their very survival. Indeed, rather than rehabilitation and resettlement, what was happening was eviction, the word used in the Experts' report. Instead of benefiting from the protection required by the Convention, most of the people affected were being treated in a brutal manner and were ending up homeless and landless. Greater energy and political will was required to deal with these issues.

The Committee of Experts had noted, in particular, huge differences between the progress made in the various states in resettling tribal people. In Gujarat, the resettlement rate was encouraging at 93 per cent. In Maharashtra, it was poor at 42 per cent, while in Madhya Pradesh, it was appalling at only 9 per cent. The fact that something could be done to help them was shown by the developments in Gujarat. However, the Workers' members expressed deep concern that, rather than an exceptional measure, as specified in Article 12 of the Convention, the removal of tribal people and their resettlement seemed to be a matter of routine. They noted from previous reports of the Committee of Experts that the Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs had decided in 1990 that it would discontinue financing the project in Sardar Sarovar because of the inadequacy of the resettlement plans for displaced families. In early 1992, the World Bank had published an independent review which had concluded that there had been many problems in the planning and execution of the project, which had particularly affected the people displaced by it. The World Bank had subsequently withdrawn from the project on the advice that it would contravene the Convention. The Workers' members considered that provision for resettlement needed to be made before these people were thrown off their land. They wished to be provided with further information on the levels of compensation that were being provided and how the resettled workers were faring in the long term. They also requested information on the recommendations made by the five-member group, particularly as regards the establishment of grievance and redress machinery and the assistance of voluntary agencies.

The Workers' members referred to the comment by the Committee of Experts that there were other cases in which tribal people were being displaced for development purposes. Further information was required from the Government on this matter, including the criteria used to determine what made the removal of these people necessary as an "exceptional measure" under Article 12 of the Convention. Information should also be provided on the programmes established by the Government to support these peoples during their upheaval, in the transitional phase of resettlement and during rehabilitation. With reference to the comment by the Government representative that the central Government did not possess data on other cases of the removal of tribal peoples, the Workers' members wanted to know why not. They warned that if the Government did not monitor these situations and obtain the relevant evidence, it could not claim to be complying with the requirements of the Convention because it would not have the information to justify this claim.

In conclusion, the Workers' members emphasized that it was the tribal people and the most vulnerable categories of society who often paid the price of economic development. The Government of India had a responsibility to ensure that any removals of tribal people were necessary as an exceptional measure. Assertive and focused action was required by the Government at the national level to protect a precious and irreplaceable part of the international community.

The Workers' member of India referred to the statement by the Government representative that the situation of the workers in the ash area of the power station at Ukai came under the responsibility of the provincial Government. In this respect, he emphasized that when the central Government ratified a Convention, the instrument also applied to the provincial governments. All provincial governments therefore needed to comply with its provisions. He also noted that India had a very high population of tribal people, who were subject to systematic eviction from the land that they occupied. The cases referred to by the Committee of Experts were only symbolic of the many instances in which this occurred. The Government of India needed to pay more attention to the problems of tribal people. In the case of the workers in question, the Gujarat Electricity Board was their principal employer and therefore had a responsibility with regard to contract employees. Unfortunately, the information provided by the Government representative had not been very clear. The ILO would need to look into the details and verify the real situation. In particular, the situation of resettled tribal people was very precarious. They were often removed from fertile land and allocated barren land. Another important consideration was the distance between the dispossessed land and the land which was allocated to the families concerned.

He emphasized that it was the duty of the central Government to monitor the application of the Convention and to collect the necessary information to do so. All too frequently, new development projects, such as mining developments, were located in areas occupied by tribal peoples and resulted in their removal. The Government should review all such projects with great care and should establish a proper monitoring unit to cover the situation of tribal people. Many laws had been adopted in India respecting tribal people. However, very few of them were implemented and the Government needed to make proper efforts to fully implement all the relevant legislation.

The Workers' member of Swaziland stressed that this case raised issues related to human rights, social responsibilities and obligations expected of governments towards tribal populations. The Convention required governments to promote social, economic and cultural development of tribal populations within their territories. Governments were expected to raise their living standards and foster individual dignity as well as advancement of individual usefulness and initiatives. The Convention required that tribal populations enjoyed the protection of national laws.

The Government of India was in serious default of the dictates of the Convention which it ratified in 1958. The tribals, largely women, were forced to work in local dust without protective clothing, sanitation, appropriate food or drink, child-care facilities, and so on. In addition, these workers were poorly paid and put in a state of exploitation. When these conditions were brought to the attention of labour inspectors, deliberate indifference and inaction were displayed. He insisted on the fact that this type of behaviour was a gross violation of the provisions of the Convention and unacceptable discrimination exercised towards tribal populations. Tribal people were displaced and evicted in view of development projects, but they were not adequately relocated. In cases where they were relocated, the land provided was not equivalent in value to the land they had lost through displacement. He concluded by fully concurring with the recommendation of the Worker spokesperson and the Committee of Experts.

The Employers' member of India supported the comments made by the Employer and Workers' members concerning the working conditions in the ash area of the power station at Ukai. There could be no doubt concerning the social responsibility of the central and provincial Governments to ensure that the workers concerned were properly looked after and enjoyed safe working conditions. However, on the question of the time taken to apply legislation including minimum wage provisions, he recalled that India was a democratic country which needed to abide by due process. Moreover, with regard to the time that elapsed in the implementation of development projects, he noted that all the persons involved were entitled to defend their rights and that the legal procedures involved, particularly for the purchase of land, could take years. Such cases could involve considerable hardship for displaced workers and their families, who sometimes had to wait many years to receive their entitlements. The Government therefore needed to develop systems that responded to their needs more rapidly. He added that, although it appeared easy to say that the central Government should take action in many fields related to tribal peoples, the provincial governments were jealous of their powers and were reluctant to give up their rights. Nevertheless, measures needed to be taken throughout the country to improve the standard of living of tribal people. On the question of development projects, he noted that they were often located in rural areas to avoid adversely affecting more densely populated zones. Moreover, in rural areas they had the advantage of giving employment to tribal populations. These projects therefore needed to be considered with a view to the benefits that they brought to all concerned.

The Government representative thanked the Employers' and Workers' members for their contribution to a meaningful discussion. In response to the remarks made concerning the division of responsibility for the application of the Convention between the central and provincial Governments, he noted that in his intervention he had merely provided a summary of the situation under the various provisions of the Indian Constitution and noted that the state governments concerned were the appropriate authorities with regard to the main points raised by the Committee of Experts in this case. He clarified that he did not say that the national Government was not responsible to meet the obligations under Convention No. 107. On the issue of the workers in the ash area of the power station at Ukai, he had clarified in his intervention that it was the company's claim that the area did not constitute part of a factory. He had added that the state Government did not share that view and that the matter was now before the courts.

In general terms, he emphasized that the economic and social backwardness of tribal peoples in his country was the result of their exploitation over several centuries. Much effort had been expended to enable them to catch up with other categories of the population, including the safeguards established in the Indian Constitution. As a result of all these efforts, tribal peoples now benefited from more jobs, economic and social progress and improved education and literacy. However, the 50 years of independence had not been sufficient to make up for the centuries of exploitation.

He noted that the Employers' and Workers' members had called for a determined effort on the part of the Government to fulfil its obligations under Article 15 of the Convention. He reaffirmed his Government's awareness of these obligations and recalled that the provisions of the Indian Constitution and its legislation had been found adequate in this respect. The inadequacy was only in the area of enforcement of the laws. If any of the protection provided were to be found inadequate, an effort would be made, as in the past, to adopt the necessary changes. He stated in this respect that his country was in the process of adopting the necessary legal measures to eliminate problems related to contract labour. In this context, his Government had given its support to the discussion of this subject by the International Labour Conference. Indian laws on contract labour were more stringent and detailed than the provisions of the proposed instrument. Moreover, the courts in India had played an important role in the application of the relevant legislation. In a recent case, the responsibility of the principal employer for labour and social security rights of contract workers had been upheld. The implications of this decision were still being examined and he would be pleased to provide information on this matter to the Committee of Experts.

On the subject of the displacement and relocation of tribal people as a result of development projects, he emphasized that it was necessary to use the country's natural resources for the purposes of development and industry. It just so happened that many tribal people lived in the areas where such resources were to be found. This was the case of many mining and hydroelectric projects. When considering these questions, the Committee should give due consideration to the national context, including the energy shortage and the danger of famine in an agricultural economy that depended on an unreliable monsoon season. The Government was very conscious of the need to avoid injustice and had adopted adequate laws for the compensation of the families affected. With regard to the Sardar Sarovar Dam and Power Project, he reassured the Committee that the resettlement of all the families concerned would be completed before their lands were submerged. He also undertook to provide a very detailed reply to the direct request on this Convention by the Committee of Experts. He reaffirmed the commitment of his Government to the cause of tribal people and its readiness to take any step that was required in law or practice to give effect to the Convention. However, he called on the Committee to place the issue in its proper context and not to adopt an overly legalistic attitude. Finally, he confirmed that he would provide all the information that was required in writing to the Committee of Experts, thereby emphasizing his Government's total commitment to give effect to the Convention in India.

The Committee took note of the detailed information provided by the Government and the discussion which followed. It also noted that indigenous workers were not protected in the manner required under Article 15 of the Convention and asked the Government to supply additional information on efforts made to improve the situation. The Committee observed in particular the advances in the resettlement and rehabilitation of tribal populations displaced as a consequence of the construction of the Sardar Sarovar Dam and that the most recent information communicated by the Government indicated progress in the resettlement of these populations. But the Committee awaited more information, in particular on the rehabilitation of the indigenous populations. The Committee equally noted the Government's assurances that no area would be flooded before the conclusion of the resettlement and compensation, but it shared the Committee of Expert's concern at the lack of information on other cases of displacement of indigenous populations due to development projects, and the conditions under which they took place. The Committee asked the Government to continue to provide detailed information on the progress made in solving this problem, which had been addressed by the Committee for many years.

Convention No. 111: Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958

Iran, Islamic Republic of (ratification: 1964). A Government representative expressed his Government's commitment to international labour standards and his wish for a positive dialogue in the Committee. He pointed out that the Committee of Experts, in paragraph 1 of its observation, had referred to the Government's detailed report as well as to the documentation and statistics supplied. In the course of the last year, the Government had furnished an unprecedented amount of information. This meant that it had made an effort to work with the ILO supervisory bodies and it appeared that this cooperation had enabled the Committee of Experts to be better informed of the realities. While several long-standing issues had been settled, some issues remained pending which could be resolved by further improvement in the Government's reporting or by other necessary cooperation.

Paragraph 2 of the report of the Committee of Experts summarized the discussion in the Conference Committee last year and the replies of the Government and indicated that the Committee looked forward to receiving, in the Government's next report, information concerning contacts made with the Office, with regard to technical cooperation. The Government representative gave an assurance that the next report would definitely contain that information. In fact, such contacts had taken place and had led to concrete technical cooperation, which was quite a new element in the Government's relations with the ILO supervisory bodies: ILO staff at headquarters had had a three-day meeting with members of the Labour and Social Affairs Commission of the Parliament; in April 1997, a tripartite training seminar was held in Teheran with ILO assistance. Both events discussed a number of fundamental ILO Conventions, in particular Convention No. 111. The training was targeted towards those officials responsible for the application of the Convention, including Directors-General and officers of the Ministry of Labour's central and provincial departments, and covered various aspects of the Convention and its application. In the following days, the ILO mission received first-hand information from different parties. It discussed the national mechanisms of implementation of the Labour Code, including the non-discrimination provisions, as well as arbitration mechanisms with the Director-General of Labour and Social Affairs of Greater Teheran, which had the largest industrial concentration in the country and with representatives of workers' and employers' organizations. The mission also spoke with the head of the women's NGO network. Separate meetings took place with women officials supervising projects and activities for the employment and job placement of women and for the enhancement of the economic and social situation of rural women. Finally, the mission also visited two of the largest factories. It could thus be seen that this technical cooperation had generated an extensive dialogue with the ILO supervisory bodies in the course of one year. It was to be hoped that such effective cooperation could be continued.

Referring to paragraph 5 of the Committee of Experts' report, the Government representative pointed out that the Committee of Experts had noted with interest the information on persons of faiths other than Islam gaining access to university education and sitting on Islamic Labour Councils and the existence of the various types of labour organizations. In paragraph 6 of the report, the Committee of Experts welcomed the clarification of a very important issue with regard to a directive, which had been a matter of controversy for several years. A copy of the directive repealing the previous directive was now with the ILO. Paragraphs 7 and 8 had noted with interest some relevant developments. Paragraph 9 of the report referred to a communication received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, which had been forwarded to the Government and which would be considered at the next meeting of the Committee of Experts.

The speaker assured the Committee that his Government would supply a detailed and substantive report to the Committee of Experts. The fact that his Government's detailed report of last year had been duly examined by the Committee of Experts could only encourage further cooperation and dialogue with this body. It was to be hoped that a similar positive dialogue could take place in this Committee.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for his brief comments. The Government had provided a detailed report and it was to be hoped that the dialogue with the Committee of Experts and this Committee would be pursued. This case had been discussed for several years, last year, most recently when, following a thorough discussion and considering the fact that the Government was not committed to accept a direct contacts mission, this case had been mentioned in a special paragraph of the report. The Government appeared still not to have accepted such a mission and this would surely have an impact on the type of conclusions to be adopted which might lead the Government to reconsider in the future the possibility of such a mission, even though the Government seemed to prefer technical assistance. The impression remained that the Government was trying to gain time since technical assistance and direct contacts missions have different purposes: direct contacts missions tried to evaluate the real situation as well as the practical impact of the measures mentioned in the Government's report. Detailed reports were necessary but not sufficient. Like technical assistance, they allowed the dialogue to be continued and encouraged mutual understanding. But a detailed report could also veil the real situation. Legal provisions could be repealed by other provisions or by other executory decisions; their impact could be neutralized by an institutionalized parallel power which appeared to have constitutional legitimacy and powerful means of pressure irrespective of the parliamentary majority. The observation of the Committee of Experts was very detailed but most of the information regarding the practical impact of the various measures emanated mainly from the Government itself. Other information, contained in paragraphs 3 and 4 of the observation, shed quite another light on the situation. It was indispensable for the ILO and the Committee of Experts to be able to analyse this information to assess the real situation. A direct contacts mission would be the most appropriate way considering the fact that tripartism which would permit a confrontation of options did not seem to be really operational in the country.

As regards recruitment, the Government implicitly admitted that a priority was granted to those practising the official religion and minimized this fact. The Government acknowledged that this priority applied to teachers who numbered over 1 million and therefore constituted an important part of the workforce. Moreover, Act No. 14928 of 7 June 1996 extended this recruitment priority to the whole of the public service as well as public enterprises and major industrial enterprises. New legislation had extended this criterion even further to certain liberal professions such as membership of the Bar for lawyers. Furthermore, the Government had not replied to the comment of the Committee of Experts on the publication of discriminatory job offers. In the teaching field, the conditions imposed on the schools, which were established by religious minorities, forced them to use leaders belonging to the official religion.

As regards discrimination against minorities, according to certain information, the Baha'is were simply considered as terrorists by those in power in the regime and 200 of them had been executed since 1979 while thousands of others had been imprisoned or dismissed. The United Nations Special Rapporteur who went to the country in December 1995 collected statements from Baha'is who declared that they were victims of discrimination in employment. Other sources revealed the assassination of Christian priests without the Government doing its utmost to find the perpetrators. As regards discrimination on the basis of religion and the Islamic Labour Councils, paragraph 5 of the observation noted the explanation of the Government according to which workers had the choice between three forms of representation: the setting up of trade unions, the election of representatives or the setting up of these Councils. According to the Government's statistics, the majority of workers had opted for these Islamic Labour Councils. But these figures must be viewed in the general legal context and in the framework of labour relations. According to the Labour Code, the Ministry of Labour had the responsibility to set up these Islamic Labour Councils in every enterprise that employed more than 35 workers. Therefore, choice did not exist in these enterprises. In enterprises with less than 35 workers, the choice was not really free since religious or political authorities could designate a representative. It was these Islamic Labour Councils which designated representatives to consultative commissions as well as the delegation to the International Labour Conference. Unless proven wrong by information from the Government, the Committee of Experts could only come to the conclusion that discrimination was institutionalized in the labour relations system.

As regards discrimination on the basis of sex in the judicial system, it was the Committee of Experts' task to analyse the real scope of the amendment to the Act on Appointments to the Judiciary mentioned by the Government. According to available information, women only held advisory and support posts in the judicial system and in the departments for the protection of children, being excluded from the judiciary in the real sense. In more general terms, it was important to urge the Government to provide more detailed information on education and the training of women as well as their active participation in the labour market in its next report, and to provide the relevant statistics.

In conclusion, the real situation had to be clarified as a matter of urgency. The information provided by the Government, as detailed as it was, was not fully convincing. The Committee of Experts still had to undertake an in-depth analysis regarding several provisions and the practice concerning employment. Finally, a direct contacts mission was indispensable to assess the situation. If the Government were to refuse to request such a mission, this case should be mentioned in a special paragraph.

The Employers' members recalled that this case had been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts for the past 15 years, that it had already been discussed by this Committee ten times before and that it had been mentioned in a special paragraph on six occasions. As always, the Government representative demonstrated a cooperative attitude, but he did not contribute any new information. The reference to technical cooperation was a positive element, but it was questionable whether technical cooperation could replace the sending of a direct contacts mission as suggested by this Committee last year. The essence of the observation of the Committee of Experts was contained in paragraphs 3 and 4 which concerned discrimination based on sex, religion and political opinion. Although the general population of the Islamic Republic of Iran had grown, the average number of women active in the labour market had dropped. The Government seemed to rebut this argument. It was, however, noted that priority in employment was given to persons faithful to the Islamic religion, and that this criterion was applied not only in the ministries, but also in the public sector as a whole, as well as in all parastatal enterprises which represented a particularly large sector in the country. The statistics concerning new university entrants did not in themselves constitute sufficient arguments to refute the Committee of Experts' comments. Furthermore, job advertisements published in newspapers evidenced a consistent practice to give priority to Muslims. As regards the theoretical existence of three forms of worker representation, they were restricted by other provisions and in practice. The Government's response was also insufficient as regards discrimination on the basis of religion against the Baha'is; this had also been noted by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the Question of Religious Intolerance. A clarification was urgently required. According to the Government, section 1117 of the Civil Code, prohibiting women to work without the permission of their husbands, applied only to Muslims. Yet, as the overwhelming majority of the population was Muslim, this discriminatory provision in fact was applicable to almost everyone. As the Workers' members had pointed out, women were excluded from judicial functions. The Government stressed that the number of women in the active labour force continued to increase, although certain dangerous types of work remained prohibited to them. Bearing in mind the evolution of the notion of dangerous work, greater care had to be taken in order to avoid such protective provisions being used as a pretext for discrimination on the basis of sex. The sending of a direct contacts mission appeared to be the appropriate procedure to evaluate the situation on each of these points. Last year, the Government representative had stated that he was not in a position to commit himself on behalf of his Government in this respect. Today he considered that such a mission was not necessary. The recent elections had brought a new president to office, but it seemed precarious to offer any predictions as regards the political evolution because, contrary to what was the case in parliamentary democracies, in the Islamic Republic of Iran there were supranational authorities whose legitimacy was not derived from public elections. This was not a value judgement but a statement of fact. The conclusions of this Committee should appear in a special paragraph of its report, and the Government should be urged to request a direct contacts mission as soon as possible.

The Workers' member of Spain stated that he was concerned by the content of section 1117 of the Civil Code which permitted a husband to prohibit his wife from taking up employment contrary to the interest of the family, his interests or his reputation. There were legal proceedings which permitted the husband to claim these rights before the courts, which in practice amounted to placing the wife as well as the rest of the family under the guardianship of the husband. As the Employers' members declared, this was institutionalized discrimination, which should be clearly condemned. The Government contradicted itself when it stated that the Iranian Constitution protected the right of all to employment while the Civil Code applied only to those married according to the Islamic tradition. These provisions applied, in fact, to the majority of the Iranians and in the Islamic Republic of Iran there did not seem to be any distinction between religion and the Civil Code. The fact that the Civil Code did not provide for equal treatment created a situation which was contrary to the Convention. He recalled that this case had been discussed for several years in the context of discrimination on the basis of religion against Freemasons, Zoroastrians and the Baha'is. Although the observations of the Committee of Experts mainly concerned the Baha'is, the problems of other minorities suffering discrimination should not be ignored. To conclude, he recommended that the Committee urge the Government to accept a direct contacts mission.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands supported what other Workers' members had stated on the case and indicated that the format of the Committee of Experts' observation posed difficulties for him since normally it took note of the Government's report, analysed the information and reached conclusions accordingly. This year, the Committee of Experts had merely noted the information provided by the Government except in paragraph 6, and mentioned the debate on the case last year in paragraph 2. It was not clear to him whether all the information available had been analysed. Thus the guidance which normally emanated from the Committee of Experts to the Conference Committee was absent. It would have been preferable if the Committee of Experts had specified, on the basis of clear arguments, why the situation was so complex and serious that it warranted a direct contacts mission. He hoped that the Committee of Experts would shed light on this next year. He supported the Workers' proposal regarding the form of the Committee's conclusions.

The Workers' member of Turkey asserted that in the Islamic Republic of Iran there was still systematic discrimination in employment and occupation on the basis of sex, religion and political opinion. For example, discrimination on the basis of sex was based on Islamic law, the Shari'a, under which men were considered to be superior to women in intelligence, in knowledge and in power. He wondered how equality in employment and occupation could prevail in a State based on a religion which considered women to be inferior to men. Moreover this discrimination was reinforced by legislation, including sections 899 to 902, 1122 to 1123, 1133 to 1134, 1169 and 1180 of the Civil Code. With regard to discrimination on the basis of religion, he considered that it could take three distinct forms: first of all, discrimination against officially recognized religions, in legislation but mainly in practice; secondly, discrimination against religions that were not officially recognized, which was the case of the Baha'is; and thirdly, discrimination against Moslems who did not appear to fulfil the requirements of Islam since, under the Government Ordinance dated 13 August 1995, those who had a religion, but who were known not to observe religious standards, had no right to work. He asserted that, unless there was a separation of religion from the State, and unless there was a secular system based on genuine democracy, there was no hope of an end to discrimination in employment and occupation. He wholeheartedly supported the proposal of a special paragraph if a direct contacts mission was not accepted by the Government.

The Workers' member of Greece noted that it was difficult not to mention religion, as the object of the discussion was discrimination on the basis of religion. This was not the first time that this question had been raised and it seemed an easy way out to accuse those who provided information, such as Amnesty International, of not being impartial. No country had been able to base their prosperity on the exploitation and discrimination of elements of their population, and history had taught us that all powers which hold on to such practices had been overthrown. A certain progress was discernible, at least as regards the will demonstrated by the Government to pursue a dialogue. But if this only represented an interest by the Government to enhance its international image, this dialogue was useless. If the Government, however, was genuinely prepared to cooperate with the ILO in order to find solutions, it should show its willingness by requesting a direct contacts mission. He supported the common position of the Workers' and Employers' members in this respect, and requested a clear reply to this question from the Government representative.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom pointed out that the statistics quoted in the Committee of Experts' report indicated that while the population had grown, the average number of women active in the labour market had dropped from 15.94 to 10.73 per 100 men between 1976 and 1991. The observation, quoting data from the Iranian Centre of Statistics in 1994, noted that in industrial enterprises there was an average of only 5.92 women working for every 100 men. Women appeared to be disappearing from public view. She also pointed out that some occupations and jobs were closed to women and wondered how the Government was tackling this situation. The vast majority of women had no right to employment without their husband's permission. Thus it was men, by and large, who determined whether and in what jobs women could be employed. It was not enough to have a means of complaint about this situation, since it was not reasonable to expect women to be able to have access to justice this way. It was the practice itself that should be stopped by firm Government action. Moreover, although the Government representative had indicated that 97 women were currently serving throughout the country in various judicial positions, she wondered whether those women mentioned were active magistrates, judges, advocates or were they administrators? The question was, did women actually dispense justice in the courts? On the issue of women in further and non-traditional education, the figures did not provide enough evidence to make a judgment about whether there had been progress. There was no information about baseline numbers, only percentages. This did not explain very much. However, these specific points could not be looked at without considering the overall context of lives of women in the Islamic Republic of Iran, a tough situation referred to in a report circulated at the 53rd Session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights (April 1997). In the light of this context where there was institutionalized and systematic segregation, repression and oppression of women, it was very hard to see how the requirements of Convention No. 111 could be respected.

The Workers' member of Italy noted that, while the observations of the Government were detailed, no concrete element was found, neither on the absence of equal opportunities for women, whose work was subordinated to the approval of the husband, and who had to put up with the daily pressure of religious groups, nor on discrimination against Baha'is and other religious minorities in the areas of teaching and access to employment. The principle of religious tolerance, contained in Article 23 of the Iranian Constitution, was violated in practice by a series of discriminatory provisions. The religious criteria for access to employment in the teaching sector had been extended to numerous other sectors and no signs of softening this position had been noted since last year's discussion. However, the acceptance of technical assistance from the ILO, as well as the visit of the United Nations Special Rapporteur to the country, were encouraging signs. Nevertheless, only a well prepared direct contacts mission could really improve the situation.

The Government members of Kuwait and Saudi Arabia stated that, in their opinion, this Committee should not deal with political and religious matters.

The Government representative indicated that a lot of things that had been said in this Committee were a discredit to the ILO, its supervisory bodies and the future discussions on the strengthening of the supervisory system. Many interventions were in fact political statements made against a democratically elected Government, and not factual statements based on the report of the Committee of Experts. He saw no reason to respond to these political statements. Moreover, although many participants had indicated that not enough information or statistics had been provided by the Government, this was not true since it had furnished a report of over 100 pages to the Committee of Experts. It was to be emphasized that a UN report which had been referred to by a previous speaker was not in fact a report of the United Nations. Moreover, the statement about the oppression and repression of women came straight from a paper being distributed in the ILO by a group from a country near the Islamic Republic of Iran. He had hoped for dialogue and had noted that the Committee of Experts had thoroughly examined the last, detailed report. But this Committee's debate included highly political allegations, such as the statements on the lack of tripartism, non-elected posts and the assassination of priests, all of which he strongly denied. Even the allegations on section 11A of the Civil Code did not take account of the text's legal provisions which gave the same right to both husbands and wives to take such a case to the courts; in some other countries this also occurred. He noted that when another speaker challenged the tallying of statistics, it was because that speaker was using data from unreliable sources. It was not true, as intimated by an earlier speaker, that his Government had accepted the visit of a direct contacts mission to the country last year. On the question of such a mission, the report of the Committee of Experts correctly represented the Government's position. It was obvious that, given the tenor of the debate which had just taken place, a direct contacts mission would not be welcomed. In fact, there was a practical reason for this: the new administration would not take office until next month. He concluded that he was proud of his country and his religion, while at the same time respecting all religions.

The Employers' members stated that they were disappointed by the explanations provided by the Government representative, as well as his protest concerning the allusion to issues related to religion. This was not a proper way to conduct the dialogue. At issue here was not a discussion on religious matters, but problems related to the application of a Convention which had been ratified by his country and in which it was provided that religion was grounds for illegal discrimination in employment and occupation. No new information had been provided in response to the Committee of Experts' observations which had been communicated to the Government two months ago. The Government representative had not responded to the proposal concerning a direct contacts mission. The need to urgently send such a mission should once again be stressed, and the importance of this case justified the inclusion of the conclusions in a special paragraph in the report of this Committee.

The Workers' members declared that they were also disappointed by the lack of responses from the Government representative. New information should be provided to the Committee of Experts. In their opinion, there was nothing in the debate which discredited either the reputation of the ILO or that of the supervisory system, as the subject under discussion was a ratified Convention, providing, inter alia, for protection against discrimination based on religion. It was regrettable that the Government representative did not respond to the proposal made last year to request a direct contacts mission. This disappointing and incomprehensible attitude stood in stark contrast to the Government's statements concerning its willingness to have dialogue with the supervisory bodies. It was not enough to send reports but some progress in practice had to be demonstrated. In this context, the sending of a direct contacts mission was needed more than ever. This case should be included in a special paragraph in the report of the Committee.

The Committee took note of the observations that the Committee of Experts had been formulating for several years, the oral information presented by the Government representative as well as the detailed discussion in the Committee. It also took note of the explanations provided by the Government for not heeding the offer of a direct contacts mission, as well as on technical assistance which had been provided in accordance with the priority given by the Government. The Committee noted with concern that in spite of concrete initiatives and time which had elapsed, violations of the provisions of this as well as other Conventions subsisted, and required additional information. The Committee therefore expressed the firm hope that it would be informed of the measures that would be adopted in order to eliminate any form of discrimination in job offers as well as in the criteria applied by the competent authorities to declare certain groups illegal. The Committee notes the statistical information on the employment of religious minorities and women, the information on the constitutional provision according to which it is forbidden to question people about their beliefs and the amendment permitting women to hold certain functions in the judiciary. The Committee expressed the wish that the Government would continue to provide information on progress made until such time as the national legislation and practice were in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee strongly urged the Government to accept the direct contacts mission evoked last year, in order to be able to register rapid and noticeable progress. The Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its report.

Convention No. 118: Equality of Treatment (Social Security), 1962

France (ratification: 1974). A Government representative noted that the Committee of Experts' observation comprised two sections. The first concerned the application of Article 3, paragraph 1, and Article 4, paragraph 1, of the Convention, and referred to the supplementary allowance of the National Solidarity Fund (FNS), the allowance for disabled adults and the invalidity and survivors' benefits. The second referred to all the social security benefits which had not been paid to non-nationals since the adoption of Act No. 93-1027 of 24 August 1993 concerning the supervision of immigration and the conditions for entry, reception or stay of foreigners in France. According to the Committee of Experts, this second point concerned also the correct application of the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97). The common denominator of these two sections was a discrepancy in the treatment between nationals and foreigners regarding, on the one hand, several benefits due to all foreigners living in France, and, on the other hand, all the benefits due to certain foreigners whose conditions of residence in France had been radically modified by the 1993 Act. As for the application of Article 3, paragraph 1, and more specifically the implementation of section (d) (invalidity benefit), sections L.815-2 and L.815-3 of the Social Security Code determined the conditions for the right to the supplementary allowance of the FNS for nationals, amongst which there was an obligation of residence in French metropolitan Departments or Overseas Departments or territories. He noted that the Parliament had progressively extended the places of residence, therefore giving an entitlement to the allowance to the Overseas Departments in 1961, and then to the overseas territories in 1987. The payment of this allowance to nationals was conditional upon their retaining a place of residence on French territory in conformity with section L.815-11 of the Social Security Code. For foreigners residing in France who wished to obtain this allowance, section L.815-5 stipulated that it was due to foreigners only if international agreements had been agreed upon. The application of this provision engendered several court cases. In 1991 the Supreme Court of Appeal decided that Algerian nationals residing in France could benefit from the FNS allowance under the same conditions as nationals. By six rulings handed down on 17 October 1996, the same Court overruled the interpretation according to which this allowance was due to foreigners only where international agreements of reciprocity had been agreed upon with the State from which these workers came. Although such agreements did not exist in that particular case, the Court based its decision prohibiting discrimination between nationals and foreigners on the cooperation treaties which existed between the State of the worker concerned and the European Community. The Court emphasized that Convention No. 118 was not an obstacle to the implementation of these treaties. Contrary to the Social Security Tribunal of Loire (which was a first-instance jurisdiction under the authority of the Supreme Court of Appeal) which was quoted by the Committee of Experts, the Supreme Court of Appeal did not base itself on the Convention but merely pointed out that it was not incompatible with certain cooperation treaties concluded by the European Community which forbade discrimination in their direct application. In a seventh decision handed down on the same day, the Supreme Court of Appeal applied the same reasoning to the payment to foreigners of the allowance for disabled adults, basing itself solely on European Community law and without mentioning the Convention. Therefore, the Government did not have at its disposal an interpretation from the highest judicial body regarding the scope of the provisions of the Convention concerning the allowance for disabled adults. The comments of the Committee of Experts in respect of the application of Article 4, paragraph 1, branch (d) (invalidity benefit) and branch (f) (survivors' benefit) referred to the residency requirement placed on foreigners in order to receive these benefits. By decision No. 89-269 DC of 22 January 1990, the Constitutional Council ruled that the principle of equality meant that foreigners residing in France would not be deprived of social security payments, so long as they were legal residents in the country prior to receipt of the benefit. Therefore, there was constitutional and court jurisprudence which recognized the principle of equality of treatment between nationals and foreigners with respect to social security benefits and which determined the conditions of their payments which could be included in agreements between the European Community and third countries. This jurisprudence led the Government to wonder whether the Convention was fully applied when such an agreement existed and, if so, whether it was only a form of supplement in view of the direct application of this agreement. This drew attention to the theme often discussed of the link between the standard-setting system of the ILO and that of the European Union.

The second part of the observation concerned the entitlement of social security benefits to foreigners who were not authorized to stay on the national territory since the adoption of the 1993 Act. The loss of right of residency could indeed occur although foreigners had contributed during the period when they were in a regular situation or even after the extinction of their rights. The newly elected Government had called for the repeal of this Act in the coming months. It was difficult to predict the contents of new legal provisions that would replace it but the Government would not fail to examine the real situations arising from the current legislation.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information provided as well as the additional details concerning the provisions currently applied and the recent jurisprudence. It was essential that this information be now provided in writing to the Office in order for the Committee of Experts to analyse it. In fact, the information provided verbally seemed to raise new questions. The Workers' members attached importance to the application of Conventions on equality of treatment for foreign workers in respect to fundamental rights, working conditions and social security, as had been demonstrated during the discussion on the application of Convention No. 97. Besides, that Convention would be the subject of a General Survey in the near future. The observation of the Committee of Experts noted discrepancies between the legislation and practice with respect to the requirements of Article 3, paragraph 1, and Article 4, paragraph 1, of the Convention. It noted the observations formulated by the French Democratic Confederation of Workers (CFDT) concerning the entitlement of social security benefits to foreigners who were illegal residents of the country, in order to clarify the scope of the Convention on this point by making it clear that foreign workers were entitled to these allowances as soon as they had contributed to social security for the periods in which they were in a regular situation. As regards Article 3, paragraph 1, the Committee of Experts pointed out that for several years the nationals of all States which signed Convention No. 118 were entitled to invalidity allowances. Being a national of a country which had signed a bilateral agreement was a requirement not included in the Convention and therefore constituted a violation of the Convention. In that respect, the Committee of Experts quoted a judicial decision. Regarding the requirement of residence, the Committee of Experts was of the opinion that it went beyond what was provided for in the Convention, which only provided that equality of treatment be guaranteed, without any condition of residence, to the nationals of the country which had ratified the Convention. Therefore, the Government had to reconsider the situation and modify its legislation and practice accordingly.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the information supplied, pointing out, however, that it would have been preferable to have it in writing so that the Committee of Experts could examine it. The complexity of the question made it difficult to comment on the basis of oral statements alone. The question raised was that of the preconditions for the right of a foreigner to receive supplementary benefits: was it sufficient that the State from which this person came had also ratified the Convention, or could France impose a condition of reciprocity? The Committee of Experts had mentioned a court decision where a foreigner had been granted his rights since his country had also ratified the Convention. According to the Government's explanations, a bilateral agreement was necessary, whereas the Committee of Experts was of the opinion that it was sufficient that the two States involved both ratify the Convention. The question of the scope of the obligations under the Convention was thus open. Another point of disagreement between the Government and the Committee of Experts was the residency requirement. A third question concerned persons in irregular situations who, although having paid contributions for many years, would lose their right to benefits in case of non-renewal of their residency permit. The Committee of Experts stressed that the loss of right of residence should not affect rights in the course of acquisition which the insured person can claim for the period of contribution in which he was in a regular situation. Since the Government representative had indicated that the 1993 Act would soon be repealed, it was important that this provision be eliminated rapidly, and that the Government provide full information so that the Committee of Experts would be in a position to assess the new situation and so that this Committee would, if necessary, be able to decide whether to discuss the case again.

The Workers' member of France thanked the Government representative for the detailed information provided. Nevertheless, he recalled that the Convention was an international treaty which should therefore prevail over internal law and that reciprocity agreements of the European Community with third countries could not exclude the application of Convention No. 118. The recent legislation and jurisprudence were contrary to the provisions of the Convention and the Government should submit to Parliament draft legislation in order to bring the law into conformity with the Convention. It was useful to place the problem in its general context. To lure the xenophobic electorate, the legislation relating to the conditions of entry and residency for foreigners had become increasingly restrictive in the last few years for migrant workers and asylum seekers, with the consequence that numerous well-integrated workers had suddenly became illegal workers without social protection. The new Government had just announced new measures to regularize their status, taking into account their family situation and their integration into society as well as a reform of the conditions of entry and residency. But one had to be vigilant, particularly with respect to the application of the legislation regarding Conventions Nos. 97 and 118. The Government should provide rapidly a report in which the compliance with the provisions of the Convention with respect to migrant workers would be demonstrated. In the meantime, French trade unions would make sure that the national policy vis-à-vis migrant workers was in conformity with the tradition of their country as well as international labour standards.

The Workers' member of Pakistan stressed the need to bring the legislation into conformity with Convention No. 118, particularly with regard to migrant workers. These workers contributed enormously to the national economy and therefore deserved the same rights as citizens. He concurred with the Committee of Experts' observation that the loss of residence by a foreigner should not result in the loss of all benefits from contributions paid for numerous years to the social security system. He was happy to know that the new Government elected in France had undertaken to make the necessary changes to the legislation.

The Workers' member of Germany associated himself with the interventions of other Workers' members and stated that the application of Convention No. 118 was very important and that it was justifiable that this Committee discussed it, even though the subject matter appeared to be very technical. In effect, migrant workers needed special protection in order to guarantee equality in social security. The Government representative was to be thanked for his explanations on national legislation and case-law. In this respect, the fact that a further judgment of a Tribunal of the First Instance (Montbéliard, June 1996) referred to the Convention as a basis for its positive ruling guaranteeing the allowance for disabled adults (referred to in the Committee of Experts' observation) should be noted with interest. However, it was not up to workers to take individually legal action before the courts to enforce their rights guaranteed by international Conventions. Thus, the Government should be urged to bring national legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Government representative thanked those who had taken the floor for their comments on this particularly complex legal situation and assured them that their comments would be faithfully transmitted to the authorities. This unusual debate on questions that were rarely raised encouraged further improvement in the dialogue with the Committee of Experts. Written information to this effect would be sent.

The Committee took note of the detailed information supplied by the Government representative and the discussion which had taken place of the questions which had, for many years, been the subject of comments by the Committee of Experts. Nevertheless, the Committee regretted that the Government's report on this Convention for 1996 had not been received. The Committee trusted that the Government would continue the dialogue with the ILO's supervisory bodies so as to find appropriate solutions that would be in full conformity with the Convention both in law and in practice. The Committee stressed the importance of the principle of equality of treatment between nationals and non-nationals in the field of social security. Given the technical complexity of this matter, the Committee trusted that the Government would send in the very near future a detailed report on all the questions raised by the Committee of Experts. The Committee reminded the Government that it could resort, if it so desired, to the technical assistance of the Office.

Convention No. 122: Employment Policy, 1964

Honduras (ratification 1980). A Government representative indicated that a new report had been submitted which contained all the details requested in the observation of the Committee of Experts. The Institute of Vocational Training (INFOP) was active in strengthening the financial and administrative management of the cooperative rural enterprises promoting participation of women; it also sought to coordinate the training of the forestry officials under the Corporation for Forestry Development of Honduras. Her Government was trying to facilitate the integration of young people, members of the ethnic minorities and disabled people into the different training activities. Programmes of enterprise development were oriented towards the creation of micro, small and medium enterprises.

The Government has adopted policies to rationalize the public service by reducing employment in the governmental sector. These measures were required by the conditions to obtain credits imposed by the international financial institutions on the governments of the developing countries. The speaker urged the Committee of Experts to take note of these realities in examining the application of the Convention.

Her Government was also promoting employment in the modern sector of the economy by increasing the production of export goods, particularly in zones of industrial development and through the diversification of agricultural production. Productive employment generated in the export zones amounted to 75,000 jobs. In the export enterprises women workers predominated and it was necessary to increase wages in the export processing zones.

With respect to the consultation of representatives of the sectors involved in the employment policy, the tripartite Council of Social Consultation was created to improve the national economy through consultations with all sectors of the society. The Government requested the Office to better support the development of programmes aimed at increasing the capacity of small and medium enterprises to hire unemployed workers.

The Workers' members made it clear that since this discussion would be the only case concerning the application of Convention No. 122 this year, their comments would only reflect considerations on the application of this important Convention which had been more thoroughly discussed during the general discussion. The Committee of Experts noted in its observation that the Government referred to structural adjustment and foreign debt constraints, to the budgetary situation as well as demographic growth as factors which were influencing its employment policy. The Government stated that despite the measures it had adopted to solve the problem of unemployment, the objective of full employment was still impossible to achieve because of the serious structural problems that the country was experiencing. At the same time, the Government stated that it had adopted measures to reduce public expenditure and encourage foreign investment, particularly in export zones. This purely economic approach where politics only seemed to follow macroeconomic criteria imposed by international financial institutions raised great concerns. Employment and the social situation were only considered in terms of cost or as the consequence of economic growth. On the basis of this logic, economic growth could have some positive effects on employment if these benefits were absorbed by financial markets or profited by a minority. On the other hand, the Convention stipulated that the economy was not a value in itself and that an active social and economic policy should have full employment as its objective. The request of the Committee of Experts for the Government to state clearly the consequences on employment of the various economic measures, including in the export zones, had to be fully supported. It was necessary to know the mechanisms put in place by the Government to ensure the coordination between the policial, economic and social policies. The observation of the Committee of Experts with respect to the conception and implementation of policies and programmes was essential, and the conclusions adopted during the Copenhagen Social Summit relating to the relations between the Bretton Woods institutions, other international institutions for development and the ILO had to be recalled. It would be useful if the Government could benefit from the ILO's technical assistance during its forthcoming negotiations with international financial institutions. Concerning the application of Article 3 of the Convention, the Workers' members stressed the necessity to extend the consensus on the employment policy to all sectors concerned, including the informal sector, and this should be done at all stages of social and economic decision making. It could not be emphasized enough that the obligations of the Convention be at the centre of social and economic policies. As requested by the Committee of Experts supplementary information on the practice, as well as on the intention of the Government regarding this question, should be provided.

The Employers' members were well aware of the economic difficulties encountered in Honduras. It faced significant problems of foreign debt, budgetary deficits and a rapidly growing population. A substantial portion of the workforce were unemployed. A critical condition for reversing the deterioration of employment conditions was to restore higher stable rates of growth. Only high economic growth and financial stability had provided preconditions for sufficiently high rates of growth of productive employment. This would include putting in place appropriate mechanisms, with follow-up, for financing in the informal sector and micro-enterprises in order to facilitate their gradual integration with the formal sector.

The Government had attempted to do this in part, by providing a support programme in the informal sector that had been set-up with ILO technical cooperation. The Government also had a rural development programme. These and other measures were needed to cope with the high rate of labour force growth as well as to reduce the existing pool of unemployed and underemployed. The process of job creation in Honduras would be more successful if its economy was more open and market oriented. Moreover, since success could be achieved where there was a high degree of social consensus, the Government should consult with the social partners as provided for under Article 3 of the Convention. The Government appeared to have draft legislation in this respect. The Employers' members were puzzled by the request from the Committee of Experts for information on the measures associated with the reduction of public expenditure to guarantee employment for those affected. In their view, employment could not be guaranteed and the Convention contained no such requirement. Finally, a greater effort was needed to develop access to education especially at the primary level, rural infrastructure, especially transportation and communication, credit schemes as well as public works programmes. Finally, job growth in export processing zones, as mentioned by the Government representative, was a good strategy for producing jobs.

The Workers' member of Honduras stated that structural adjustment of the economy required the reduction of the state apparatus which had resulted in the loss of employment for many workers. The principal sectors of employment creation, besides the public sector, were enterprises in the agricultural sector and more recently those in the free export zones. The international quotas imposed on the production of bananas and coffee had led to the closure of enterprises and brought great damage to the workers of Honduras. The jobs created in the export zones were not sufficient to compensate for this damage. The Government should deploy more efforts together with the private sector to create new employment and to create conditions to advance the application of the Convention. The speaker raised the possibility of the ILO assisting the Government to establish a tripartite committee to monitor and supervise ratified Conventions. At the same time he expressed his satisfaction with the progress of the tripartite dialogue in Honduras, particularly in the area of human rights. The assistance of the Office was very much appreciated.

The Government representative, referring to the previous interventions, gave an assurance that the recommendations made would be transmitted to her Government which would avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office, where it could be necessary.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as the declarations made by other speakers during the discussion. It noted that the Government indicated that it had supplied a report to the Office, containing indications in response to the comments of the Committee of Experts, in particular concerning the creation of productive employment and the manner in which account was being taken of the relations between the objectives of the employment policy and other goals of the coordinated political, economic and social policies. The Committee trusted that the representatives of all interested sectors would be consulted fully to ensure that the measures taken by the Government were implemented and oriented towards the fundamental objective of full, productive and freely chosen employment, as required by the Convention. The Committee hoped that the Committee of Experts would examine this new report at its next session in December this year. The Committee took note of the request made by the Government representative that the Office support programmes of strengthening small and medium enterprises and expressed its confidence that this request would be satisfied as soon as possible.

III. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE (ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and Information

(a) Failure to submit

The Employers' members regretted that 14 Governments had not supplied information on the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. These were countries which had not complied with this constitutional obligation for the last seven years; the complete list would include many more countries. The importance of the obligation to submit was very clear: it was the first of the obligations which permitted to inform public opinion about the instruments adopted by the Conference. There was no consequent obligation to ratify the Conventions nor to adopt any national legislation. Submission enabled information on ILO activities to be properly disseminated. Member States should be urged to comply with this constitutional obligation.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the statement made by the Employers' members. The situation with respect to the obligation to submit had to be improved, and the explanations contained in paragraphs 133 and 134 of the General Report of the Committee of Experts concerning the submission procedure should guide member States in complying with this important obligation.

A Government representative of Guatemala, the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, acknowledged non-compliance with this obligation due to the numerous institutional and personnel changes in his country during recent years. The situation could be improved with the technical assistance of the Office.

A Government representative of Madagascar recalled that at the previous session of the Committee, his Government promised to comply with the ILO obligations. Various Conventions had been submitted for consideration: the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96), the Migration for Employment (Revised) Convention, 1949 (No. 97), the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159), and the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173). Apart from Convention No. 97, all of the above-mentioned instruments had been ratified and in the near future the ILO's Director-General would be asked to register these ratifications. This showed the positive measures that the Government was adopting in relation to international labour standards.

A Government representative of the Seychelles stated that the failure of his Government to comply with the obligation to submit was due to the lack of sufficiently trained personnel. Priority was given to providing replies to the comments of the Committee of Experts and of other supervisory bodies. New personnel hired recently who had received training in the ILO Turin Centre could now attend to eliminating the delays accumulated. The speaker asked the Committee to be sensitive to the difficulties explained.

A Government representative of the United Republic of Tanzania indicated that it was necessary to collect additional information of a technical and practical nature to prepare the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to Parliament. The Ministry of Labour benefited from the advisory mission carried out by the standards specialist who had provided the necessary information. Given that the present session of Parliament was dedicated to budget questions, he hoped that at the next parliamentary session starting in October 1997 the submission obligation would be carried out.

The Employers' members regretted that of the 14 countries invited by the Committee to participate in this discussion, only a few had done so. The information provided should be duly taken into account, but it did not explain all of the existing problems. It was important that the international labour standards followed, at the national level, the procedure outlined by the Constitution of the ILO. The cases discussed should be mentioned specifically in the appropriate parts of the General Report of the Committee.

The Workers' members supported the above declaration. They noted that of the four Government representatives who took the floor, three had also appeared during the discussion of the automatic cases at the previous session of the Conference. Where real difficulties were involved, the Employers' members suggested that these countries could resort to the technical assistance of the Office to overcome some of them.

The Committee took due note of the various information and explanations provided by the Government representatives. The Committee also took due note of the specific difficulties encountered in meeting the submission obligation, mentioned by those Government representatives who took the floor. The Committee further took note of the commitment made by a number of governments with respect to meeting their constitutional obligations to submit, as quickly as possible, the Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. The Committee expressed the hope that the countries mentioned, that is Cameroon, Ecuador, Guinea, Haiti, Madagascar, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Syrian Arab Republic, United Republic of Tanzania, and Yemen would, in the near future, submit a report containing information regarding the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. The delay or failure to submit and the accumulated delays in a series of cases was still of greater concern to the Committee in as much as this was an essential constitutional obligation for the proper functioning of the ILO's standards system. In this context, the Committee recalled the possibility of requesting technical assistance of the Office to help countries concerned in meeting their obligations. The Committee decided to mention all of the aforementioned cases in the appropriate section of its General Report.

(b) Information received

Second item on the agenda: Programme and budget proposals and other financial questions

Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99: Supplementary information submitted to the Conference in pursuance of the decision of the Governing Body in March 1997

1. In concluding its discussions of the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99, the Governing Body decided, without prejudice to these proposals, to request the Director-General:

(a) to provide a covering document for the Programme and Budget for 1998-99 to the International Labour Conference that would pull together information from the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99, the introductory presentation by the Director-General to the Governing Body, the information presented in GB.268/PFA/6/S2, and the replies by the senior management during the PFAC deliberations, in order to provide ILO participants with a cohesive overview of the strategic strategies with the supporting activities and resources.

Subparagraph (b) in the decision of the Governing Body concerns the practice to be followed in future biennia, beginning with the Programme and Budget proposals for the biennium 2000-01.

2. In accordance with this decision of the Governing Body, this Provisional Record contains the following parts:

- Part I: Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 — Presentation by the Director-General of the proposals (GB.268/PFA/6/2).
- Part II: Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 — Supplementary information requested by the IMEC group (GB.268/PFA/6/S2).
- Part III: Summary of the replies of members of the ILO's senior management team to points raised in the discussion in the GB/PFAC in March 1997.
- Part IV: Revised graphs and tables reflecting the decisions of the Governing Body in March 1997 concerning resource levels.

SIXTH ITEM ON THE AGENDA

Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99

Presentation by the Director-General of the proposals

1. The Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 are intended to accurately reflect the strategy established by the Organization in the last few years and, in particular, the suggestions made in the Governing Body in the course of the budgetary process launched in March last year.

2. The permanent objectives of the ILO have been confirmed and refined since 1994. The Organization must be:

- a centre of excellence and reference in the field of employment and labour, whose work is regarded as authoritative at the international level. The Office must be able to identify and analyse the changes that are taking place. In order to do so it must be a place where practitioners and researchers meet and exchange views;
- the focus for the elaboration, implementation and supervision of workers' rights. The emphasis must be on respect for the fundamental rights of workers in the globalized economy and the overall improvement of ILO standard-setting activities so that the relevant instruments may be rapidly ratified by the greatest possible number of member States and amended as the situations evolve, and so that their application may be supervised effectively;
- an Organization offering services to all its constituents and member States. This means paying special attention to the rapid changes faced by its constituents, and to the challenge of dwindling resources and widespread competition in the field of international aid.

3. The Governing Body has also confirmed that it will pursue the strategic approach developed since 1992, in order to respond to the major challenges raised by political upheavals and the globalization of the world economy.

4. The first of these is to promote the advance of democracy in all member States, in particular those which have also embarked on the transition towards a market economy. The second is to provide support and assistance to member States and constituents in the fight against poverty, which constitutes a real affront to human dignity in many countries. The third concerns the protection of workers, including vulnerable categories such as women, children and migrant workers, in line with the ILO's primordial objective of improving conditions of work and life.

5. In order to achieve these objectives, the Organization will have to meet four major challenges during the 1998-99 biennium. These are:

— the renewal of its standard-setting activity;

— the fight against child labour;

— follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen;

— follow-up to the Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing.

6. The renewal of the ILO's standard-setting work will be a major focus of attention in the biennium 1998-99. This renewal process will be inspired by the conclusions to be reached by the Governing Body and the discussions that will take place in the Conference in 1997. The promotion of the ratification of the fundamental Conventions, the strengthening of the supervisory machinery and the adoption of a new instrument in the fight against child labour will be the key components of an overall strategy to improve the credibility and visibility of the Organization's standard-setting activity.

7. The second major challenge concerns child labour. The work being done by the Office in terms of research and development and the action taken by the IPEC Programme, backed by the will of decision-makers in government and employers' and workers' organizations, will be continued and expanded. Due account will be taken of the conclusions of the Amsterdam, Cartagena and Oslo meetings. (See figure 1.)

8. The third major challenge facing our Organization today, as it certainly will throughout the coming biennium, concerns the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development in Copenhagen. This Summit revealed a high level of confidence in the Organization. The Office is already following up on the Copenhagen Summit through concrete action at the national level. In the coming biennium it will continue to provide assistance to its constituents in member States in the field of employment policy. Closer coordination will be called for between the different international organizations. In addition, a new International Small Enterprise Programme will be launched. (See figure 2.)

9. The fourth challenge of the coming biennium will be the follow-up to the World Conference in Beijing. An International Programme on More and Better Jobs for Women has been developed and will be launched during the next biennium. The ILO will also step up its activities in this area in response to requests from its constituents in various member States. (See figure 3.)

10. The increase in resources that are proposed to be allocated under the ordinary budget in the coming biennium to headquarters departments for child labour represents over 170 per cent; for employment strategies, over 46 per cent; and for activities for women, over 45 per cent. The work being done in these areas by regional departments and with extra-budgetary resources also accounts for a considerable increase in the resources available.

11. Lastly, several innovations are proposed for the biennium 1998-99. A total of 16 new action programmes are envisaged, taking account of the preferences expressed by the Governing Body in November. In addition, a Global Programme on Occupational Safety, Health and Environment will be implemented. A particular effort is also envisaged in the area of industrial relations.

12. Another innovation is the proposal to convene an ILO Social Forum as part of the strategy of promoting respect for fundamental workers' rights, as well as tripartism and dialogue among the social partners. The International Consultative Meeting concerning Follow-up to the World Social Summit is another new initiative that should be one of the highlights of the coming biennium, since it will provide an opportunity to review the results achieved at the national policy level.

13. Taking into account the views expressed by the Governing Body and the Conference in recent years, the distribution of resources by major sector of activity is proposed as follows:

Distribution of resources by sector of activity for the biennium 1998-99

	1996-97		1998-99		Difference
	Programme and budget	% of total budget	Proposals	% of total budget	US dollars	%
Policy-making bodies	92 493 834	15.96	81 101 988	14.54	-11 391 846	-12.32
General management	9 488 450	1.64	9 488 450	1.70	0	0.00
Technical programmes at headquarters	177 588 612	30.65	173 760 477	31.15	-3 828 135	-21.6
Regional services	145 623 827	25.13	147 368 292	26.42	1 744 465	1.20
Substantive and operational programmes	323 212 439	55.77	321 128 769	57.57	-2 083 670	-0.64
Service and support activities	132 145 378	22.80	125 959 801	22.58	-6 185 577	-4.68
Various	22 159 899	3.82	20 116 042	3.61	-2 043 857	-9.22
Total	579 500 000		557 795 050		-21 704 950	-3.75

14. Over several biennia the budget share for the regions has been consistently increasing and the next biennium will be no exception. Their share in the ordinary budget rose by 1.78 per cent in real terms in 1996-97 in comparison to 1994-95 and the proposals for 1998-99 imply an increase of 1.20 per cent in real terms, in comparison to the biennium 1996-97. In contrast to the regional services which will enjoy increased resources, the other major sectors will see their resources reduced, some of them considerably, including policy-making bodies and service and support activities. The substantive and operational programmes will also have an increased share of the budget in comparison to 1996-97. It should be borne in mind that the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 are 21,700,000 dollars lower than the budget approved for 1996-97.

15. Many of you have requested information on the way the programme and budget proposals are structured in relation to the Organization's major objectives as outlined above. The allocation of the resources proposed for the main technical programmes at headquarters and for those in the regions, based on these major objectives, means a choice must be made as to which programme corresponds to which major objective. While these choices were made with objectivity, they cannot be regarded as scientific. The aim of promoting employment and combating poverty represents 41 per cent of the ordinary budget resources allocated to the substantive and operational programmes. Almost 32 per cent of resources are allocated to the support of democracy and workers' rights. Lastly, proposals earmarked for the protection of workers represent almost 27 per cent of the total. (See figure 4.)

16. Examining the proposals for the regular budget and the expected extra-budgetary resources together allows a comparison to be made of the total resources for the pursuit of each of these major objectives. The principal portion of the extra-budgetary resources — 63.5 per cent — is allocated to activities in support of the major objective of employment and combating poverty. Support to democracy receives just under 9.5 per cent of extra-budgetary resources, while the major objective of worker protection receives a comparable percentage of extra-budgetary and ordinary budget resources. This comparison gives rise to a variety of interpretations. I will simply recall that extra-budgetary resources are used primarily for problems which the constituents in member States consider to be priority issues, and that they also reflect the preferences of donors in allocating resources. I will refrain from commenting on these comparisons which, I repeat, serve essentially as a broad indication, except to say that it appears legitimate for the Office to allocate almost 32 per cent of its ordinary budget resources from the sector of substantive and operational programmes to the objective of support to democracy and the respect of fundamental workers' rights, since these issues are truly at the heart of its mandate and a considerably lower proportion of extra-budgetary resources are allocated to this objective. (See figure 5.)

17. Movements in the dollar exchange rate led me to propose reductions in expenditure for 1996-97, some of which were taken up by the Governing Body in November 1995. I also committed myself at that time to ensure that an equivalent level of reductions would be found in my Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99. (See figure 6.)

18. My proposals constitute a reduction of 3.75 per cent in programme terms in comparison to the 1996-97 Programme and Budget. Even allowing for adjustments to take inflation into account, the level of these proposals is even lower than in 1996-97. In other words, we are not only in a situation of negative real growth, but also in one of negative nominal growth at a constant rate of exchange. The Organization has always believed that it should protect itself against the hazards of exchange rate movements so as to avoid negative repercussions on the Organization's programmes. Today it must be said that the situation we find ourselves in is radically different to that of 1995 given that at last week's exchange rate my programme and budget proposals represent a reduction of over 16 per cent in United States dollars. The Office has never sought to benefit from exchange rate movements, nevertheless, the current favourable situation should now be mentioned as the Organization found itself to be negatively affected when the situation was so unfavourable two years ago.

19. These proposals, which constitute a reduction of 3.75 per cent, could not have been made if a whole series of reforms had not been undertaken and implemented in recent years. These reforms will be consolidated, and new reforms are now being proposed, some of which will be discussed during this session of the Governing Body. They are all aimed at making our Organization more relevant, more effective in the services it provides and also more efficient, by constantly improving productivity and through better cost control.

20. As regards the relevance of the ILO, two major reforms have been introduced. The first, an integral part of the active partnership policy, consisted of developing, with all the constituents at the national level, studies to establish country objectives. This reform not only served to bring the Organization closer to its constituents, but also to ensure that its activities correspond more exactly to their needs and priorities. The second reform is a much more recent one. It concerns the strategic planning process in the Office which has just been improved by the introduction of two new stages. The first was introduced in November, and gives the Governing Body the possibility to indicate its preferences regarding the programme and budget proposals, which are now under discussion. The other new stage will begin next November in the form of a discussion in the Governing Body to evaluate the implementation of the 1996-97 Programme and Budget during the first three terms of the biennium to draw conclusions useful for the preparation of the Preliminary consultation discussion to be held in March 1998. These two reforms will not only make our activities more relevant but will also improve the coherence between the priorities identified at the national level and those decided by the Governing Body at the international level.

21. It is perhaps in relation to the quality of services provided to constituents that the most progress will be seen in the next biennium, progress which will be particularly tangible. We propose using the potential of the Internet to the maximum to make the information we have at our disposal and the products we produce, directly and fully accessible to all constituents, in their countries and at their institutions. By the end of the next biennium the quality of the services the constituents will be receiving from the Office will be greatly increased and the dialogue with them greatly enriched.

22. Just as important are the reforms aimed at making the Organization more efficient, which are being pursued with considerable determination. I have just decided to apply throughout the Office a monitoring, evaluation and reporting system (MERS) to be integrated in the Office's strategic planning and programming process. Work is now under way on the methods of applying this system of management by objectives, which will be fully implemented as from the biennium 1998-99. This will certainly help to make ILO activities more transparent. In order to achieve productivity gains and cost reductions, the Office will continue to decentralize administrative and financial tasks and to make use of new technologies. The reforms introduced have already achieved tangible savings, as can be seen from the graph showing savings in various major programmes. The International Labour Conference, which in my programme and budget proposals accounts for $13 million, would have cost over $20 million today if reforms had not been made since 1990-91. If the same comparison is applied to internal administration costs, savings amounting to approximately $7.8 million have been achieved today in comparison with the biennium 1990-91.

23. The application of reforms and the overall improvement of the quality of services provided call for an active personnel policy. Numerous changes have been introduced here, in particular with regard to training. The Governing Body now has before it a set of proposed improvements concerning selection and recruitment procedures. Others currently being prepared cover:

- the system of work evaluation;
- staff mobility;
- all aspects of training.

24. These reforms were implemented thanks to the encouragement provided by the Governing Body and the decisions it has taken. They are also due in no small measure to the efforts made by the Office staff, without whom none of this would have been possible. They are the fruit of their labour, their imagination, their availability, and their willingness to adapt and be trained in the new tasks required of them in the light of the Organization's updated objectives.

Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99

Supplementary information requested by the IMEC group [1]

Statement by the representative of the Director-General

(Mr. Kirszbaum, Director, Bureau of Programming and Management)

During the general discussion on the Programme and Budget proposals, on 11 March the representative of the Government of Canada, speaking on behalf of the IMEC group, requested the Office to provide additional information on the proposals. I will first recall the wording of the questions asked by the IMEC group and then set out in reply the information that it has been possible to assemble in the time available. To facilitate understanding of the replies to certain questions, charts are attached.

The IMEC statement, the words of which are precisely reproduced in bold italics below, requested that during the detailed review of the major programmes the following information be provided:

"2. For those programmes outlined in sections B (50-145, 225, 230), as well as programme 100:"

2.1 "how the objectives of the programmes relate to the three priority objectives, and an estimate of the financial and staff resources that would be allocated to these priorities"

Charts 1 to 3 attached concerning the biennium 1998-99 which indicate the financial and staff resources under each major programme associated with the three priority objectives. As indicated in the Director-General's presentation of his proposals on 10 March, these figures should be viewed as very broad estimates of a purely indicative character.

---

[1] This document will be appended to the third report of the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee.

2.2 "shifts of resources between priority objectives from the 1994/5, current, and next biennium"

I shall now give broad indicative estimates for 1994-95, [2] 1996-97 and 1998-99.

Objective	1994-95		1996-97		1998-99
Democracy	$84.5	33.9%	$101.6	31.4%	$102.5	31.9%
Employment	$96.1	38.5%	$132.4	41.0%	$132.3	41.2%
Protection	$68.9	27.6%	$89.2	27.6%	$86.3	26.9%
	$249.4		$323.2		$321.1

2.3 "what are the core fixed costs in the programme (i.e. activities that are required through legal or regulatory obligations), and estimates of financial and staff resources devoted to these activities"

The Legal Adviser will respond to this point in due course. [3]

2.4 "what activities have been terminated; and what new activities have been planned for completion during the 1998/9 biennium"

Labour and social issues identified by ILO constituents as requiring work by the Office are often the subject of different activities in successive biennia. For example, a research project in one biennium may pave the way for information dissemination (through publications, manuals, guidelines and country seminars) in the following biennium, or to technical advisory services, and possibly to other research in related fields. Once expertise has been developed in relation to a particular social issue there is a continuing demand from ILO constituents for advisory services; and thus a need for continuing research work to update the original information base in one way or another. For these reasons it is unusual for the ILO to terminate activities in relation to any significant social issue. If ILO activities cease for any reason, the mandate of the Organization may well lead to such activities being restarted at a later date. For example, work on the link between educational qualifications and employment formally came to an end during the financial crisis of the late 1970s, but as demonstrated in the present Programme and Budget proposals, this issue is an important one, and new work is now envisaged in relation to it.

However, certain technical activities in each Programme and Budget, including in particular action programmes and meetings, are designed to be relatively self-contained, and intended to be brought to a conclusion, as regards their own limited objectives, by the end of a biennium. Thus, the following technical activities contained in the Programme and Budget for 1996-97 should in principle be concluded by the end of the biennium:

[2] The figures for 1994-95 became available after this statement was made. The lower total figure for 1994-95 is due to differences in the exchange rate.

[3] See Appendix.

- Action programmes
  - Youth unemployment (major programme 60)
  - Privatization, restructuring and economic democracy (major programme 65)
  - Skills and entrepreneurship training for countries emerging from armed conflict (major programme 70)
  - Labour inspection and equality of rights for women in the workplace (major programme 80)
  - Safety in the use of chemicals at work (major programme 90)
  - Manual on action planning for the progressive elimination of child labour (major programme 90)
  - The reform and development of systems of social protection (major programme 110)
  - Social security programmes, the improvement of governance, management, administration and operation (major programme 110)
  - Social safety nets, social assistance and poverty prevention (major programme 110)
  - Standard setting for statistics on income from employment (major programme 120)
  - Standard setting for statistics of underemployment (major programme 120)
  - Economic reform and structural change, promoting women's employment and participation in social funds (major programme 125)

- Meetings
  - Maritime Conference
  - Two meetings of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Standards and Recommendations
  - Tripartite meeting of experts on future ILO activities in the field of migration
  - Meeting of Experts on Workers' Privacy
  - Meeting of Experts on Workers' Health Surveillance
  - Meeting of Experts on Labour Statistics
  - ILO Enterprise Forum
  - Ten sectoral meetings

- Other major activities
  - Publication of the 4th edition of the Encyclopaedia on Occupational Health and Safety
  - Establishment of the ILO site on the Internet

Additional information on completed activities will be presented to the Governing Body in November 1997 in the form of an interim report on programme implementation during the present biennium, with special emphasis on impact evaluation. A further and more comprehensive report on ILO activities in the biennium will be submitted to the Conference in 1998 by the Director-General.

- New activities planned for the 1998-99 biennium include:
  - 16 action programmes
  - Globalization, area-based enterprise development and employment
  - Labour market information systems for human resource development
  - Tripartite participation and social dialogue on training
  - Financing of training
  - Social investments: Job creation through innovative financial instruments
  - Productivity improvement, competitiveness and quality jobs in developing countries
  - Small and medium-sized enterprise development for employment
  - Cooperative approaches to collective bargaining
  - The contribution of industrial relations to regional economic integration
  - Organization and management of labour administration
  - Social initiatives by enterprises
  - Safety culture
  - Action against extreme forms of child labour
  - An operational framework for pension reform
  - Strategies to combat youth marginalization and unemployment
  - Improving the quality of women's employment

- Research items on the following topics (many of which constitute updating exercises to ensure that ILO advice remains relevant and well-informed)
  - The employment and labour market impact of regional blocs
  - Job creation and destruction
  - Structural adjustment, employment and role of the social partners
  - Labour market flexibility and employment security
  - Labour market policies for transition economies
  - Economic development and core labour standards in developing countries
  - Improving labour market indicators
  - The role of the State and the private sector in training
  - Drawing lessons from migration policy analysis
  - Job retention and disability management at the workplace
  - Entrepreneurship and small-enterprise development
  - Workers' representation in multinational enterprises
  - Improving the content and quality of work

  - Public sector pay
  - The changing role and responsibilities of labour inspection
  - Elimination of child labour (labelling, corporate and trade union policies)
  - The economic implications of action against child labour
  - Safety in the use of biological agents at work
  - Labour and social implications of genetic screening
  - Violence at work
  - Work and protection: Options for the twenty-first century
  - Working time and gender
  - Working time, health and safety
  - The financing and delivery of health care
  - Principles of social security
  - Working time and productivity
  - Strengthening the organisational capacity of excluded groups
  - Promoting social dialogue for job creation and poverty elimination
  - The future of urban employment
  - Home work

- Launch of new technical cooperation programmes
  - the International programme for more and better jobs for women
  - the International Small Enterprise Programme
  - the ILO Global Programme on Occupational Safety, Health and Environment

- The adoption of new standards on —
  - child labour
  - conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises
  - contract labour

- A major project to enhance the usefulness of five major ILO databases:
  - CISDOC
  - LABORDOC
  - LABORSTA
  - ILOLEX
  - NATLEX

- Convening of an ILO Social Forum which would focus on core Conventions

- Increased resources and emphasis on industrial relations, including —
  - creation of an Industrial Relations Information Network (IRNET)
  - action programmes on cooperative approaches to collective bargaining and regional economic integration

- research on workers representation in multinational enterprises, improving the content and quality of work, and public sector pay

- Increased resources for the elimination of child labour, including:
  - regular reports on trends in child labour
  - a meeting of experts on labour inspection and child labour
  - research on the economic implications of action against child labour and on labelling and corporate conduct
  - an action programme on extreme forms of child labour
  - new international labour standards

- Volume 3 of World Employment

- A major report on social protection

- A major publication on the fundamental principles of occupational health and safety

2.5 "management structure and costs"

Each major programme in the technical sector is headed by a department or bureau director who is graded at the D2 or D1 level.

- There are 10 D2s managing major programmes in the technical sector
- There are 3 D1s managing major programmes in the technical sector
- The total staff costs of these officials is $5.2 million (at 1996-97 standard costs).

- The director of a major programme is assisted by officials who manage the various programmes; these officials are graded at the D1 or P5 level (the standard cost for D1 and P5 is the same)
  - There are 21 managers at the programme level
  - The total staff costs of these officials is $7.1 million (at 1996-97 standard costs)

- It should be noted that all programme managers, at the major programme and programme levels, spend a substantial portion of their time on substantive issues, including the provision of technical guidance to their colleagues.

2.6 "how proposed research activities relate to the three priority objectives; how the proposals were identified, screened and quality checked in terms of subject and authors; how they relate to other research activities under way; and if they are in cooperation with other agencies or institutions"

I shall now list the research projects contained in the 1998-99 proposals with an indication of how they relate to the 3 priority objectives. Although some of these research activities relate to more than one of the three priority themes, only the main emphasis will be indicated. Thus some of these research topics contribute to the promotion of democracy and workers' rights, although this is not explicitly indicated here (e.g. that on economic development and core labour standards):

E = promoting employment and combating poverty
P = protecting working people

E	The employment and labour market impact of regional blocs
E	Job creation and destruction.

Selection of research activities

Research proposals are initially prepared by all branches in the technical departments of the Office taking account of a wide range of considerations, including: requests by constituents in the Conference, the Governing Body, regional meetings and sectoral meetings; the needs of constituents as manifested in country objective reviews; the needs for comparative research identified by the multidisciplinary advisory teams; the need to pursue areas of interest identified in earlier ILO research, or to update past research; and consultations in technical meetings, formal and informal, with experts in various social fields. Research proposals are then examined from the point of view of their relevance to the three major objectives of the Organization and their consistency with the objectives of the major programme to which they relate. Checks are undertaken in order to ensure that all research proposals clearly identify the problem to be addressed, and the way in which the research will contribute to the solution of the problem at the country level. Account is also taken of past work carried out by the Office, and by outside institutions, including other UN agencies and universities. Care is taken to ensure that the research proposals finally selected are policy-oriented, building wherever possible on research carried out elsewhere, including that completed by the International Institute of Labour Studies.

Early in the programming cycle the first draft proposals of all the technical departments are circulated at headquarters and in the regions; and the corresponding first draft of all the regional proposals is also circulated throughout the Office. This makes possible a comprehensive process of consultation and cross-checking to ensure internal consistency. Members of the senior management team have the opportunity of commenting on these first draft proposals to ensure full coherence between proposals for action programmes and research programmes emanating from headquarters departments with the needs of regions, including the need for background research to support the work of the multidisciplinary advisory teams. The reports of the discussions in the Governing Body and the Committee concerning the strategic orientations of ILO programme planning are also taken into account.

"3. For the regional and active partnership programmes (245-280): how the activities in these programmes relate to the three priority objectives; and ii) flows to developing countries, in particular the poorest"

ILO activities under the regional major programmes and the Active partnership and technical cooperation major programme are designed taking account of discussions concerning the three priority objectives in the Conference and the Governing Body, and most notably the discussions relating to the development of the Programme and Budget. In pursuance of the Active Partnership Policy, ILO activities in the regions are also formulated bearing in mind the various analyses prepared at the country level by MDT specialists who carry out country objective reviews or update them in consultation with ILO constituents. These reviews identify the major problems at the country level and define ILO objectives. Programmes are then formulated which are implemented by the countries concerned with ILO assistance and/or with external multilateral or bilateral cooperation.

The distribution of the resources of major programmes 245 to 280 among the three priority objectives can only be of an indicative nature because many of these activities contribute in many instances to more than one major objective. Bearing in mind this consideration, the regular budget resources of the regional and Active partnership major programmes in the 1998-98 proposals are distributed as follows (see also chart 4 attached):

— Democracy: 43.4 per cent (regular budget $ 63.7 million)

— Employment: 43.3 per cent(regular budget $ 63.6 million)

— Protection of workers: 13.6 per cent (regular budget $ 20.0 million).

The flow to developing countries is approximately $124.2 million in constant 1996-97 costs. This represents about 84.3 per cent of the regular budget resources for the regional services (major programmes 245 to 280; total: $147.34 million). This figure refers only to the flows of resources directly associated with the provision of services to developing countries. Therefore, the resources for major programmes 245 and 280 are excluded, as are the Tokyo and Washington Branch Offices. In addition, a significant proportion of the funds allocated to headquarters departments are devoted to developing countries mainly through activities such as technical advisory services (TAS), technical cooperation project support, interregional programmes, IPEC, action programmes, dissemination of information to constituents, and service and support to field programmes. Major programme 245 (Active partnership and technical cooperation) also contributes to the flow of resources to developing countries to an extent greatly exceeding its own level of resources by mobilizing extra-budgetary resources for technical cooperation activities in developing countries. Moreover, regular budget expenditure lays the basis for the considerable flow of extra-budgetary funds which are mobilized by ILO programmes for the benefit of constituents in developing member States.

The flow to the least-developed countries (40 ILO member States) represents some $47.2 million, or 38 per cent, of the total flow to developing countries indicated above. The estimates for the LDCs should also be regarded as indicative. This disaggregation of the total flow to developing countries is a forecast based on the expenditure of extra-budgetary resources for technical cooperation activities in 1995.

“Core fixed costs in the programme”

Note by the Legal Adviser

The question asked concerns the portion of fixed costs of certain programmes under section B, as well as Programme 100, which could not be reduced on account of legal or regulatory obligations, as well as an evaluation of the financial and staff costs assigned to these activities.

The following does not seek to provide a definitive reply, but rather simply to provide a framework in which replies could be given.

These replies will obviously depend on the exact phrasing of the question, and in this regard it appears that there has been some fluctuation in the terminology used. References have been made to “activities related to constitutional, legal and regulatory functions”, “activities to meet constitution, legal and related functions” and even to “activities that are required through legal or regulatory obligations”. The replies to these different questions vary considerably.

The first two formulations seem to have been abandoned. It is clear that speaking of activities “related to” constitutional functions would cover all the activities of the Office to the extent that it may undertake only activities that correspond to the functions that are assigned to it in article 10 of the Constitution. It also clear that although a function may be mandatory (for example to issue publications pursuant to article 10(2)(d)), their content would depend on instructions given by the Conference and the Governing Body, in particular in relation to budgetary provisions. Posed in this way, the question is largely circular.

It therefore seems that the question should be interpreted as referring to non-discretionary activities, that is those arising from constitutional or other legal obligations which neither the Conference nor the Governing Body has the power to evade. Under this interpretation, the general list is relatively easy to draw up.

First, this would include activities linked to the existence of the various institutions of the Organization and their meetings: the Conference, the Governing Body and the Director-General. Activities relating to these organs appear, however, mostly in section A of the Budget (as do Legal Services).

Then there are activities linked to constitutional functions that the Organization is required to fulfil in relation to standards already adopted by the ILO (since the Constitution does not require the Organization to adopt new standards). These include:

- the depositary function that the Director-General must carry out under article 20;
- follow-up on adopted instruments (articles 19(5) and 19(6));
- supervision of the application of ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 23 of the Constitution);
- representation cases and the resolution of complaints in accordance with article 24 and article 26 procedures. These activities are both mandatory in terms of function and discretionary as regards application, since the Governing Body is in theory not actually required to set up a Commission of Inquiry. For this reason there is no standing provision to that effect.

The activities corresponding to the above functions (including the Committee of Experts, although it is not foreseen in the Constitution) are performed by the International Labour Standards Department with technical contributions from the departments concerned as needed and from JUR as required.

In addition to constitutional obligations, some activities relate to contractual obligations which are not necessarily untouchable but from which the Organization could not withdraw as it pleases. This category involves contracts of all types, for the implementation of technical cooperation projects, for leases and for loan agreements (the headquarters building).

A final category could be grouped under the heading of obligations arising under international law. In application of article 12 of the Constitution, the Organization has concluded a number of agreements with international organizations and on occasion has undertaken technical cooperation programmes that imply activities from which the Organization could not withdraw without prior notice. These activities are distributed across the various technical programmes. Also falling into this category is the agreement concluded with the Government of Italy in 1983, article 1 of which contains certain engagements concerning the financing of the Turin Centre.

If the Governing Body so wished, a more detailed picture could be painted of costs that may not be reduced or which could be reduced only after respecting certain notice periods. However, the somewhat artificial nature of such an exercise should be stressed. On the one hand, the majority of such activities do not fall within section B. On the other hand, the Organization could theoretically withdraw, by various contrivances, from most of these obligations, including the supervision of standards (by their abrogation or by spacing reports). The only thing that would remain irreducible would be the existence of the institutional bodies of the Organization. But this is not an end in itself: and obviously, it would only be justified in relation to the promotion of the objectives of the ILO.

Para.
94	Director-General	Comments on the general discussion of the proposals
114	Mr. Tapiola	Responds to the questions raised by the Worker members and by the Government of France regarding the Provisional Record. Replies to the statements of the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States calling for a revitalized Conference. Also replies to questions relating to Regional Meetings and simultaneous interpretation.
118	Mr. Kirszbaum	Answers the question of the Government of Canada on behalf of the IMEC group regarding the composition and costs of the ILO's General Management.
123	Mr. Tapiola	Refers to the query about the efforts made to integrate the Sectoral activities programme with other ILO programmes.
124	Director-General	Replies to the question raised by the Governments of the United States, Japan and the United Kingdom on the future of the Conference, its profile and significance. Comments also on how to enhance the interest of the Conference for Ministers of Labour.
137	Mr. Tapiola	Replies to the question from the representative of the Government of Germany regarding the budgeting of travel costs for the Conference.
138	Mr. Kirszbaum	Responds to a question from the Government of the United States regarding the budgeting of General Management costs.
142	Mr. Ahmad	Provides further clarifications on how staff costs are budgeted throughout the Office.
233	Mr. Tapiola	Replies to questions relating to major programme 50 (International labour standards and human rights) and also refers to a question from the representative of Italy regarding the campaign launched by the Director-General to promote the ratification of the ILO's fundamental Conventions.
235	Mr. Hammar	Replies to issues raised in relation to major programmes 65 (Enterprise and cooperative development) and 85 (Multinational enterprises) by the Governments of Egypt, China, Swaziland and the Workers' group. Also refers to the Enterprise Forum of November 1996.
240	Mr. Taqi	Replies to issues related to major programmes 60 (Employment and training), 80 (Industrial relations and labour administration), 90 (Working conditions and environment), 110 (Social security), 120 (Statistics) and 125 (Development policies). Also responds in particular to comments made by several Governments including the United States, the United Kingdom, Turkey and several Employer and Worker members concerning the overlap between certain major programmes, action programmes, ILO work on labour market issues, IPEC, ISSA and the International Conference of Labour Statisticians.
255	Mr. Kirszbaum	Supplies the Committee with supplementary information requested by the IMEC group. This statement is reproduced in Part II of the present document.

Para.
313	Ms. Chinery-Hesse	Responds to issues raised by several Governments, including the IMEC and African groups, and members of the Employers' and Workers' groups in relation to major programme 245 (Active partnership and technical cooperation), and to five regional programmes: 250 (Africa), 260 (Americas), 265 (Arab States), 270 (Asia and the Pacific) and 280 (Europe and Central Asia). In particular, answers questions related to the presentation of these programmes, the distribution of their resources including travel costs, the allocation of their resources among regions; the implementation of the active partnership policy, the completion of country objectives reports, the use of RBTC funds, the evaluation of technical cooperation projects; and the link between technical cooperation activities and ILO standards.
325	Mr. Ahmad	Replies to the question whether the ILO's Financial Regulations affect its ability to attract extra-budgetary funding.
327	Mr. Trémeaud	Provides supplementary information in response to the question raised on the ILO's strategy for resource mobilization.
347	Mr. Ahmad	Replies to issues raised concerning major programmes 170 (Financial services), 175 (Internal administration) and 185 (Information technology and communications). Also responds to query about financial decentralization, the steps taken to reduce the ILO computer network, and travel expenses.
351	Ms. Hagen	Replies to the concerns expressed by Mr. Marshall of the Employers' group about the marketing strategy for ILO publications. Also refers to major programme 240 (International relations) with regard to the relationship between the ILO and the Bretton Woods institutions.
352	Director-General	Comments on a number of statements relating to the discussion of individual programmes and in particular the issues raised regarding staff administration, PERSIS, and the internal evaluation system (MERS).
368	Director-General	Indicates the major considerations he would take into account in proposals for adjustments to the original Programme and Budget proposals.

International Labour Conference

Provisional Record

Eighty-fifth Session, Geneva, 1997

Report of the Chairperson of the Governing Body to the Conference for the year 1996-97

The present report on the work of the Governing Body is submitted to the Conference in accordance with article 14 of the Standing Orders of the Governing Body. It covers the period since the last general session of the Conference (June 1996), i.e., the Governing Body's 266th (June 1996), 267th (November 1996) and 268th (March 1997) Sessions. This report focuses only on the highlights of the Governing Body's year, and does not cover matters that are otherwise before the Conference. Those wishing more extensive and detailed information on the work of the Governing Body as a whole are referred to the notes at the end of the report. They may also consult the minutes of its proceedings, or the documents submitted to its committees and to the Governing Body itself.

EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL POLICY

Follow-up on the World Summit for Social Development

The principal exercise in this field has been the ILO's work as lead agency for the ACC Task Force on Full Employment and Sustainable Livelihoods, created as part of follow-up on the Copenhagen Declaration and Programme of Action. Its mandate is to help governments give effect to the commitment made by heads of state and government at the Social Summit to promoting the goal of full employment. The Social Summit recognized the need to promote tripartite dialogue and social consensus in policy-making, and called on governments "to safeguard the basic rights of workers and, to this end, freely promote respect for relevant International Labour Organization Conventions, including those on the prohibition of forced and child labour, freedom of association, the right to organize and bargain collectively, and the principle of non-discrimination".

In November 1996 the Governing Body examined progress in the work of this Task Force with regard to the latter's decision to carry out country employment policy reviews.[1] It noted the outline for and modalities of the reviews, which involved the full consent of the government of the countries being reviewed and close tripartite consultation and participation of the ILO's constituents. The ILO was responsible for the reviews concerning Chile, Hungary and Nepal, and shared the leadership role with UNDP for the review concerning Zambia. The ILO retained overall responsibility for coordination and preparation of a synthesis report based largely on the reviews, including those conducted by UNDP on Morocco and by UNESCO on Mozambique, submitted to the UN ACC meeting in April, in order to provide the main lessons from country experiences in pursuing the objectives of full employment and sustainable livelihoods. A preliminary paper on the synthesis report was submitted to the Governing Body in March.[2]

Part of ILO contributions to the March 1995 World Summit for Social Development was the preparation of the report on World Employment 1995. In November 1995 the Governing Body had approved, in principle, the regular publication of World Employment as continued ILO follow-up on the Summit. In March 1997 the Governing Body conducted a discussion on World Employment 1996/97: National policies in a global context. The usefulness of the report and its renewed commitment to the objectives of full and freely chosen employment were noted.

In March the Governing Body took note of further information on work in relation to the Commission for Social Development[3] which selected "Productive employment and sustainable livelihoods" as the priority theme for its 1997 regular session and asked the ILO to serve as task manager for the preparation of a substantive document. In doing so the ILO has worked very closely with the United Nations secretariat, while obtaining the constructive involvement of other members of the UN system in preparing the draft report.

The Governing Body also noted the ILO's involvement in the work of the two other Inter-Agency Task Forces and one Inter-Agency Committee established by the ACC with a view to providing effective UN-system support for the integrated implementation, at the country level, of the action programmes that have emerged from recent UN summit conferences. These are the Inter-Agency Task Force on Basic Social Services for All, with the UNFPA as the lead agency, the Inter-Agency Task Force on an Enabling Environment for Economic and Social Development, with the World Bank as the lead agency; and the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality (see below, section on discrimination). The ILO has taken an active part in the work of the task forces and the committee, provided written contributions and assumed other responsibilities consistent with its mandate and work programme.

In November the Governing Body considered a report on the Second United Nations Conference on Human Settlements (Habitat II), held in Istanbul in June 1996.[4] It welcomed the adoption of the Habitat Agenda: Goals and Principles, Commitments and Global Plan of Action, and in particular the recognition given by the Conference to the role of the ILO in employment-related areas; requested the Director-General to ensure that the ILO was actively involved in the action taken by the United Nations system to implement the Habitat Agenda, that such follow-up was incorporated into appropriate ILO programmes and activities, as reflected in the Office's proposals for the Programme and Budget for 1998-99, and that the ILO's constituents and field structure were fully involved, since implementation would take place mainly at the national and local levels; and requested the Director-General to ensure that ILO activities on Habitat II were integrated into the follow-up machinery of the World Summit for Social Development, and in particular that issues relating to urban and local-level employment, including the informal sector, were addressed through the ILO's leadership of the UN Inter-agency Task Force on Employment and Sustainable Livelihoods.

Child labour

In March the Governing Body examined a detailed report on progress in the ILO's ongoing work on the elimination of child labour and its participation in related international developments.[5] The paper reported on progress in the signing of Memoranda of Understanding on child labour, which by March had been signed with 23 member States as a basis for long-term commitments in a joint effort to build up their capacity in the search for long-term solutions to the child labour problem. It reported on donations and total contributions pledged since 1992 and for the next 5 years to the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC). The report also covered the Letter of Intent signed between the ILO and UNICEF to guide their joint efforts. It described programme activities, through the promotion of standards and the IPEC programme, and discussed country programmes and the roles of government and of the social partners, as well as that of non-governmental international organizations.

The Governing Body also requested the Director-General to report annually on the operational aspects of IPEC to the Committee on Technical Cooperation at its March session.

In November the Governing Body noted the Director-General's decision to initiate a preliminary research study on the issue of voluntary labelling programmes and child labour with the aim of describing existing programmes and reviewing assessments that may be available of their effect on child labour and on industry and consumer behaviour in the industrialized and developing countries. This preliminary study is expected to be completed by June 1997 and will, in addition to providing a detailed review of existing programmes, provide the basis for possible proposals for further ILO research and activities in this field.[6]

Migrant workers

In November the Committee on Sectoral and Technical Meetings and Related Issues examined the report of the Tripartite Meeting on Social and Labour Issues concerning Migrant Workers in the Construction Industry (Geneva, March 1996), which made various recommendations concerning ILO activities in this area, in particular calling on it to play a leading role in follow-up on the Habitat Agenda and to support technical cooperation activities which encourage and promote urban employment.[7]

The Governing Body also approved a proposal for a general survey on Conventions concerning migrant workers, inviting governments to submit reports in 1998 under article 19 of the Constitution on the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97), the Migration for Employment Recommendation (Revised), 1949 (No. 86), the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143), and the Migrant Workers Recommendation, 1975 (No. 151).[8]

The Governing Body also approved the composition and agenda of the Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Future ILO Activities in the Field of Migration (Geneva, April 1997), which was to discuss guidelines on the protection of workers engaged under temporary migration schemes; guidelines on the protection of workers from one country recruited by private agents for employment in another country; and pattern or practice studies of the exploitation of migrant workers not falling under Convention-based procedures.[9]

ILO Enterprise Forum

In November the Governing Body took note of information concerning the outcome of the ILO Enterprise Forum, held in that month.[10] Some 550 participants had attended the Forum, which saw debates on several panels. The aim of the Forum was to bring entrepreneurs and senior managers of major enterprises together with the constituents of the Organization to discuss possible solutions in the ILO to the worldwide unemployment crisis, and its main theme was the promotion of social progress and enterprise competitivity in a global economy. It discussed the implications for enterprises and the ILO of a changing world economy; enterprises and jobs; social initiatives by enterprises; and the future role of the social partners at the enterprise level. Presentations were made of background papers and the ILO's Enterprise Strategy.

WORKING PARTY ON THE SOCIAL DIMENSIONS OF THE LIBERALIZATION OF INTERNATIONAL TRADE

In November the Working Party discussed the recent OECD publication Trade, Employment and Labour Standards.[11] It paid tribute to the analysis in the report and noted the support it lent for the ILO's own role, mandate and means of action. All agreed that it would continue to be important and increasingly urgent for the ILO to address these issues.

This role was further reaffirmed at the first Ministerial Meeting of the World Trade Organization in Singapore in December 1996. In March the Governing Body considered a paper summarizing developments at that meeting, which highlighted the many statements made at the meeting in support of the ILO's role. One of the main topics in Singapore concerned whether and how a reference would be made in the final documents of the meeting to labour standards, and in particular to the internationally recognized fundamental labour standards. The topic was ultimately addressed in paragraph 4 of the official final Declaration. This is of particular significance, as it represents the official point of view of the WTO as expressed by ministers of trade.[12]

The debate on the ILO's role concentrated on two issues. The first was the question of how to improve and strengthen the ILO's supervisory system and normative action more generally. This issue is described below in the section on international labour standards and the strengthening of supervisory procedures. Among the other additional suggestions made were the idea of regional monitoring mechanisms, peer reviews, and country policy reviews. The role of technical cooperation in promoting core labour standards, and the question of how to focus technical cooperation more effectively on such core standards, was also stressed.

The second issue was how to improve the research capacity and knowledge base of the ILO on those issues. Suggestions were made concerning a comprehensive programme for analysis of the issues and options concerning the social implications of globalization, and it was agreed that overall a more strategic approach was needed, incorporating the country studies and the research proposal and other relevant proposals included in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99, developing criteria and methodology, and ensuring a balanced approach. The Working Party will in November 1997 discuss the full range of ILO research on related issues with a view to developing an overall research strategy.

In November and March the Working Party examined replies to the Office questionnaire distributed to constituents in member States to obtain their views on current developments with regard to globalization and the liberalization of trade, and the impact they have had on social standards. The exercise met with mixed success, as the response rate was low (35 per cent), making it difficult to draw conclusions.[13] One outcome was that the Office was requested to prepare a short factual document on voluntary codes of conduct and labelling schemes for the Working Party's next meeting. The Working Party highlighted two important points regarding any future work the Office might carry out, whether in specific country studies or in wider research: first, the impact of globalization differed greatly between countries and sectors, and any analysis should take account of this variety of experience. It was also thought desirable to develop methodology and criteria for judging objectively, on the basis of national and enterprise-level data, both the extent and the social impact of globalization.

In March attention was also given to a paper bringing together various recent reports by UNCTAD, OECD, the World Bank and the IMF on aspects of foreign direct investment.[14] This paper covered four main issues: the growing significance of foreign direct investment in the global economy; the impact of foreign direct investment on economic growth and employment; the link between foreign direct investment and labour standards; and the implications for policy. This subject also formed the background to a set of proposals on investment and employment intended as an item for the 1999 Conference agenda.[15]

The Working Party also examined progress in identifying countries willing to be the subject of special studies on the social implications of globalization and trade liberalization. Seven countries (Chile, Jamaica, Jordan, Mauritius, the Republic of Korea, Poland and Switzerland) have so far volunteered. The Working Party encouraged the Office to continue its contacts with member States to see whether a few more countries, perhaps particularly from Africa and from among the developing countries, could be identified.

Information was discussed on a research item included in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99 concerning the economic impact of implementing core labour standards in developing countries.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR STANDARDS

Working practices and methods in the area of standard setting

Continuing the work begun in 1994 in response to the Conference resolution concerning the 75th anniversary of the ILO and its future orientation, the Governing Body gave further discussion to adapting the ILO's working practices and methods in the area of standard setting.

In March its Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards reviewed progress in the ratification and promotion of the ILO's fundamental Conventions, on which subject the Director-General had addressed a letter to all member States that had not ratified them in May 1995, followed by other subsequent letters.[16] Some 29 new ratifications had been registered since the letter was sent, and more were expected.

In November and March the Governing Body's Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards considered further papers on the strengthening of ILO supervisory procedures in relation to the implementation of fundamental human rights within its mandate.[17] These set out a catalogue of possible methods to be used and opened debate on the specific standards concerned, namely, those on discrimination in employment and occupation and forced labour (including child labour). This subject-area is also addressed by the Report of the Director-General to the Conference at its present session, and in the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. Work will continue on this subject in the coming year: in November the Governing Body will examine a paper that will take full account of the discussions to date and of those that will take place at the present session of the Conference on the Report of the Director-General; it will analyse the discussions, identify options, contain concrete proposals and a calendar for action, and will indicate the legal, financial and organizational implications of the different alternatives.

Revision of standards

The Working Party on Policy regarding the Revision of Standards continued its work in November and March[18] by examining the needs for the revision of Conventions concerning standards in various subject-areas. The Governing Body's decisions on these involved recommendations for the revision of, or general surveys on, certain Conventions, requests to Governments to consider ratifying the standards or to provide information or engage in consultations on other Conventions, or simply to maintain the status quo.[19] This work will continue in the coming year.

On the question of abrogation or termination, in November the Working Party examined a detailed document on the procedural aspects, the necessary safeguards and the various problems related to a constitutional amendment permitting the abrogation or termination of obsolete international labour Conventions by the International Labour Conference. A set of amendments to the Constitution and the Standing Orders of the Governing Body and the Conference are as a result before the Conference at the present session.[20]

Discrimination

In March the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards examined a general status report prepared by the Office on ILO action concerning discrimination in employment and occupation.[21] This provided in particular further information on ILO action to promote equality for women as follow-up on the Fourth World Conference on Women. The Governing Body also noted that the ACC had decided to set up a permanent committee, the Inter-Agency Committee on Women and Gender Equality, under the responsibility of the UN Special Adviser to the Secretary-General on Gender Issues, as a standing subsidiary mechanism of the ACC. The ILO has taken an active part in its work.[22] In November the Committee on Technical Cooperation reviewed strategies to enhance women's employment and income opportunities in the light of experience from technical cooperation.[23]

Multidisciplinary teams

In November the Committee on Legal Issues and International Labour Standards reviewed the activities of the multidisciplinary teams in relation to standards, noting in particular the increased attention given by the teams to the promotion of fundamental Conventions.[24]

Freedom of association

The Committee on Freedom of Association continued to receive a high number of complaints dealing with complex industrial relations and human rights issues.[25] In October 1996 two missions visited Colombia and Swaziland for direct contacts with the authorities to discuss the problems related to freedom of association. In March 1997 a request was addressed to the Government of Korea to examine the possibility of a high-level tripartite mission being undertaken to the country. The Governing Body is in contact with the Government of Nigeria in order to set a date for an ILO mission to be held as soon as possible.

Constitutional procedures

During the past year the Governing Body received a number of representations submitted by industrial associations under article 24 of the ILO Constitution. It established committees to deal with representations concerning Brazil, the Russian Federation, Uruguay and Venezuela, and referred two representations concerning Denmark to its Committee on Freedom of Association. It also adopted recommendations made by committees it had set up to examine other representations concerning Brazil, Congo, Costa Rica, Greece, Guatemala, Peru, Turkey, Uruguay and Venezuela.[26]

As regards the complaint concerning the non-observance by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), made by delegates to the 83rd Session (June 1996) of the Conference under article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO, in November the Governing Body requested the Government of Myanmar to communicate its observations on the complaint by 31 January 1997. In March the Governing Body examined the reply and referred the complaint to a Commission of Inquiry which it appointed in accordance with article 26 of the Constitution, deciding that the members of the Commission should be nominated in accordance with the same criteria, and would serve in the same conditions, as the members of previous such commissions.[27]

Reports of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

The Governing Body approved changes making the separate publication of Parts 1, 2 and 3 of Report III to the Conference unnecessary, deciding that the contents of Part 1 of Report III would be published in a simplified form as an appendix to the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations; Part 3 of Report III would be published as an appendix to the report of the Committee of Experts; and the Office would make available for consultation the texts of all reports received under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution, and would supply copies of these reports on request to members of delegations.[28] In March the Governing Body discussed information on international labour standards on the Internet, and in particular the arrangements for the publication of the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations on the Internet.[29]

ACTIVE PARTNERSHIP AND TECHNICAL COOPERATION

Through its Committee on Technical Cooperation, in November the Governing Body reviewed progress in the implementation of the Active Partnership Policy, ILO technical cooperation activities, and the ILO strategy for technical cooperation during the previous year.[30] The Office paper presented a review of ILO technical cooperation activities over the previous year, providing statistical data and analyses. The Governing Body noted the stabilization of the resource situation, and requested the Office to prepare proposals for an innovative strategy designed to enhance the resources available to the technical cooperation programme, which it will examine in the coming year.

Following up on its November discussion, in March the Governing Body decided on an internal evaluation of the Active Partnership Policy, for which purpose it decided to establish a tripartite working party, consisting of three Government, three Employer and three Worker members, in order to review the results. The working party will meet in June 1997, November 1997 and March 1998, and will conduct visits to four regions, each by three members of the Working Party.[31]

The Committee in November also reviewed strategies to enhance women's employment and income opportunities in the light of experience from technical cooperation on the basis of a paper[32] that examined the relative strengths and weaknesses of project strategies. Further developments concerning operational activities in the United Nations system, including principal measures taken by the ILO concerning General Assembly resolution 50/120, were the subject of a further paper.[33]

In March the Committee on Technical Cooperation reviewed its working arrangements and decided to meet at both major sessions of the Governing Body each year, with a standard agenda.[34]

In March the Governing Body included on the agenda of the 1999 session of the Conference a general discussion on the role of the ILO in technical cooperation.

MULTINATIONAL ENTERPRISES

In March the Governing Body discussed the sixth survey on the effect given to the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy and adopted a series of conclusions and recommendations.[35]

FINANCIAL QUESTIONS

In November the Governing Body approved amendments to the Financial Rules required to strengthen the decentralization process and to hold officials at headquarters and in the field accountable to the Treasurer and Financial Comptroller in respect of delegations of financial authority made to them.[36] It also approved amendments to the Staff Regulations and the Financial Rules so as to afford a greater measure of autonomy and independence to the Chief Internal Auditor.[37]

The Governing Body authorized the purchase of the premises of the ILO Liaison Office with the European Communities and the Benelux in Brussels and approved expenditure for the extension of the building of the ILO Regional Office for Africa in Abidjan. In March the Governing Body approved the installation of air-conditioning equipment for the premises in Islamabad, which are under construction.[38]

SECTORAL ACTIVITIES

In November the Governing Body selected 12 sectoral meetings for inclusion in the Programme and Budget proposals for 1998-99,[39] deciding in March on their composition and purpose.[40] It also evaluated practical experience with the new sectoral meetings format.[41] The Office paper reviewed participation in the meetings, their output, the role of the Officers of the meetings, experience with the new Standing Orders and panel discussions, and participants' comments. Conclusions were drawn on the desirable size of meetings and level of participation, and the structure of panel discussions, as well as on various other minor aspects.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

In November the Governing Body undertook an assessment of the reforms in the functioning of the International Labour Conference.[42] It decided that all the measures applied in 1996 be continued at the present session, on the understanding that various facilities also be introduced;[43] and that the responsibility for the approval of non-controversial changes in the composition of committees should be delegated to the Selection Committee.

In March the Governing Body decided to include items on the agenda of the 1999 session of the Conference for the revision of the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103) and Recommendation, 1952 (No. 95) in a double-discussion procedure, and a general discussion on the role of the ILO in technical cooperation.[44]

In March the Governing Body also discussed various proposals made by the Office concerning possible changes in the manner of selecting items for future sessions of the Conference. These covered consultation procedures and a possible portfolio approach.[45]

REGIONAL MEETINGS

Following the decision taken in 1995 that, as part of the Programme and Budget adjustments for 1996-97, the ILO would hold three-day regional meetings, with a single agenda item, instead of the originally planned regional conferences, in November the Governing Body adopted a set of draft Rules for Regional Meetings, and decided to give effect to them as from 1997 for the Regional Meeting to be held in Asia, on an experimental basis, before they are submitted to the International Labour Conference for confirmation. The proposed new Rules are designed to accommodate the arrangements for the Regional Meetings, which are intended to provide a platform for tripartite delegations to express their views on the ILO's regional activities.[46]

USE OF THE INTERNET

The ILO set up a site on the Internet in summer of 1996. Since the beginning of 1997 part of the site[47] has been devoted to the Governing Body. Documents are available on-line, as are standard reference texts related to its work. In March the Governing Body discussed the practical arrangements involved.[48]

OTHER MATTERS

In November, in approving the report of the Meeting of Experts on Workers' Privacy (Geneva, October 1996), the Governing Body authorized distribution of the Code of Practice on the Protection of Workers' Personal Data and the revised Office Commentary on the Code.[49]

In March the Governing Body reviewed its own functioning, deciding that in future all committees can meet twice a year, adopting a schedule for the systematic discussion of programme and budget issues and placing a fundamental policy issue, programme orientation or potential standard-setting topic on the agenda of each major session.

The International Labour Organization (ILO) is the competent body to set and deal with these standards, and we affirm our support for its work in promoting them. We believe that economic growth and development fostered by increased trade and further trade liberalization contribute to the promotion of these standards. We reject the use of labour standards for protectionist purposes, and agree that the comparative advantage of countries, particularly low-wage developing countries, must in no way be put into question. In this regard, we note that the WTO and ILO Secretariats will continue their existing collaboration."

[46] GB.267/9/1, Appendix I. The main changes proposed in the new Rules as compared with those for Regional Conferences are the following: (a) there is no provision for a Governing Body delegation; (b) composition of the meeting is simplified as far as the participation of official and non-governmental international organizations are concerned — they would now all need to be specifically invited by the Governing Body (Article 1, para. 6); non-governmental organizations would only be able to circulate statements (Article 9, para. 4); (c) the only Committee provided for is a Credentials Committee, and therefore resolutions could only be submitted on items relating to the agenda of the meeting. As there would be no Selection Committee, the Officers of the Meeting would arrange the programme of work of the meeting (Article 6, para. 5); (d) concerning credentials (Article 8), in view of the short duration of the Meetings, these would have to be submitted 30 days in advance of the opening so that a provisional list could be made available before the opening of the meeting. Objections would have to be submitted by 11 a.m. on the first day of the meeting. The Credentials Committee would have to submit a report promptly on each objection it received; (e) in view of the reduction in duration of the Meetings, the time-limit for speeches would be reduced and further restrictions made on the right to address the Meeting (Article 9); (f) decisions would, whenever practicable, be taken by consensus or, where this could not be achieved, by show of hands (Article 10, para. 3). There would be no provision for a record vote or secret ballot, although voting by such means would not be excluded (see the word "normally" in Article 10, para. 4).

Notes to Appendix : Contributions received and outstanding
Details of movements between 31 December 1996 and 31 May 1997

1 Amounts credited against 1997 assessed contributions represent the distribution of credits to eligible member States in respect of:

	Swiss francs
The incentive scheme for 1995	3 397 676
50 per cent of the net premium earned in 1994-95	1 528 629
Total credits	4 926 305

2 States which paid before 1 January 1997.

3 Includes amounts due for prior periods of membership in the ILO.

4 Member States which, at 31 May 1997, were subject to the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the Organization and have lost the right to vote. Arrangements had been approved for Paraguay at the 78th (1991) Session, and for both Sierra Leone and Togo at the 83rd (1996) Session of the International Labour Conference, but these member States have again lost the right to vote because they have not respected these arrangements.

5 Although Cambodia and Poland were subject to the provisions of paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the Organization they are permitted to vote under financial arrangements approved by the 83rd (1996) and 75th (1988) Sessions of the International Labour Conference respectively.

6 Provisional assessment pending approval by the International Labour Conference.

INSTRUMENT FOR THE AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Eighty-fifth Session on 3 June 1997, and

Having decided upon the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, a question which is included in the seventh item on the agenda of the Session; adopts, this nineteenth day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven, the following instrument for the amendment of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, which may be cited as the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation Instrument of Amendment, 1997:

Article 1

As from the date of the coming into force of this Instrument of Amendment, article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation shall be amended by the insertion after paragraph 8 of the following new paragraph:

> "9. Acting on a proposal of the Governing Body, the Conference may, by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present, abrogate any Convention adopted in accordance with the provisions of this article if it appears that the Convention has lost its purpose or that it no longer makes a useful contribution to attaining the objectives of the Organisation."

Article 2

Two copies of this Instrument of Amendment shall be authenticated by the signatures of the President of the Conference and of the Director-General of the International Labour Office. One of these copies shall be deposited in the archives of the International Labour Office and the other shall be communicated to the Secretary-General of the United Nations for registration in accordance with article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations. The Director-General will communicate a certified copy of the Instrument to all the Members of the International Labour Organisation.

Article 3

1. The formal ratifications or acceptances of this Instrument of Amendment shall be communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office, who shall notify the Members of the Organisation of the receipt thereof.

2. This Instrument of Amendment will come into force in accordance with the provisions of article 36 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

3. On the coming into force of this Instrument, the Director-General of the International Labour Office shall so notify all the Members of the International Labour Organisation and the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

INSTRUMENT POUR L'AMENDEMENT DE LA CONSTITUTION DE L'ORGANISATION INTERNATIONALE DU TRAVAIL

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,

Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 3 juin 1997, en sa quatre-vingt-cinquième session,

Après avoir décidé d'adopter une proposition d'amendement à la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, question qui fait l'objet du septième point à l'ordre du jour de la session, adopte, ce dix-neuvième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-dix-sept, l'instrument ci-après pour l'amendement à la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, instrument qui sera dénommé Instrument d'amendement à la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, 1997:

Article 1

A compter de la date d'entrée en vigueur du présent instrument d'amendement, l'article 19 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail sera amendé par l'insertion, après l'actuel paragraphe 8, d'un nouveau paragraphe rédigé comme suit:

> «9. Sur la proposition du Conseil d'administration, la Conférence peut, à la majorité des deux tiers des voix des délégués présents, abroger toute convention adoptée conformément aux dispositions du présent article s'il apparaît qu'elle a perdu son objet ou qu'elle n'apporte plus de contribution utile à l'accomplissement des objectifs de l'Organisation.»

Deux exemplaires authentiques du présent instrument d'amendement seront signés par le Président de la Conférence et par le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail. L'un de ces exemplaires sera déposé aux archives du Bureau international du Travail, et l'autre entre les mains du Secrétaire général des Nations Unies aux fins d'enregistrement conformément aux termes de l'article 102 de la Charte des Nations Unies. Le Directeur général communiquera une copie certifiée conforme de cet instrument à chacun des Membres de l'Organisation internationale du Travail.

Article 3

1. Les ratifications ou acceptations formelles du présent instrument d'amendement seront communiquées au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail qui en informera les Membres de l'Organisation.

2. Le présent instrument d'amendement entrera en vigueur dans les conditions prévues à l'article 36 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail.

3. Dès l'entrée en vigueur du présent instrument, le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail en informera tous les Membres de l'Organisation internationale du Travail ainsi que le Secrétaire général des Nations Unies.

Convention 181

CONVENTION CONCERNING PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Eighty-fifth Session on 3 June 1997, and

Noting the provisions of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, and

Being aware of the importance of flexibility in the functioning of labour markets, and

Recalling that the International Labour Conference at its 81st Session, 1994, held the view that the ILO should proceed to revise the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, and

Considering the very different environment in which private employment agencies operate, when compared to the conditions prevailing when the above-mentioned Convention was adopted, and

Recognizing the role which private employment agencies may play in a well-functioning labour market, and

Recalling the need to protect workers against abuses, and

Recognizing the need to guarantee the right to freedom of association and to promote collective bargaining and social dialogue as necessary components of a well-functioning industrial relations system, and

Noting the provisions of the Employment Service Convention, 1948, and

Recalling the provisions of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, the Freedom of Association and the Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949, the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, the Employment Policy Convention, 1964, the Minimum Age Convention, 1973, the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988, and the provisions relating to recruitment and placement in the Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949, and the Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of an international Convention;

adopts, this nineteenth day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven, the following Convention, which may be cited as the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997:

Article 1

1. For the purpose of this Convention the term "private employment agency" means any natural or legal person, independent of the public authorities, which provides one or more of the following labour market services:

(a) services for matching offers of and applications for employment, without the private employment agency becoming a party to the employment relationships which may arise therefrom;

(b) services consisting of employing workers with a view to making them available to a third party, who may be a natural or legal person (referred to below as a "user enterprise") which assigns their tasks and supervises the execution of these tasks;

(c) other services relating to jobseeking, determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, such as the provision of information, that do not set out to match specific offers of and applications for employment.

CONVENTION CONCERNANT LES AGENCES D'EMPLOI PRIVÉES

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,

Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 3 juin 1997, en sa quatre-vingt-cinquième session;

Notant les dispositions de la convention sur les bureaux de placement payants (révisée), 1949;

Consciente de l'importance de la flexibilité dans le fonctionnement des marchés du travail;

Rappelant que la Conférence internationale du Travail lors de sa 81e session, 1994, a estimé que l'Organisation internationale du Travail devait procéder à la révision de la convention sur les bureaux de placement payants (révisée), 1949;

Considérant le contexte très différent dans lequel les agences d'emploi privées opèrent, par rapport aux conditions qui prévalaient lors de l'adoption de la convention susmentionnée;

Reconnaissant le rôle que les agences d'emploi privées peuvent jouer dans le bon fonctionnement du marché du travail;

Rappelant la nécessité de protéger les travailleurs contre les abus;

Reconnaissant la nécessité de garantir la liberté syndicale et de promouvoir la négociation collective et le dialogue social, en tant qu'éléments indispensables des bonnes relations professionnelles;

Notant les dispositions de la convention sur le service de l'emploi, 1948;

Rappelant les dispositions de la convention sur le travail forcé, 1930, de la convention sur la liberté syndicale et la protection du droit syndical, 1948, de la convention sur le droit d'organisation et de négociation collective, 1949, de la convention concernant la discrimination (emploi et profession), 1958, de la convention sur la politique de l'emploi, 1964, de la convention sur l'âge minimum, 1973, de la convention sur la promotion de l'emploi et la protection contre le chômage, 1988, ainsi que les dispositions relatives au recrutement et au placement de la convention sur les travailleurs migrants (révisée), 1949, et celles de la convention sur les travailleurs migrants (dispositions complémentaires), 1975;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives à la révision de la convention sur les bureaux de placement payants (révisée), 1949, question qui constitue le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une convention internationale, adopte, ce dix-neuvième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-dix-sept, la convention ci-après, qui sera dénommée Convention sur les agences d'emploi privées, 1997:

Article 1

1. Aux fins de la présente convention, l'expression «agence d'emploi privée» désigne toute personne physique ou morale, indépendante des autorités publiques, qui fournit un ou plusieurs des services suivants se rapportant au marché du travail:

a) des services visant à rapprocher offres et demandes d'emploi, sans que l'agence d'emploi privée ne devienne partie aux relations de travail susceptibles d'en découler;

b) des services consistant à employer des travailleurs dans le but de les mettre à la disposition d'une tierce personne physique ou morale (ci-après désignée comme «l'entreprise utilisatrice»), qui fixe leurs tâches et en supervise l'exécution;

c) d'autres services ayant trait à la recherche d'emplois, qui seront déterminés par l'autorité compétente après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives, tels que la fourniture d'informations, sans pour autant viser à rapprocher une offre et une demande spécifiques.

2. For the purpose of this Convention, the term "workers" includes jobseekers.

3. For the purpose of this Convention, the term "processing of personal data of workers" means the collection, storage, combination, communication or any other use of information related to an identified or identifiable worker.

Article 2

1. This Convention applies to all private employment agencies.

2. This Convention applies to all categories of workers and all branches of economic activity. It does not apply to the recruitment and placement of seafarers.

3. One purpose of this Convention is to allow the operation of private employment agencies as well as the protection of the workers using their services, within the framework of its provisions.

4. After consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, a Member may:

(a) prohibit, under specific circumstances, private employment agencies from operating in respect of certain categories of workers or branches of economic activity in the provision of one or more of the services referred to in Article 1, paragraph 1;

(b) exclude, under specific circumstances, workers in certain branches of economic activity, or parts thereof, from the scope of the Convention or from certain of its provisions, provided that adequate protection is otherwise assured for the workers concerned.

5. A Member which ratifies this Convention shall specify, in its reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, any prohibition or exclusion of which it avails itself under paragraph 4 above, and give the reasons therefor.

Article 3

1. The legal status of private employment agencies shall be determined in accordance with national law and practice, and after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers.

2. A Member shall determine the conditions governing the operation of private employment agencies in accordance with a system of licensing or certification, except where they are otherwise regulated or determined by appropriate national law and practice.

Article 4

Measures shall be taken to ensure that the workers recruited by private employment agencies providing the services referred to in Article 1 are not denied the right to freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively.

Article 5

1. In order to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in access to employment and to particular occupations, a Member shall ensure that private employment agencies treat workers without discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction, social origin, or any other form of discrimination covered by national law and practice, such as age or disability.

2. Paragraph 1 of this Article shall not be implemented in such a way as to prevent private employment agencies from providing special services or targeted programmes designed to assist the most disadvantaged workers in their jobseeking activities.

2. Aux fins de la présente convention, l'expression «travailleurs» comprend les demandeurs d'emploi.

3. Aux fins de la présente convention, l'expression «traitement des données personnelles concernant les travailleurs» désigne la collecte, le stockage, la combinaison et la communication des données personnelles ou tout autre usage qui pourrait être fait de toute information concernant un travailleur identifié ou identifiable.

Article 2

1. La présente convention s'applique à toutes les agences d'emploi privées.

2. La présente convention s'applique à toutes les catégories de travailleurs et à toutes les branches d'activité économique. Elle ne s'applique pas au recrutement et au placement des gens de mer.

3. La présente convention a, au nombre de ses objectifs, celui de permettre aux agences d'emploi privées d'opérer et celui de protéger, dans le cadre de ses dispositions, les travailleurs ayant recours à leurs services.

4. Après avoir consulté les organisations les plus représentatives d'employeurs et de travailleurs intéressées, un Membre peut:

a) interdire, dans des circonstances particulières, aux agences d'emploi privées d'opérer à l'égard de certaines catégories de travailleurs ou dans certaines branches d'activité économique pour fournir un ou plusieurs des services visés à l'article 1, paragraphe 1;

b) exclure, dans des circonstances particulières, les travailleurs de certaines branches d'activité économique, ou de parties de celles-ci, du champ d'application de la convention, ou de certaines de ses dispositions, pour autant que les travailleurs intéressés jouissent à un autre titre d'une protection adéquate.

5. Tout Membre qui ratifie la convention doit indiquer dans ses rapports, en vertu de l'article 22 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, les interdictions ou exclusions éventuelles dont il se prévaut en vertu du paragraphe 4 ci-dessus et en donner les raisons.

Article 3

1. Le statut juridique des agences d'emploi privées sera déterminé conformément à la législation et la pratique nationales et après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives.

2. Tout Membre doit, par le moyen d'un système d'attribution de licence ou d'agrément, déterminer les conditions d'exercice par les agences d'emploi privées de leurs activités, sauf lorsque lesdites conditions sont réglées, d'une autre manière, par la législation et la pratique nationales.

Article 4

Des mesures doivent être prises afin de veiller à ce que les travailleurs recrutés par les agences d'emploi privées fournissant les services mentionnés à l'article 1 ne soient pas privés de leur droit à la liberté syndicale et à la négociation collective.

Article 5

1. Afin de promouvoir l'égalité de chances et de traitement en matière d'accès à l'emploi et aux différentes professions, tout Membre doit veiller à ce que les agences d'emploi privées ne fassent pas subir aux travailleurs de discrimination fondée sur la race, la couleur, le sexe, la religion, l'opinion politique, l'ascendance nationale, l'origine sociale, ou toute autre forme de discrimination visée par la législation et la pratique nationales, telle que l'âge ou le handicap.

2. Rien dans la mise en œuvre du paragraphe 1 ci-dessus n'est censé empêcher les agences d'emploi privées de fournir des services spécifiques ou de réaliser des programmes spécialement conçus pour aider les travailleurs les plus défavorisés dans leurs activités de recherche d'emploi.

Article 6

The processing of personal data of workers by private employment agencies shall be:

(a) done in a manner that protects this data and ensures respect for workers' privacy in accordance with national law and practice;

(b) limited to matters related to the qualifications and professional experience of the workers concerned and any other directly relevant information.

Article 7

1. Private employment agencies shall not charge directly or indirectly, in whole or in part, any fees or costs to workers.

2. In the interest of the workers concerned, and after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, the competent authority may authorize exceptions to the provisions of paragraph 1 above in respect of certain categories of workers, as well as specified types of services provided by private employment agencies.

3. A Member which has authorized exceptions under paragraph 2 above shall, in its reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, provide information on such exceptions and give the reasons therefor.

Article 8

1. A Member shall, after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, adopt all necessary and appropriate measures, both within its jurisdiction and, where appropriate, in collaboration with other Members, to provide adequate protection for and prevent abuses of migrant workers recruited or placed in its territory by private employment agencies. These shall include laws or regulations which provide for penalties, including prohibition of those private employment agencies which engage in fraudulent practices and abuses.

2. Where workers are recruited in one country for work in another, the Members concerned shall consider concluding bilateral agreements to prevent abuses and fraudulent practices in recruitment, placement and employment.

Article 9

A Member shall take measures to ensure that child labour is not used or supplied by private employment agencies.

Article 10

The competent authority shall ensure that adequate machinery and procedures, involving as appropriate the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, exist for the investigation of complaints, alleged abuses and fraudulent practices concerning the activities of private employment agencies.

Article 11

A Member shall, in accordance with national law and practice, take the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection for the workers employed by private employment agencies as described in Article 1, paragraph 1(b) above, in relation to:

(a) freedom of association;
(b) collective bargaining;
(c) minimum wages;
(d) working time and other working conditions;
(e) statutory social security benefits;

Article 6

Le traitement des données personnelles concernant les travailleurs par les agences d'emploi privées doit:

a) être effectué dans des conditions qui protègent lesdites données et respectent la vie privée des travailleurs, conformément à la législation et à la pratique nationales;

b) être limité aux questions portant sur les qualifications et l'expérience professionnelle des travailleurs concernés et à toute autre information directement pertinente.

Article 7

1. Les agences d'emploi privées ne doivent mettre à la charge des travailleurs, de manière directe ou indirecte, en totalité ou en partie, ni honoraires ni autres frais.

2. Dans l'intérêt des travailleurs concernés, l'autorité compétente peut, après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives, autoriser des dérogations aux dispositions du paragraphe 1 ci-dessus pour certaines catégories de travailleurs et pour des services spécifiquement identifiés, fournis par les agences d'emploi privées.

3. Tout Membre qui aura autorisé des dérogations en vertu du paragraphe 2 ci-dessus devra, dans ses rapports au titre de l'article 22 de la Constitution de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, fournir des informations sur ces dérogations et en donner les raisons.

Article 8

1. Tout Membre doit, après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives, prendre toutes les mesures nécessaires et appropriées, dans les limites de sa juridiction et, le cas échéant, en collaboration avec d'autres Membres, pour faire en sorte que les travailleurs migrants recrutés ou placés sur son territoire par des agences d'emploi privées bénéficient d'une protection adéquate, et pour empêcher que des abus ne soient commis à leur encontre. Ces mesures doivent comprendre des lois ou règlements prévoyant des sanctions, y compris l'interdiction des agences d'emploi privées qui se livrent à des abus et des pratiques frauduleuses.

2. Lorsque des travailleurs sont recrutés dans un pays pour travailler dans un autre, les Membres intéressés doivent envisager de conclure des accords bilatéraux pour prévenir les abus et les pratiques frauduleuses en matière de recrutement, de placement et d'emploi.

Article 9

Tout Membre doit prendre des mesures pour s'assurer que le travail des enfants ne soit ni utilisé ni fourni par des agences d'emploi privées.

Article 10

L'autorité compétente doit veiller à ce qu'il existe des mécanismes et des procédures appropriés associant, le cas échéant, les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives, aux fins d'instruire les plaintes et d'examiner les allégations d'abus et de pratiques frauduleuses, concernant les activités des agences d'emploi privées.

Article 11

Tout Membre doit prendre les mesures nécessaires, conformément à la législation et la pratique nationales, pour garantir une protection adéquate aux travailleurs employés par les agences d'emploi privées, visées au paragraphe 1 b) de l'article 1 en matière de:

a) liberté syndicale;

b) négociation collective;

c) salaires minima;

d) horaires, durée du travail et autres conditions de travail;

e) prestations légales de sécurité sociale;

(f) access to training;
(g) occupational safety and health;
(h) compensation in case of occupational accidents or diseases;
(i) compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims;
(j) maternity protection and benefits, and parental protection and benefits.

Article 12

A Member shall determine and allocate, in accordance with national law and practice, the respective responsibilities of private employment agencies providing the services referred to in paragraph 1(b) of Article 1 and of user enterprises in relation to:

(a) collective bargaining;
(b) minimum wages;
(c) working time and other working conditions;
(d) statutory social security benefits;
(e) access to training;
(f) protection in the field of occupational safety and health;
(g) compensation in case of occupational accidents or diseases;
(h) compensation in case of insolvency and protection of workers' claims;
(i) maternity protection and benefits, and parental protection and benefits.

Article 13

1. A Member shall, in accordance with national law and practice and after consulting the most representative organizations of employers and workers, formulate, establish and periodically review conditions to promote cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies.

2. The conditions referred to in paragraph 1 above shall be based on the principle that the public authorities retain final authority for:

(a) formulating labour market policy;
(b) utilizing or controlling the use of public funds earmarked for the implementation of that policy.

3. Private employment agencies shall, at intervals to be determined by the competent authority, provide to that authority the information required by it, with due regard to the confidential nature of such information:

(a) to allow the competent authority to be aware of the structure and activities of private employment agencies in accordance with national conditions and practices;
(b) for statistical purposes.

4. The competent authority shall compile and, at regular intervals, make this information publicly available.

Article 14

1. The provisions of this Convention shall be applied by means of laws or regulations or by any other means consistent with national practice, such as court decisions, arbitration awards or collective agreements.

2. Supervision of the implementation of provisions to give effect to this Convention shall be ensured by the labour inspection service or other competent public authorities.

3. Adequate remedies, including penalties where appropriate, shall be provided for and effectively applied in case of violations of this Convention.

f) accès à la formation;
g) sécurité et santé au travail;
h) réparation en cas d'accident du travail ou de maladie professionnelle;
i) indemnisation en cas d'insolvabilité et protection des créances des travailleurs;
j) protection et prestations de maternité, protection et prestations parentales.

Article 12

Tout Membre doit déterminer et répartir, conformément à la législation et la pratique nationales, les responsabilités respectives des agences d'emploi privées fournissant les services visés au paragraphe 1 b) de l'article 1 et des entreprises utilisatrices en matière de:

a) négociation collective;
b) salaires minima;
c) horaires, durée du travail et autres conditions de travail;
d) prestations légales de sécurité sociale;
e) accès à la formation;
f) protection dans le domaine de la sécurité et de la santé au travail;
g) réparation en cas d'accident du travail ou de maladie professionnelle;
h) indemnisation en cas d'insolvabilité et protection des créances des travailleurs;
i) protection et prestations de maternité, protection et prestations parentales.

Article 13

1. Tout Membre doit, conformément à la législation et à la pratique nationales et après consultation des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives, définir, établir et revoir régulièrement les conditions propres à promouvoir la coopération entre le service public de l'emploi et les agences d'emploi privées.

2. Les conditions mentionnées au paragraphe 1 ci-dessus doivent procéder du principe que les autorités publiques conservent la compétence pour décider en dernier ressort de:

a) la formulation d'une politique du marché du travail;
b) l'utilisation et du contrôle de l'utilisation des fonds publics destinés à la mise en œuvre de cette politique.

3. Les agences d'emploi privées doivent, à des intervalles déterminés par les autorités compétentes, fournir à celles-ci telles informations qu'elles pourront demander, en tenant dûment compte de leur caractère confidentiel:

a) afin de permettre aux autorités compétentes de connaître la structure et les activités des agences d'emploi privées, conformément aux conditions et aux pratiques nationales;
b) à des fins statistiques.

4. L'autorité compétente doit compiler et, à intervalles réguliers, mettre ces informations à la disposition du public.

Article 14

1. Les dispositions de la présente convention doivent être appliquées par voie de législation ou par tous autres moyens conformes à la pratique nationale, tels que décisions de justice, sentences arbitrales ou conventions collectives.

2. Le contrôle de l'application des dispositions visant à donner effet à la présente convention sera assuré par l'inspection du travail ou d'autres autorités publiques compétentes.

3. Des mesures correctives appropriées, y compris des sanctions s'il y a lieu, doivent être prévues en cas d'infraction aux dispositions de cette convention et être effectivement appliquées.

Article 15

This Convention does not affect more favourable provisions applicable under other international labour Conventions to workers recruited, placed or employed by private employment agencies.

Article 16

This Convention revises the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, and the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention, 1933.

Article 17

The formal ratifications of this Convention shall be communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration.

Article 18

1. This Convention shall be binding only upon those Members of the International Labour Organization whose ratifications have been registered with the Director-General of the International Labour Office.

2. It shall come into force 12 months after the date on which the ratifications of two Members have been registered with the Director-General.

3. Thereafter, this Convention shall come into force for any Member 12 months after the date on which its ratification has been registered.

Article 19

1. A Member which has ratified this Convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the Convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered.

2. Each Member which has ratified this Convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of ten years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of denunciation provided for in this Article will be bound for another period of ten years and, thereafter, may denounce this Convention at the expiration of each period of ten years under the terms provided for in this Article.

Article 20

1. The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall notify all Members of the International Labour Organization of the registration of all ratifications and acts of denunciation communicated by the Members of the Organization.

2. When notifying the Members of the Organization of the registration of the second ratification, the Director-General shall draw the attention of the Members of the Organization to the date upon which the Convention shall come into force.

Article 21

The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall communicate to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, for registration in accordance with article 102 of the Charter of the United Nations, full particulars of all ratifications and acts of denunciation registered by the Director-General in accordance with the provisions of the preceding Articles.

Article 22

At such times as it may consider necessary, the Governing Body of the International Labour Office shall present to the General Conference a report on the working of this Convention and shall examine the desirability of placing on the agenda of the Conference the question of its revision in whole or in part.

Article 15

La présente convention n'affecte pas les dispositions plus favorables applicables en vertu d'autres conventions internationales du travail aux travailleurs recrutés, placés ou employés par les agences d'emploi privées.

Article 16

La présente convention révise la convention sur les bureaux de placement payants (révisée), 1949, et la convention sur les bureaux de placement payants, 1933.

Article 17

Les ratifications formelles de la présente convention seront communiquées au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail et par lui enregistrées.

Article 18

1. La présente convention ne liera que les Membres de l'Organisation internationale du Travail dont la ratification aura été enregistrée par le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail.

2. Elle entrera en vigueur douze mois après que les ratifications de deux Membres auront été enregistrées par le Directeur général.

3. Par la suite, cette convention entrera en vigueur pour chaque Membre douze mois après la date où sa ratification aura été enregistrée.

Article 19

1. Tout Membre ayant ratifié la présente convention peut la dénoncer à l'expiration d'une période de dix années après la date de la mise en vigueur initiale de la convention, par un acte communiqué au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail et par lui enregistré. La dénonciation ne prendra effet qu'une année après avoir été enregistrée.

2. Tout Membre ayant ratifié la présente convention qui, dans le délai d'une année après l'expiration de la période de dix années mentionnée au paragraphe précédent, ne fera pas usage de la faculté de dénonciation prévue par le présent article sera lié pour une nouvelle période de dix années et, par la suite, pourra dénoncer la présente convention à l'expiration de chaque période de dix années dans les conditions prévues au présent article.

1. Le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail notifiera à tous les Membres de l'Organisation internationale du Travail l'enregistrement de toutes les ratifications et de tous actes de dénonciation qui lui seront communiqués par les Membres de l'Organisation.

2. En notifiant aux Membres de l'Organisation l'enregistrement de la deuxième ratification qui lui aura été communiquée, le Directeur général appellera l'attention des Membres de l'Organisation sur la date à laquelle la présente convention entrera en vigueur.

Article 21

Le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail communiquera au Secrétaire général des Nations Unies, aux fins d'enregistrement, conformément à l'article 102 de la Charte des Nations Unies, des renseignements complets au sujet de toutes ratifications et de tous actes de dénonciation qu'il aura enregistrés conformément aux articles précédents.

Article 22

Chaque fois qu'il le jugera nécessaire, le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail présentera à la Conférence générale un rapport sur l'application de la présente convention et examinera s'il y a lieu d'inscrire à l'ordre du jour de la Conférence la question de sa révision totale ou partielle.

Article 23

1. Should the Conference adopt a new Convention revising this Convention in whole or in part, then, unless the new Convention otherwise provides –

(a) the ratification by a Member of the new revising Convention shall ipso jure involve the immediate denunciation of this Convention, notwithstanding the provisions of Article 19 above, if and when the new revising Convention shall have come into force;
(b) as from the date when the new revising Convention comes into force, this Convention shall cease to be open to ratification by the Members.

2. This Convention shall in any case remain in force in its actual form and content for those Members which have ratified it but have not ratified the revising Convention.

Article 24

The English and French versions of the text of this Convention are equally authoritative.

Article 23

1. Au cas où la Conférence adopterait une nouvelle convention portant révision totale ou partielle de la présente convention, et à moins que la nouvelle convention ne dispose autrement:

a) la ratification par un Membre de la nouvelle convention portant révision entraînerait de plein droit, nonobstant l'article 19 ci-dessus, dénonciation immédiate de la présente convention, sous réserve que la nouvelle convention portant révision soit entrée en vigueur;

b) à partir de la date de l'entrée en vigueur de la nouvelle convention portant révision, la présente convention cesserait d'être ouverte à la ratification des Membres.

2. La présente convention demeurerait en tout cas en vigueur dans sa forme et teneur pour les Membres qui l'auraient ratifiée et qui ne ratifieraient pas la convention portant révision.

Les versions française et anglaise du texte de la présente convention font également foi.

Recommendation 188

RECOMMENDATION CONCERNING PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Eighty-fifth Session on 3 June 1997, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the revision of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949, which is the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation supplementing the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997;

adopts, this nineteenth day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and ninety-seven, the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Private Employment Agencies Recommendation, 1997:

I. GENERAL PROVISIONS

1. The provisions of this Recommendation supplement those of the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997, (referred to as "the Convention") and should be applied in conjunction with them.

2. (1) Tripartite bodies or organizations of employers and workers should be involved as far as possible in the formulation and implementation of provisions to give effect to the Convention.

(2) Where appropriate, national laws and regulations applicable to private employment agencies should be supplemented by technical standards, guidelines, codes of ethics, self-regulatory mechanisms or other means consistent with national practice.

3. Members should, as may be appropriate and practicable, exchange information and experiences on the contributions of private employment agencies to the functioning of the labour market and communicate this to the International Labour Office.

II. PROTECTION OF WORKERS

4. Members should adopt all necessary and appropriate measures to prevent and to eliminate unethical practices by private employment agencies. These measures may include laws or regulations which provide for penalties, including prohibition of private employment agencies engaging in unethical practices.

5. Workers employed by private employment agencies as defined in Article 1.1(b) of the Convention should, where appropriate, have a written contract of employment specifying their terms and conditions of employment. As a minimum requirement, these workers should be informed of their conditions of employment before the effective beginning of their assignment.

6. Private employment agencies should not make workers available to a user enterprise to replace workers of that enterprise who are on strike.

7. The competent authority should combat unfair advertising practices and misleading advertisements, including advertisements for non-existent jobs.

8. Private employment agencies should:

(a) not knowingly recruit, place or employ workers for jobs involving unacceptable hazards or risks or where they may be subjected to abuse or discriminatory treatment of any kind;

RECOMMANDATION CONCERNANT LES AGENCES D'EMPLOI PRIVÉES

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,

Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 3 juin 1997, en sa quatre-vingt-cinquième session;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives à la révision de la convention sur les bureaux de placement payants (révisée), 1949, question qui constitue le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une recommandation complétant la convention sur les agences d'emploi privées, 1997, adopte, ce dix-neuvième jour de juin mil neuf cent quatre-vingt-dix-sept, la recommandation ci-après, qui sera dénommée Recommandation sur les agences d'emploi privées, 1997:

I. Dispositions générales

1. Les dispositions de la présente recommandation complètent celles de la convention sur les agences d'emploi privées, 1997 (ci-après dénommée «la convention») et devraient s'appliquer conjointement avec celles-ci.

2. (1) Des organes tripartites ou des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs devraient être associés, autant que possible, lors de l'élaboration et de l'application des dispositions visant à donner effet à la convention.

(2) Le cas échéant, la législation nationale applicable aux agences d'emploi privées devrait être complétée par des normes techniques, des directives, des codes de déontologie, des procédures d'autodiscipline ou d'autres moyens conformes à la pratique nationale.

3. Les Etats Membres devraient, lorsque cela est approprié et praticable, échanger les informations et partager l'expérience acquise au sujet des contributions des agences d'emploi privées au fonctionnement du marché du travail et en faire part au Bureau international du Travail.

II. Protection des travailleurs

4. Les Membres devraient adopter les mesures nécessaires et appropriées pour prévenir et pour éliminer les pratiques non conformes à la déontologie de la part des agences d'emploi privées. Ces mesures peuvent comprendre l'adoption de lois ou réglementations prévoyant des sanctions, y compris l'interdiction des agences d'emploi privées se livrant à des pratiques non conformes à la déontologie.

5. Les travailleurs employés par les agences d'emploi privées visées au paragraphe 1 b) de l'article 1 de la convention devraient, le cas échéant, avoir un contrat de travail écrit précisant leurs conditions d'emploi. Au minimum, ces travailleurs devraient être informés de leurs conditions d'emploi avant le début effectif de leur mission.

6. Les agences d'emploi privées ne devraient pas mettre à la disposition d'une entreprise utilisatrice des travailleurs aux fins de remplacer ceux de cette entreprise qui sont en grève.

7. L'autorité compétente devrait réprimer les pratiques déloyales en matière d'annonces ainsi que les annonces mensongères, y compris celles qui offrent des emplois inexistants.

8. Les agences d'emploi privées:

a) ne devraient pas sciemment recruter, placer ou employer des travailleurs à des emplois qui comportent des dangers et des risques inacceptables ou lorsqu'ils peuvent être victimes d'abus ou de traitements discriminatoires de toute sorte;

(b) inform migrant workers, as far as possible in their own language or in a language with which they are familiar, of the nature of the position offered and the applicable terms and conditions of employment.

9. Private employment agencies should be prohibited, or by other means prevented, from drawing up and publishing vacancy notices or offers of employment in ways that directly or indirectly result in discrimination on grounds such as race, colour, sex, age, religion, political opinion, national extraction, social origin, ethnic origin, disability, marital or family status, sexual orientation or membership of a workers' organization.

10. Private employment agencies should be encouraged to promote equality in employment through affirmative action programmes.

11. Private employment agencies should be prohibited from recording, in files or registers, personal data which are not required for judging the aptitude of applicants for jobs for which they are being or could be considered.

12. (1) Private employment agencies should store the personal data of a worker only for so long as it is justified by the specific purposes for which they have been collected, or so long as the worker wishes to remain on a list of potential job candidates.

(2) Measures should be taken to ensure that workers have access to all their personal data as processed by automated or electronic systems, or kept in a manual file. These measures should include the right of workers to obtain and examine a copy of any such data and the right to demand that incorrect or incomplete data be deleted or corrected.

(3) Unless directly relevant to the requirements of a particular occupation and with the express permission of the worker concerned, private employment agencies should not require, maintain or use information on the medical status of a worker, or use such information to determine the suitability of a worker for employment.

13. Private employment agencies and the competent authority should take measures to promote the utilization of proper, fair and efficient selection methods.

14. Private employment agencies should have properly qualified and trained staff.

15. Having due regard to the rights and duties laid down in national law concerning termination of contracts of employment, private employment agencies providing the services referred to in paragraph 1(b) of Article 1 of the Convention should not:

(a) prevent the user enterprise from hiring an employee of the agency assigned to it;
(b) restrict the occupational mobility of an employee;
(c) impose penalties on an employee accepting employment in another enterprise.

III. RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT SERVICE AND PRIVATE EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

16. Cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies in relation to the implementation of a national policy on organizing the labour market should be encouraged; for this purpose, bodies may be established that include representatives of the public employment service and private employment agencies, as well as of the most representative organizations of employers and workers.

17. Measures to promote cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies could include:

b) devraient informer les travailleurs migrants, autant que possible dans leur propre langue ou dans une langue qui leur soit familière, de la nature de l'emploi offert et des conditions d'emploi qui sont applicables.

9. Les agences d'emploi privées devraient se voir interdire, ou empêcher par d'autres moyens, de formuler ou de publier des annonces de vacances de postes ou des offres d'emploi qui auraient pour résultat, direct ou indirect, une discrimination fondée sur des motifs tels que la race, la couleur, le sexe, l'âge, la religion, l'opinion politique, l'ascendance nationale, l'origine sociale, l'origine ethnique, le handicap, le statut matrimonial ou familial, la préférence sexuelle ou l'appartenance à une organisation de travailleurs.

10. Les agences d'emploi privées devraient être encouragées à promouvoir l'égalité dans l'emploi par le moyen de programmes d'action positive.

11. Interdiction devrait être faite aux agences d'emploi privées de consigner, dans des fichiers ou des registres, des données personnelles qui ne soient pas nécessaires à l'évaluation de l'aptitude des candidats pour les emplois pour lesquels ils sont ou pourraient être considérés.

12. (1) Les agences d'emploi privées ne devraient pas conserver les données personnelles d'un travailleur plus longtemps qu'il n'est justifié par le but précis de leur collecte, ou au-delà de la période durant laquelle le travailleur souhaite figurer sur une liste de candidats.

(2) Des mesures devraient être prises pour garantir que les travailleurs puissent consulter toutes les données personnelles les concernant, qu'elles soient traitées automatiquement, par voie informatique ou manuellement. Ces mesures devraient comprendre le droit, pour le travailleur, d'obtenir et d'examiner une copie de toutes ces données, ainsi que celui d'exiger que les données incorrectes ou incomplètes soient supprimées ou rectifiées.

(3) A moins que ces données ne soient directement liées aux conditions requises par l'exercice d'une profession donnée et que le travailleur intéressé ne l'autorise expressément, les agences d'emploi privées ne devraient pas demander, conserver ou utiliser des informations sur l'état de santé d'un travailleur, ou utiliser ces informations pour décider de son aptitude à l'emploi.

13. Les agences d'emploi privées et l'autorité compétente devraient prendre des mesures pour promouvoir le recours à des méthodes de sélection appropriées, équitables et efficaces.

14. Les agences d'emploi privées devraient disposer d'un personnel suffisamment qualifié et formé.

15. En tenant dûment compte des droits et obligations prévus par la législation nationale, en ce qui concerne la cessation des contrats de travail, les agences d'emploi privées fournissant les services visés au paragraphe 1 b) de l'article 1 de la convention ne devraient pas:

a) empêcher l'entreprise utilisatrice de recruter le salarié mis à sa disposition;
b) limiter la mobilité professionnelle du salarié;
c) infliger des sanctions à un salarié qui accepte de travailler pour une autre entreprise.

III. RELATIONS ENTRE LE SERVICE PUBLIC DE L'EMPLOI ET LES AGENCES D'EMPLOI PRIVÉES

16. La coopération entre le service public de l'emploi et les agences d'emploi privées en vue de la mise en œuvre d'une politique nationale sur l'organisation du marché du travail devrait être encouragée; à cet effet, des organes comprenant des représentants du service public de l'emploi et des agences d'emploi privées ainsi que des organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs les plus représentatives pourraient être mis en place.

17. Les mesures tendant à établir une coopération entre le service public de l'emploi et les agences d'emploi privées pourraient inclure:

(a) pooling of information and use of common terminology so as to improve transparency of labour market functioning;
(b) exchanging vacancy notices;
(c) launching of joint projects, for example in training;
(d) concluding agreements between the public employment service and private employment agencies regarding the execution of certain activities, such as projects for the integration of the long-term unemployed;
(e) training of staff;
(f) consulting regularly with a view to improving professional practices.

a) la mise en commun d'informations et l'utilisation d'une terminologie commune pour améliorer la transparence du fonctionnement du marché du travail;

b) des échanges d'avis de vacances de poste;

c) le lancement de projets communs, par exemple dans le domaine de la formation;

d) la conclusion de conventions entre le service public de l'emploi et les agences d'emploi privées, relatives à l'exécution de certaines activités telles que des projets pour l'insertion des chômeurs de longue durée;

e) la formation du personnel;

f) des consultations régulières visant à améliorer les pratiques professionnelles.

Resolutions adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 85th Session

(Geneva, June 1997)

I

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises" [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fifth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of governments, proposals for a Recommendation concerning "General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises";

Decides that an item entitled "General conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion regarding the proposed adoption of a Recommendation concerning general conditions to stimulate job creation in small and medium-sized enterprises.

II

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Contract labour" [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the sixth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of Governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning contract labour;

Decides that an item entitled "Contract labour" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion regarding the proposed adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning contract labour.

III

Resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Cape Verde [2]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having regard to paragraph 7 of article 10 of the Financial Regulations,

Accepts the arrangement proposed by the Government of Cape Verde for the settlement of its arrears of contributions due for the period 1993-96 to the effect that:

(a) in 1997, the Government of Cape Verde will pay in full its contribution for the year 1997;

(b) in subsequent years, the Government of Cape Verde will continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;

---

[1] Adopted on 18 June 1997.

[2] Adopted on 17 June 1997.

(c) the Government of Cape Verde will settle arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1996, amounting in total to 130,790 Swiss francs, by the payment of 20 annual instalments beginning in 1998, made up of 19 equal instalments of 6,539 Swiss francs and a final instalment of 6,549 Swiss francs;

Decides that Cape Verde shall be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business.

IV

Resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of the Dominican Republic [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having regard to paragraph 7 of article 10 of the Financial Regulations,

Accepts the arrangement proposed by the Government of the Dominican Republic for the settlement of its arrears of contributions due for the periods 1970-76 and 1985-96 to the effect that:

(a) in 1997, the Government of the Dominican Republic will pay in full its contribution for the year 1997;

(b) in subsequent years, the Government of the Dominican Republic will continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;

(c) the Government of the Dominican Republic will settle arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1996, amounting in total to 1,153,755 Swiss francs, by an immediate payment of 280,515 Swiss francs and by payment of five equal annual instalments of 145,000 Swiss francs and a final instalment of 148,240 Swiss francs, beginning in 1998;

Decides that the Dominican Republic shall be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business.

V

Resolution concerning the arrears of contributions of Djibouti [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Having regard to paragraph 7 of article 10 of the Financial Regulations,

Accepts the arrangement proposed by the Government of Djibouti for the settlement of its arrears of contributions due for the period 1990-96 to the effect that:

(a) in 1997, the Government of Djibouti will pay in full its contribution for the year 1997;

(b) in subsequent years, the Government of Djibouti will continue to pay its current contribution in full in the year for which it is due;

(c) the Government of Djibouti will settle arrears that have accumulated up to and including 31 December 1996, amounting in total to 209,207 Swiss francs, by an immediate payment of 67,855 Swiss francs and the payment, beginning in 1998, of four annual instalments of 28,270 Swiss francs, and a final annual instalment of 28,272 Swiss francs;

Decides that Djibouti shall be permitted to vote, in accordance with paragraph 4 of article 13 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, after the conclusion of the present business.

---

[1] Adopted on 17 June 1997.

VI

Resolution concerning the assessment of contributions of new member States [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, that the contribution of Saint Kitts and Nevis to the ILO budget for the period of its membership in the Organization in 1996 and 1997 be based on an annual assessment rate of 0.01 per cent.

VII

Resolution concerning the scales of assessment of contributions to the budget for the 1998-99 biennium [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

1. Decides, in accordance with article 9, paragraph 2, of the Financial Regulations, to adopt, for the assessment of the contributions of member States for 1998, the draft scale of assessments set out in column 3 of Appendix I to this report;

2. Requests the Director-General, through the Governing Body, to report to the International Labour Conference at its 86th Session on changes, if any, to the scale of assessment adopted by the United Nations General Assembly at its 52nd Session, and on all the implications for the ILO, including its earliest comparable application, taking due consideration of the established practice, taking into account the deliberations of its 268th Session and of the 85th Session of the International Labour Conference, and in accordance with the Constitution, Financial Regulations, related resolutions and decisions;

3. Reaffirms that the ILO scale of assessments should be based upon the latest available scale of assessment adopted by the United Nations General Assembly.

VIII

Resolution concerning the management of the ILO Staff Pensions Fund [1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Recalling its resolution of 9 October 1946 by which it adopted revised Staff Pensions Regulations, under which, in particular, the Staff Pensions Fund became the property of the International Labour Organization to be administered for the purposes of the Regulations and managed by an Administrative Board,

Reaffirming the International Labour Organization's guarantee, in article 13 of the Regulations, of the payment of all annuities or capital sums due under those Regulations,

Considering that management by an Administrative Board is no longer justified having regard to the small number of beneficiaries and to the absence in recent years of any direct participation of the latter on the Board;

1. Decides —

(a) that the International Labour Office shall, under the supervision of its Governing Body, to which it shall annually report, henceforth have direct responsibility for the management of the Staff Pensions Fund and for the payment of benefits in accordance with the substantive provisions of the Regulations;

---

[1] Adopted on 16 June 1997.

(b) that the pension adjustment system for the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund shall continue to be applied to benefits due under the Regulations and that any subsequent improvements in that system shall be reflected in the payment of those benefits.

2. Hereby abrogates, without prejudice to operative paragraph 1 above, all provisions of the Staff Pensions Regulations that are inconsistent with the present resolution or with any decision that may be adopted by the Governing Body pursuant to it.

IX

Resolution concerning the composition of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization[1]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization,

Expressing its profound appreciation to Sir William Douglas and Mr. Edilbert Razafindralambo of the services which they have diligently and consistently rendered for 15 years to the international community;

Decides, in accordance with Article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organization, to appoint as judges of the Administrative Tribunal for a term of three years with effect from 1 July 1997 and, for the sake of uniformity, until 31 July 2000:

- Mr. Seydou Ba (Senegal);
- Mr. James K. Hugessen (Canada).

X

Resolution concerning the adoption of the Programme and Budget for 1998-99 and the allocation of the budget of income among member States[2]

The General Conference of the International Labour Organization:

By virtue of the Financial Regulations, adopts for the 66th financial period, ending 31 December 1999, the budget of expenditure for the International Labour Organization amounting to US$481,050,000 and the budget of income amounting to US$481,050,000, which, at the budget rate of exchange of 1.46 Swiss francs to the US dollar, amounts to 702,333,000 Swiss francs,

Bearing in mind:

- that, in adopting the budgets of income and expenditure for the 65th financial period, the General Conference requested the Director-General to present proposals to the Programme, Financial and Administrative Committee for adjustments to the budget of expenditure;
- that the Governing Body, at its 264th (November 1995) Session, accordingly agreed to make downward adjustments amounting to US$21,704,950;
- that, in consequence, if the budget of income is fully received, it is expected that there will be a budgetary surplus for the 65th financial period arising from the downward adjustments and amounting to US$21,704,950, which, at the budget rate of exchange for that financial period, would amount to 25,177,742 Swiss francs;

Resolves:

(a) that, in derogation from article 18 of the Financial Regulations, the said expected budgetary surplus of 25,177,742 Swiss francs shall be treated as budgetary income for 1998;

(b) that, in derogation from article 10.1 of the Financial Regulations, the remainder of the budget of income, denominated in Swiss francs, shall be financed from contributions from member States amounting to 338,577,629 Swiss francs in

---

[1] Adopted on 16 June 1997.

[2] Adopted on 17 June 1997.

1998 and 338,577,629 Swiss francs in 1999, allocated among member States in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives for those years; and

(c) that, should the said budgetary surplus be less than 25,177,742 Swiss francs, arrears of contributions received shall be used to finance the income budget for the 66th financial period, subject, however, to the resolution adopted by the General Conference at its 82nd Session (June 1995) concerning the utilization of arrears of contributions to cover budgetary deficits.
